At the moment of the adjournment, Mr. President, on yesterday, I had arrived at what seemed to me to be the main question before the Senate. I had said something about the graduation and pre-emption bills and their kindred subjects. I had attempted to examine some of the provisions of the bill of the Senator from South Carolina. I had admitted the importance of the question before us, and I had urged the great importance and the urgent necessity of placing this whole matter on the basis of a judicious compromise. Commencing, therefore, at the point where my remarks were arrested, (for I shall avoid repetition as much as possible,) I will proceed to give my views upon the question of distribution, in which it will be my purpose to show why it is, in my opinion, entitled to my support, and to answer some of the objections that had been urged against it. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. SEVIER] alluded to this subject the other day, and I confess I was rather disappointed in his course of remarks: I did expect and I did hope to hear that Senator discuss the merits of the proposition. I was anxious to hear his views, for they are usually marked with a strong vein of common sense and practical illustration. The Senator, however, declined the argument, and contented himself with saying that the measure was dead, and by telling us that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] had killed it. Yes, says the Senator from Arkansas, the Senator from Missouri murdered it as soon as it was introduced. I hope the Senator did not mean to charge the malice aforethought, which is a constituent of the crime of technical murder.

[Mr. SEVIER said yes, sir.]

Well, Mr. President, I have only to say that, while malice is essential to constitute a killing murder in the eye of the law, it is not so essential in the composition of a legislator. We should meet the questions that are presented for our consideration with calmness and deliberation. I do not say that the Senator from Missouri did not so discuss this question: I am merely replying to the remark of the Senator from Arkansas.

It so happens that I differ entirely with the Senator from Arkansas in the assumption that he has indulged in, that the proposition of distribution is either killed or murdered. Sir, that proposition is not dead, but liveth; and, let me tell Senators who think that it is dead, that they will find it not only living, but that it is destined to become the law of the land, and that, too, before many more sessions of Congress shall have passed by. It should, in my opinion, long since have been the law. If the bill that was introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] and which passed Congress during the administration of General Jackson, had become the law, it would have been a most valuable measure for the whole Union, and especially for my State; and I assure you, sir, while many of the adherents of General Jackson still sustained him, it was for other reasons than his opposition to the distribution bill. The same measure is now before us, and I shall give it my hearty support, and not like my friend from Arkansas. I shall not content myself with a mere expression of opinion. I desire my State to see the distinct grounds of my support; for I have no sentiment to conceal on this or any other measure.

First, I support the bill because it is the only compromise measure upon which all can unite, and which, with proper provisions, will do ample justice to both the old and the new States. The interest of the new States will be amply protected, and the rights of the old States will be maintained in the distribution of the fund. The difficulties spoken of by the Senator from South Carolina, as arising from the present system, will be partially obviated, and the voice of discontent between the new States and the old, growing out of the subject, will be forever hushed. Instead of making the bill expire by its own limitation in a few years, I would make it a part of the permanent land system.

Secondly. I support it as a Western measure. Yes, sir, as a Western measure; and especially as a measure called for by the best interests of my State. He must have been blind to the administration of public affairs for the last few years, who has not seen the tendency of the Government to draw the money from the West, through the land offices and impost duties, and expend it elsewhere. I heard the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. ANDERSON,] who addressed the Senate the other day upon this point, with great satisfaction. The noble stand he took, and the independence with which he announced his views, command my unqualified approbation. During the last three years, the table and expenditures will show that the expenses of the Administration have been $59,885,730.

Thus, in 1838,	-	-	-	$40,427,218
1839,	-	-	-	31,815,000

Now, how much of this fund has been expended in the West? how much in the Northwest? Let the friends of the Northern harbors answer; let the friends of the Cumberland road and the friends to the improvement of navigation of Western rivers answer. Not a dollar of this vast sum was appropriated to the protection of lake commerce; not a dollar to the improvement of the navigation of the Western rivers. The imposition on the commerce of the Ohio by the obstruction of the navigation, and the consequent high tariff of tolls at the falls, still remains. The Cumberland road, that great Western measure, the construction of which was commenced under the auspices of Mr. Jefferson, and continued through the subsequent Administrations to the present, has been suffered to sink into a state of dilapidation, decay, and ruin. I talked the other day with a contractor for carrying the mail in my State on this road, and he told me he would have to abandon his contract at all hazards. He said it would ruin him to try to go on, for the mail was so very heavy, that he could carry no passengers; and so soon as the frost was out in the spring, it would be impossible for four of the best horses he could get to travel more than two miles an hour upon it; and even then they would swamp or mire down at the worst places, and have to be raised by rails or levers. And yet, sir, out of your expenditure of near one hundred millions of dollars in the last three years, not one dollar could all the entreaties and arguments we could use obtain. I saw the tendency of the doctrines that have left us in our present condition, forcibly exemplified at the last session. After every proposition that had been introduced favorable to the Western objects which I have named had been voted down, and it was declared by a distinguished Senator [Mr. CALHOUN] that our appropriations had been dried up, a proposition was introduced to appropriate $90,000 to the commencement of a new work at Pensacola, on the Gulf of Mexico: the same Senators that voted against the Cumberland road voted for the Pensacola work, it being on the seaboard; and even at this session, when my friend the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Young] introduced a bill making a small appropriation to the Cumberland road, and proposed to let it remain on the orders without reference, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] objected, and wished the committee to inquire into the propriety of borrowing money for this road; and yet I am greatly mistaken if the same Senator did not vote for the Pensacola appropriation when the Government was borrowing money, without ever putting that question to himself. I introduce this, not so much for the purpose of complaining, as to show the tendency of modern doctrines, and the propriety on our part of providing for contingencies. Not that I have any disposition to give up the Cumberland road or the lake harbors; far from it: I expect to urge them upon the consideration of Congress so long as I am honored with a seat in this body. I hope, however, to see the Cumberland road provided for in the final adjustment of the land question at the next session of Congress. It was originally connected with it, and I shall contend for the continuance of the connection. By the distribution, at least a portion of the money that is drawn from us will be returned to our people annually. The vivifying influence of these annual returns will be felt in every part of the Union, but more especially in the West, which is, by the modern doctrines, in effect cut off from a participation in the benefits of a National Treasury, so far as direct appropriations are concerned. I can speak for my own State. I know that her share of the distribution will be most acceptable to her, circumstanced as she is. And as it is her right, I feel it to be my duty, as her representative, to urge the measure by my voice as well as by my vote.

At the moment the Senator from Kentucky introduced his amendment, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. LINN] intimated an intention of moving an amendment to the proposition of distribution, to appropriate the land funds to the Navy and the national defences exclusively. I suppose he meant the defences of the Western frontier, as that subject lies nearest his heart.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] catching at the proposition, but understanding it to be confined to the Navy alone, took the occasion to thank the Senator from Missouri for his magnanimity, and spoke in strains of eulogy and high commendation of the project. This is but carrying out the policy which I have stated has given the Government appropriations a salt-water tendency; but, sir, as a Western Senator, I cannot sustain either of these propositions; and, let me not be misunderstood: there is no one here who would go further to sustain the nation in all necessary appropriations for these objects; but let the funds necessary for the purpose not be taken exclusively from the West; let not the door be closed forever to a return to us of some part of the money that is abstracted from us by the continual drain of the public lands upon the pockets of our citizens. I confess that the two propositions, coming from the quarter they do, are somewhat alarming to those who hope to see a return to the West of a portion of the proceeds of the public lands. The objects named belong to the general charge; they are strictly national, and let the nation cherish them: for, should the time come when our patriotism and devotion to our country shall call upon us in the West to act with our brethren in the defence of our common country, by land or by sea, they have in the past a sufficient guarantee for the future.

Thirdly. I sustain the proposition because a compromise founded upon it will not unsettle the land system, but preserve it in an improved form, while all the different interests represented can harmonize. On the other hand, the effect of the bill of the Senator from South Carolina will be to unsettle the land system, create the relation of debtor and creditor between the General Government and the States, and produce conflicts arising out of our Indian relations.

The distribution bill will also go far to equalize the States who have received public lands for various purposes. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. NORVELL] has repeatedly introduced this subject, claiming, upon equitable principles, that the other new States should be brought up to the standard of Ohio, that has received more of the public land than any other new State. This bill will accomplish that object, if it does not exceed it. The 12½ per cent. on the unsold lands in Michigan, being over 21,000,000 acres, would bring that State more than even with Ohio. Michigan has received 969,759 acres, Ohio has received 1,842,911 acres—difference 873,152 acres; 12½ per cent. or 1-8th of the unsold lands in Michigan would be over 2,500,000 while the 12½ per cent. on the 2,000,000 acres unsold in Ohio would be only 250,000 acres. So that the effect of the bill will be entirely favorable to those of the new States that have not received as much of the public lands as Ohio.

These are, briefly, my reasons for supporting the distribution bill. Let us look at the grounds on which Senators place their objections to its passage. So far as I have been able to understand them, they are these:

First. The measure is unconstitutional.

Secondly. It will retard the settlement of the States by holding up the lands for prices at which they will not readily sell.

Thirdly. It will stimulate the States to drain the Treasury of all the revenue of the nation, and leave the General Government helpless.

Fourthly. It will corrupt the States, and produce prodigality among their citizens.

Fifthly. It will make it necessary, by abstracting the proceeds of the public lands from the general revenue, to lay additional imposts to meet the deficit.

These, I believe, comprise the principal objections; I have stated them fairly, and I intend, in the progress of the debate, to meet and discuss them in the same spirit in which I have laid them down.

The first question is one of grave import, for if that should be against me, the argument closes, and the bill fails, so far as depends upon my vote. I am apprised of the position that is maintained by those who deny the constitutionality of the proposed measure; they contend that it is unconstitutional to raise money for the purpose of distributing it among the States, and therefore, inasmuch as the abstraction of the land fund from the revenue of the General Government creates a deficit that must be made up by an increase of imposts, it raises the constitutional objection. The view that I entertain of the constitutional question renders it unnecessary for me to examine the position assumed, which I admit to be a question of grave import; but which, upon a full discussion in Congress, was decided in favor of the power upon the question of distributing the surplus revenue; and that decision was approved of by the late President. I feel no disposition to open the argument of the question until the case shall arise making it necessary for me to do so.

I contend that the proposed disposition of the proceeds of the public lands, by distributing them among the States according to population, evidenced by their representation in Congress, is the most constitutional disposition that can be made of them, and that a faithful discharge of the constitutional duties of Congress demands the measure proposed. The land question arose prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution; it was a Revolutionary measure in its origin; it bears date at a period anterior to that at which the General Government had the power of levying imposts on foreign merchandise; and hence it never was connected with that mode of raising revenue. The different States, during the Revolutionary war, had contracted debts which the Confederation desired to see liquidated. Many of the States owned large tracts of wild land, Virginia being the largest proprietor, her claim covering the most of the Northwest Territory, now Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin. Cessions of these lands were made by the proprietary States to the Confederation. That of Virginia, which may be selected to test the question, after ceding her lands, provided the use to which they should be applied, as follows:

"These lands shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation or federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for other use or purpose whatever."

The Confederation being a mere league of States acting for the benefit of States, accepted the cession upon the terms, and took upon itself the execution of the trust confided to it. In 1776, after the trust had been accepted by the Confederation upon the terms of the deeds of cession, and while its execution was obligatory upon it, the Federal Constitution was adopted, in which provision was made for this very property, the eye of the Convention evidently being directed to it. The 3d section of the 4th article provides that

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress. The Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

Here are ample powers conferred and expressly delegated to Congress over the entire subject of the public domain, the object of which was clearly to enable the General Government to act directly upon the subject-matter of the public lands, uncontrolled except by the terms of the Constitution, and the previous contracts and engagements of the Confederation. These contracts and engagements were expressly recognised by the first clause of the sixth article of the Constitution, which declares that "all debts, contracts, and engagements entered into before the adoption of this Constitution shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution, as under the Confederation." Thus you see the contracts and engagements of the Confederation of States under the Articles were expressly recognised and provided for by the Federal Constitution. The question then arises—Did the cession of the public lands by the States, and the acceptance of them by the Confederation under the deeds of cession, upon the terms specified, and for the purposes declared, amount in the eye of the law to a "contract," or "engagement," on the part of the Confederation, which was obligatory upon it? Can there be any doubt upon this point? If not, then the article of the Constitution which I have just read provides for the very case, and the obligations of the General Government now are precisely those of the Confederation before the change of Government and the adoption of the Federal Constitution. The question then recurs, What were the obligations of the Confederation? This question must be decided by the deeds of cession, and can be as well answered in the very language used by the parties, to dispose of these lands "for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become or shall become members of the Confederation or Federal alliance of the States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other purpose whatsoever." I leave the constitutional argument here, having, in my own mind at least, sustained the constitutionality of the disposition proposed of the proceeds of the public lands, by which it would seem to follow that any other disposition, except to make the trust fund more valuable, since the discharge of the Revolutionary debt, for which purpose they were ceded, has been in violation of the declared object of the trust, and consequently an infraction of that section of the Constitution which I have read, securing the inviolability of the "contracts" and "engagements" of the Confederation.

The questions may arise, how do you maintain, under this state of the argument, the grants of lands to the new States, and the distribution of the land fund not covered by the deeds of cession? My answer to the first is, that the clause of the Constitution which I have read expressly gives the power of disposition over the property, and as a trustee Congress has the power to grant or appropriate one part of the fund to enhance the value of the residue. Such has been the character of all the grants made. To the second question I would say that, as the other lands have been paid for by the people of all the States, the same people have an undoubted right to a return of their proceeds upon a fair distribution, should they desire it.

Secondly. Will the bill retard the settlement of the States in which the lands lie, by holding up the price beyond that at which they will readily sell? So it is contended; but it may be answered, that the incorporation of the other principles in the compromise upon it would entirely remove all doubt on the subject. Standing alone, however, it seems to me that the new States have a sufficient guarantee in the fact that the fund is to be distributed, and the disposition of the old States to get possession of their share of the fund will certainly prompt them to accelerate rather than retard the sales. The tendency of the measure, I think, therefore, is the other way, and the new States have no cause for alarm on that ground.

Thirdly. It is contended that it will stimulate the States to drain the Treasury of all the revenue of the nation, and destroy the General Government.

This position presents for our consideration matters of grave and solemn import, and I will endeavor to speak of it as its importance demands. The political relations of the General Government with the State Governments, as well as the relation of Congress to each, are involved in the argument. The assumption is that the States would destroy the General Government, and that we, the Congress of the United States, are called upon to protect the Federal Government against this disposition of the States. Let us begin at the source of power, and see what the position is. It is either that the people of the States are hostile to the people of the Federal Government, being the identical same people, or that the people of the States are hostile to the Federal Government, and would destroy it to build up the State Governments. Neither of these positions, I humbly conceive, can be maintained. If it were so, would not that hostility long since have been carried into effect? Is it a controversial point that the Federal Government only exists at the will of the people of the States? Can they not abolish it without even the necessity of resorting to revolution? Should they think proper to do so, let them refuse or omit to appoint Senators, or to provide for the election of members of Congress, or to elect them, for Congress has no constitutional power even to appoint the time of electing either, or to act upon the subject, nor has the Executive any greater powers over it; or let them omit to provide for the election of a President by appointing electors, which they could do if they pleased. I say, let the States take either of these courses, and what becomes of the Federal Government? The parchment, called the Constitution, would still remain, but for all practical purposes it would be as a blank piece of paper. The Government would stand dissolved, without violence, without bloodshed, by the mere operation of non-user, until the same people shall think proper to set the machinery in motion. So you see, sir, the people of the States are to the complicated machinery of our system of government what the heart is to the human system—its vitality and its power. Let us, sir, pursue the argument, and see what our position is as members of the Senate. Are we not the creatures of the different States, created by their power, and the representatives of their will, within the provisions of the Federal Constitution? Does it become us to charge those who delegated us to take seats on this floor, who clothed us with all the powers we possess as Senators, to turn upon our creators and charge them with a disposition to destroy the Federal Government, and claim for ourselves the high prerogative of acting as the exclusive protectors of the Federal Government against the assaults of the States? Can we maintain the position that we hold powers legitimately at war with the rights and interests of our common constituents, the States? Let Senators who choose to assume these high grounds maintain them. Our duties are of a two-fold character—while we sustain the Federal Government and support the Federal Constitution, we do so as the representatives of the States. Sir, to test this question, how would Senators get along with instructions from the Legislatures of their States on this subject of distribution? Let me suppose that the honorable Senators from Missouri were instructed, would they turn upon the Legislature and charge her with a disposition to destroy the Federal Government, or would they obey? Suppose the Legislature of Alabama should instruct her Senators, would they obey? [Mr. CLAY of Alabama said, No, sir.] Then the Senator would resign, I suppose. [Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir, I would.] Well, sir, then we would get another Senator in your place, who would carry out the will of the State, and the operation would merely exchange one Senator for another—the principle would be carried out, and the State would triumph. I have introduced these remarks for the purpose of showing that, if the States were so disposed, they have it in their power to arrest the further progress of the operation of the General Government without resorting to the supposed course to effect that object. The arguments have been predicated on the supposition that the people of the States are hostile to the General Government; when, in fact, nothing is less true: the people of the States are devotedly and practically attached to the Federal Government: instead of wishing to destroy or embarrass it, they would come to this rescue in the hour of peril, and lay down their lives in its defence.

Fourthly. It is argued that it will corrupt the States, and lead to prodigality. This is assuming the position that the people of the States are not competent to manage their own concerns, and that we should act as their guardians—a doctrine that has of late years found its way into Congress, and has found supporters among those who profess a reverence next to that for Holy Writ, for Democratic doctrines! This is strange Democracy. Afraid to trust the people with their own money! And pray, sir, what would you do with it? Leave it in the hands of the Federal officers for safe keeping? Ay, that is the safe deposit. They cannot be corrupted, as a matter of course. Is that the doctrine Senators contend for? This is guarding the rights of the people of the States with a vengeance! We have their money, and they demand it; we, their representatives, answer, You cannot have it; you are not capable of taking care of it; you will be come prodigal; let us keep it, we can be trusted; your money will be safely kept or laid out, as we think proper; recollect it is all for your good that we put ourselves to the trouble of taking care that you be not tempted. Would a course like this comport with our duty to the States? Let Senators who approve of it adopt the course; it does not suit me. On the score of prodigality, I know of no State that could compare notes with the general Government for the last four years.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] refers to the deposit of the surplus revenue with the States, and attributes the great rage for speculation and internal improvements to that deposit. Suppose I admit his premises, can he show me that a similar effect would not have been produced by the expenditure of the same sum of money by the General Government? It was the money that had its effect, and not the hand that scattered it. But, sir, I cannot let the remarks of the Senator pass without further notice. I do not concur with him in the cause to which he refers. The removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States; the bargain that was made between the Government and the local or State banks, that the banks should pay a per cent. on the public deposits, authorizing the banks to issue upon them; the circular of the Secretary of the Treasury directing them to do so, and the consequent inflation of the currency, produced the effect to which the Senator from Missouri alluded, and not the deposit of the surplus with the States.

Fifthly. It is objected that, by abstracting the land fund for distribution, it will become necessary to provide for the deficit by laying imposts. I presume this position is well founded, provided the present imposts shall not be sufficient for an economical administration of public affairs. That it would fall greatly short of the late expenditures I readily admit; but that is no criterion to judge by, for I trust the expenditures hereafter will be brought within economical limits. I hope in no emergency hereafter, we shall be required to resort to the present policy of Treasury notes. Let us suppose, then, for the sake of argument, that we shall have to lay impost duties to make up the deficit of the land fund. Those duties can be laid upon luxuries, such as wines, brandies, and silks, articles consumed by the rich, and then only by such persons as choose to pay for them. The great laboring class of society would pay very little of the duty, while they would receive their proportion of the distribution. As a general policy, I see no objection to it; and as connected with the obligation of distribution, it would be the true policy in the contingency of which I have spoken. My remarks, Mr. President, will be closed, so far as the land question is concerned, with this declaration: I do not anticipate the possibility of arranging this great subject at the present session; but I hope to see the whole matter finally settled at the next session, upon terms of compromise and mutual concession, to the benefit of the people, the safety of the General Government, and the best interest of the States.

The Constitution of the United States was based upon a compromise of conflicting opinions. The tariff question, that almost threatened the Union, was so settled; and why should not this great land question receive the same blessing?

I would here close my remarks and resume my seat, but the Senate must pardon me for noticing the political topic that has been introduced into the discussion. I did hope, Mr. President, when we assembled here at the present session, that we would, by common consent, exclude from these halls all the political heat that was created in the late political contest. We have all heard enough of it to need repose now it is over. But in this I have been disappointed. The very title of the bill introduces the log cabin as a political reminiscence calculated to lead to political discussion; indeed, it has so led some of the Senators who have addressed you. I did suppose that the charges that have been made in the heated partisan presses, that the late Presidential election was influenced by stock-jobbing considerations in England, would not have found their way into this august body. But here, again, I have been mistaken. And since the charge has been made, I desire to know what State has been so operated upon. Let the charge be located. For my State and her citizens I repel it. I had seen in the columns of the party presses, immediately after the election for President, the charge that the election had been carried by fraud. This we had a right to expect, for it is a principle in our nature to attribute our defeat to any thing else than a defect in ourselves or our conduct; and, so long as the charge had no special location, I thought it but the privilege of the defeated party to excuse themselves, even at the expense of facts and of the feelings of their opponents; but, by my utter astonishment, I saw in the official organ the location of this fraud in my own State. I had been there at the time of the election, had heard and seen much, and I now declare to you that I honestly believe there never was a more fair and honest expression of public opinion in the State than there was at the elections there last summer and autumn. There may have been illegal votes given, and no doubt were, but, if so, I have good reason to believe they were unknown to the judges and inspectors, and were not confined to one side alone.

I am aware that an argument has been based on the fact that there were more votes given in August and November than there were polls assessed in the spring. Admit this to be true, and does it prove that the excess were illegal votes, or that they were all cast on one side? Or may it not rather be attributed to the fact that all the polls were not taken by the assessors in the spring, or that some may have come of age between the time of the assessment and the election? This would be the charitable view of the matter. Add to this the fact that these same assessors accidentally returned "2,235,906 acres of land less than the true amount," and then make the calculation, and you will find that the vote of Indiana does not bear a higher proportion to the population than an average of other States, and it seems to me that even the Official would consent to raise the floor from Indiana, and seek some other point of location. It does not become me to say what was the cause of the defeat of the Administration party at the late election. The Senator from Arkansas and myself said a few words on that subject at the commencement of my remarks. Still I may be permitted to say, without departing from the course of remark I have laid down for myself, that I attribute the result to the fact that those in power lived too far from the people, knew too little of their interest, cared too little for their wishes, pressed upon the country obnoxious measures, attempted to entrench themselves in power by the application of doctrines with which the great body of the people had no sympathy, and treated with disdain, contempt, slander, and abuse, the candidate of their choice. While the warning rebuke has been pronounced in tones of thunder, it has been both solemn and instructive. It has proclaimed to the world the power of the ballot-box, and the perpetuity of our glorious form of Government.

SPEECH OF MR. WHITE,

OF INDIANA.

In Senate, Tuesday, January 19, 1841—On the Prospective Pre-emption bill.

MR. WHITE said: However imperfectly I feel myself able to discuss this subject, I am conscious, nevertheless, that in deciding upon it, I occupy an impartial position. Indiana, in her progressive advances from a wilderness state to the dignity of the fourth or fifth member of the Union, has reached that period in her history, when she may hold with a steady and an equal hand the scales of interest between the old States and the new. While, then, I listen with most respectful consideration to abler counsels than I myself can aspire to give upon a subject whose growing magnitude has inspired veteran Senators with such apprehension as even to justify precipitate and immature legislation, I shall endeavor so to record my vote upon the several propositions before us as to secure to the new States all the equity they claim, and to the old all the right which they challenge, and to all the States an advantage of the most momentous importance, to be gained, as I conceive, from no other source than from the proceeds of our bountiful domain.

In our plan of Government, sir, simple as its objects and as well defined as its purposes are, many difficult and complicated questions are constantly occurring. They are chiefly questions of power. Our confederated and at the same time Republican principle, our relations with the Indian tribes, our partial system of domestic slavery, and our provincial or territorial system, are all full enough of perplexities to put this experiment of Government to its severest trial. Indeed, sir, parties have a tendency to organize themselves not so much upon measures of policy as upon abstract questions of constitutional construction. This tendency of party is greatly injurious, by producing political sophisms and refined theories, which override every practical power for good conferred by our Constitution.

The land question is not properly a question of power, and yet incidentally it involves considerations of that character. Over the public domain which lies within the limits of the organized States, the United States seem to have something more than a simple property jurisdiction, or a mere private ownership. This is proved by their right to make laws for its conveyance and government, and by their power to protect their possessions, and to determine all questions concerning those lands in courts of their own creation. Such powers are appurtenant to a species of territorial sovereignty.

I concur fully with Senators who have ascribed so great importance to the measure now before us. If we regard it merely as a question of finance, it carries a grave and serious import. Not the least among the high functions of Government is its power to raise and expend money. Next to the power to declare war, and to place under the arbitrament of the sword the life and fortune of the citizen, the power to raise revenue is the highest prerogative of sovereignty. Of equal importance is it if we have respect to the question of population or settlement and of social organization. These difficulties are increased by the medium through which Senators choose to regard the subject. While the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BEN- TON] complains that we will not treat the public domain as a fund for revenue, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. ANDERSON] contends that is by no means to be considered as a question of finance. Concurring fully, as I do, with the honorable Senator who introduced the bill now on your table, in the propriety of a permanent pre-emption law, I protest against the justice of the remarks with which he accompanied its introduction, and to which I shall have occasion hereafter to advert. My purpose now, is merely to express my regret that a measure so interesting, and I may add beneficent, as the final disposition of our public domain, could not be presented to this body by the dominant party, without a conjuration of influences well calculated to disturb the harmony of our legislation—influences which have lately been aroused in the conflict of contending parties, and which had expended themselves in the most conclusive demonstrations at the ballot box.

To one or all of these causes it is owing that our statute book groans under the weight of enactment in regard to the management of our land system. Since the colonial and agrarian system of Rome, no nation has half such a complication of laws regulating its domain. It may well be conceived that so extensive and fertile a territory would be a prolific subject of legislation. Our entire domain is computed at 1,085,536,252 acres of land, to about 400,000,000 of which the Indian title has been extinguished, and remains unextinguished to near 700,000,000 of acres. Of this vast domain, about seven-ninths lies east, and two-ninths west of the Rocky mountains. As yet we have sold to individuals a little upwards of eighty millions of acres; and if we add to that, grants and reservations to States, individuals, etc there will still remain more than nine hundred millions of acres in which the United States has a proprietary interest.

Nature stamps upon these teeming acres their uses for the abode of man, and for the development not only of the physical but of the moral and intellectual energies of the Caucasian race. Extending to the shores of the Pacific ocean, the retiring savage shall give place to the Anglo-Saxon, to illustrate in the face of the world, and upon the last great drama where it can be seen, the triumphs of civilization, of liberty, and of religion.

Already, upon a considerable part of this domain, have these great purposes begun their accomplishment. Of the territory above mentioned, an area of about two hundred and fifty millions of acres has been organized into Republican States; and nine more stars of virgin lustre shine resplendent in the galaxy of the Union.

The bill and amendments before us contemplate a permanent and conclusive adjustment of the interest of the United States in this domain; and from the general view which we have taken of its uses and of the nature of the trust with which the Government is invested in regard to it, we are prepared to discuss the several principles and details involved in the bill and proposed amendments.

From the beginning of our land policy, settlement and occupancy seem to have been the object of the Government. It is true that largesses have never been proposed, nor bounties awarded, to induce a cultivation of our wild domain. On the other hand the Government has, with all possible expedition, from time to time extinguished the Indian title, and thrown the lands into market. The Indian claim removed, no other obstacle has been left by our laws in the way of settlement, no limits prescribed to the exploration of the adventurous pioneer. The method of settling the Western lands in compact masses, by townships at a time, has been always repudiated. The Government has incurred no expense to protect the settlements. No garrisons or military posts have been established upon our frontier with this express reference. On the contrary, it has been left to the same fearless and hardy spirit of individual resolution which dared to encounter the obstacles of nature and the terrors of the forest, to defend the pioneers against the marauding incursions of their savage neighbors. The rifle and the axe have gone together into the wilderness, borne by the same hand. The mother has left the couch when her infant reposed, to watch over the labors of the backwoodsman while engaged in his daily and toilsome task, and to give the first alarm against the treachery of the Indian; and the hour of midnight repose has been rendered secure only by the guardianship of the hunter sentinel.

In such a way as this, sir, have your great tramontane valleys been settled, until now security has succeeded to danger, and the alarms of a border war are drowned in the noisy tread of commerce and of speculation. The pioneer has borne the dangers of the adventure; shall he not reap its honors and rewards? Unaided, unregarded, uncompensated, he has laid in virtue and in peace the foundations of several of your most powerful States, strengthened the bonds of your Confederacy, added new interests to your commerce, augmented sources to your revenues, security to your liberties and fresh glories to your empire. Will you now withdraw from him your patronage when first it begins to be valuable; or rather, will you not confirm to him his ancient charter? Is the same wise and liberal policy yet to continue, of covering this continent with Republican States, or is the sordid grips of avarice to arrest this march of civil liberty towards its utmost destination? Is this paternal Government willing to adopt the motto: "Quærenda pecunia primum est—virtus post nummos," to postpone the highest political interests of its people to a consideration of revenue?

It is remarkable that in almost every deed of cession from the States, and in both the treaties with France and Spain for the purchase of Louisiana and Florida, guarantees are contained, securing to the people of the acquired territory a Republican form of government, and free and equal admission into the Union. If, then, even in our foreign negotiations this appears to be a fundamental object, let us not thwart, by our domestic policy, the earliest attainment of so great an end. Let revenues be a mere incidental consideration, or in the expressive and simple language of a member of the first Congress, "let us make the best of liberty, our people, and our land."

Senators object to the pre-emption policy mainly upon these grounds:

1. That it injures our exchequer by diminishing the price received for the lands.
2. That, by conferring privileges and bounties upon the people of the new States, it is partial in its operation, and unjust to the people of the old States.
3. That it produces an unnatural and forced drain upon the population of the old States; and
4. That it engenders a spirit of insubordination to the laws, and will lead to mischievous riots and excesses by tolerating a scramble for the public property.

To the first objection I reply that, before the former pre-emption laws had operated to any extent, the gross average at which the lands have been sold since the present minimum price was established, is about one dollar and thirty cents per acre. The inconsiderable loss of five cents per acre does not weigh a feather in the scale against the equity of pre-emption. To appease even the ill-founded complaints of a single State having public lands within its borders, you ought not to hesitate to make so small a sacrifice. You have assessed the value of the lands at $1.25 per acre. Why should you expose them to sale at auction? Many of those lands are not worth the minimum price, and yet you refuse, and for good reasons, to graduate them downwards. Why should you graduate them upwards? In any department of business there are evils in the auction system, and it ought to be avoided when it is possible to do so. It is the parent frequently of ruinous speculation, arising from an undue competition which such an occasion generally arouses. Upon the commerce of our citizens we lay an equal duty, and do not sell the protection of our navy to the highest bidder. The facilities of the public mail, and the privileges of the Patent Office, are afforded at fixed rates. No part of our revenue except from land is raised in the shambles. Government offers none of its favors, none of its privileges, to the cupidity of wealth save the domicile of the poor man, of which, by conquest or purchase, it has become the lord paramount.

The second objection assumes what I cannot grant, "that the right of pre-emption is a bounty or a privilege." The pre-emptor pays a fair equivalent for his right, of more value in the end to the Government than the higher price which the capitalist might bid at auction. Foregoing now the argument of increased resources and augmented national wealth, produced by conveying the lands to the actual occupant and cultivator, I urge the consideration of enhanced value given to the adjacent lands by improvements in their neighborhood. How much the sale of this class of lands has been hastened by such causes, it is impossible to estimate; but I venture the assertion that your Treasury, enriched as it has been from every source, including the twenty-five millions of Treasury notes, which have been issued, could not stand the shock of yielding up its gains, derived in this very way. Is it more in the nature of bounty to give these lands for a fixed price to the first occupant, to the most industrious citizen, than to the wealthiest, who may perchance bid more they are worth? But in what respect is this system unjust to the people of the old States? Certainly the lands are not a fund for individual aggrandizement and profit. Whatever relation the Government, as the trustee of the lands, bears to the States, upon the great principles of equity, which I shall by and by discuss, it can be under no obligation to parcel the domain out, per capita, among the individual masses of the people. The people of the old States remaining such, cannot complain that a purchase is denied to them for purposes of investment and speculation, (I do not like the word,) which is allowed to him who is willing to join the new community in the wilderness, to lay his hearth-stone, and to build his altar there. If the Government does not hold these lands in trust for individual advantage, then it has a right to fix what principles it pleases for their sale and disposition, and surely no complaint can justly be made when those principles are friendly to the earliest development of the social and political system, and to the increase of population within the limits of the new Territory. Of this I defy refutation.

I am willing to accord a character of plausibility to the third objection to pre-emption above enumerated. Perhaps the tendency of American enterprise is too much to a diffusive population. To every section of the Union the Government owes an equal patronage, and no patriotic citizen of the West would desire to see his own section built up at the expense of the sister States. Especially would no Western statesman commend himself to his constituents by the enactment of partial laws. The chain of dependence is such between the most distant portions of our Confederacy, that one cannot be injuriously affected without sensible loss to the other. It is impossible, however, to restrain the emigrating spirit of our countrymen, and no better rule can be adopted than to leave each one free to follow those impulses which point to his own prosperity and happiness. While the rewards of agriculture in the rich and fertile plains west of the mountains are more tempting to the citizen than the appropriate pursuits to which those are destined who remain in the Atlantic States, it would be wrong to check that virtuous ambition which is emulous to reach them. Let it be remembered that agriculture is almost the universal pursuit of the Western emigrant; and the more this proportion of our population increases, the more our real independence is secured, and the faster our national wealth is augmented. I am not about to adopt the exclusive and exploded doctrine of the Economists, which denied the productive quality to the operations of commerce and to the labors of the artisan. But I do contend that the agricultural employment is best adapted to the genius of our people and to the condition of our country, and that it ought, and ever will, I trust, maintain a proud preponderance. Need I remind you, sir, that this class, in every emergency, will be the prop and stay of our Republic; that here the virtues which shall save our institutions will find their true abiding place, and that sedition and misrule never enter the peaceful domicile of the husbandman? But there is a view of this subject which takes off the edge of the objection we are discussing. It is, that although emigration may be too rapid from the old States to the new, the nature of our pursuits is such that there is a constant circulation of our population. Though in the process of this mighty provincial accretion, which has so astonished us with its growth, the blood may be forced through the arteries in unusual currents to the extremities, yet the self-restoring effort of nature shall return it through a thousand veins to the seat of life. The traveller from the old States, after many days, will return with the spoils of industry, and pour the grateful offering into the maternal lap.

A single word or two, sir, shall suffice in reply to the fourth objection. It is in effect a "begging of the question;" for if you invite the occupant to take possession of your lands, he ceases to be a trespasser. Your act of 1807 forbade trespasses upon the public lands; and yet how little has the moral sense of the community been shocked by the frequent and constantly recurring violations of that act which we have witnessed. The universal sentiment of the nation has pronounced it a dead letter. Can he who seeks a home, and a domicile for his wife and his children offend against any rule of society? In vain do you set up the artificial authority of any law against so holy a purpose. Restrict your pre-emption law to the actual settler; cut up speculation by the roots, and your statute book will suffer no reproach, nor opprobrium rest upon your authority, from any of the acts which you fear.

That there will be no strife or violent contention among the several beneficiaries of the pre-emption law, the experience of the past sufficiently proves. The northwest corner of Indiana (within my own observation) has been settled by pre-emptors. A more orderly, industrious, or better regulated community, is not to be found.

The argument in favor of pre-emption is so pregnant, that it seems almost superfluous to adduce the authority of other Governments which have uniformly extended the kindest protection toward their infant settlements. From the time when the wandering Scythian roamed from one hunting ground or pasture to another, as his brief annual tenure would expire—from the period of the folland and bookland of the ancient Saxon, there has been no mercenary legislation upon lands. The far famed agrarian laws of Rome were designed to aid and protect the colonist. The States of our own Confederacy have either surrendered their lands to settlers, or sold them at a nominal price. We are all conversant with that force of public opinion which constrained Massachusetts to pass laws requiring the successful plaintiff in ejectment to pay the occupying claimant for what they termed his "betterments," answering to the "melioramenta" of the civil law, or the "improvements" of the Western squatter. A rigorous policy against the settler would be alike in violation of contemporary sentiment, and of all the lights of experience.

But Senators say that the new States, not content with bearing the palm of successful rivalry from their older sisters, have really outstripped themselves, and have asserted the right of majority before they have attained the age of twenty-one. Grant that this is true, sir; we have at least the proud satisfaction of knowing that our greatness has not "been thrust upon us." It is a trophy of our own achieving. We glory in the fact that, in our infancy, in our wilderness State, we have earned the honors of manhood. We boast not strength alone, but wisdom. In the ordinance of 1787, before the birth of your Constitution, we taught you the principles of civil liberty. It is a singular fact that, in an ordinance creating a Government designed to be temporary, those great principles should be laid down as the fundamental basis of our society, and expressed to be forever binding and irrevocable upon people and States thereafter to arise. Like Hannibal, we were consecrated to liberty in our infancy; and now that our noonday sun is culminating upon the continent, we conjure you to apprehend no evil; nor to fear influences, however powerful, which are thus benign! Let Senators remember, when they are disposed to mete out their favors with a sparing hand, under what difficulties, under what discouragements, and under what painful perils, our early settlements were effected. Let them remember how, even in later times, it has cost us all our resources to settle down as owners upon the frowning forest. The State of Indiana has an area of upwards of twenty-two millions of acres; and her citizens have already contributed to the National Treasury, as the price of their demesnes, more than twenty millions of dollars. Indiana has barely passed her minority. How, after such exhaustion, has her industry been taxed to cultivate and stock their farms; and to procure that bountiful subsistence which an American citizen demands!

You have been reminded, sir, by way of checking too gratuitous a spirit towards the new States, of the bounty and munificence, or as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Preston] eloquently expresses it, of the justice (for what higher attribute can be claimed in these degenerate ages) of Virginia and the other conceding States in surrendering their rich possessions to the Union. The new States congratulate themselves upon this result. They congratulate the Union. Had the States retained this territory we should not now perhaps have been in the hands of a paternal Government, boasting its redeemed guarantee for our admission into the Union. Wisconsin, Iowa, Florida, would not have held that guarantee yet to be faithfully and speedily performed. The territory Northwest of the Ohio River would have been a mere appendage to the Old Dominion. Louisiana in all probability would not have been acquired, nor the navigation of the Mississippi secured. We should not now have boasted New Orleans, the peerless exporting city of this continent, nor would our great staple growing region of the South have had the valleys of the Upper Mississippi, the Ohio, the Illinois, and Wabash, to pour, free of duty, their abundant and ceaseless supplies into her bosom; thus giving to her annual eighty millions of exports one third of the element of their value.

As a representative of Western interests, I do not complain of partial or unequal laws; but it cannot be forgotten that commerce has its costly defenses, and manufactures a protection springing from your laws. Of necessity, almost, the pecuniary patronage of the Government is limited to the seaboard. In proportion to its numbers, the West is the largest tax-paying section of our country, for the simple reason that not an article of import is produced there. These drains upon our industry we submit to with an uncomplaining temper. But we cannot forget the equity which such considerations raise when you are called to pass laws upon subjects peculiarly affecting our interest. Our staples are the agricultural products which seem to be placed beyond the pale of constitutional protection. Compared with the magnitude of the agricultural interest, all the other products of labor in this country sink into utter insignificance. Commerce has its one hundred millions of exports, and an equal amount of imports, and our manufactures doubtless transcend these sums in amount; but agriculture, towering above all, ascends to two thousand millions per annum. No nation can be perfectly independent which does not raise its own bread-stuffs; and the highest condition of social happiness and prosperity is attained where other interests, to be sure, are flourishing, but when the agricultural interest maintains the ascendant. In every vicissitude of trade, and in every revulsion of government, while famine and distress too often mark their desolating career in other countries, in peace and in war, our teeming soil continues to yield its fruits to the labor of the husbandman, and our barns and granaries to furnish perpetual resources for the life of man. No event in history is associated with such a mass of human happiness, present and prospective, as the settlement of our Western country, by multiplying and cheapening the food upon which man subsists. But I will not press this topic further. The people of the West, exulting in their growing strength, expect from Congress just and considerate laws, not so much from their power to enforce them, as from the enlightened appreciation in which their claims must be held by the entire Union.

It is matter of regret that the dignity of these claims should be disparaged, or suspicion be thrown upon them by the manner in which the present bill was introduced into the Senate. When pre-emption laws become the mere foot-ball of party, or are converted into an engine for political warfare, it is no wonder that they fail to command that general assent to which they are entitled. The honorable member who brought in this bill remarked, upon its introduction, that the Federal party (as he was pleased to term the Whig party) had, in the recent Presidential canvass, shown so devoted a love for log-cabins and their inmates, he was fearful they would anticipate the friends of the Administration in presenting the measure of a permanent pre-emption, and he therefore hastened to submit the proposed measure. Sir, the significant title prefixed to this bill, if it shall not be interpreted as ironical upon its worthy beneficiaries, has at least that aspect in reference to one of the great parties engaged in the recent Presidential struggle. Certainly, sir, either the bill or its title, or some other associations, have produced, in this debate, not a little rallery against the emblems adopted for good cause by the Whigs in the late contest. The freight with which this pre-emption vessel is laden, is acceptable to my constituents, but they like not the flag under which she sails. In a word, sir, it cannot be concealed that this measure is intended to overreach the action of the coming Administration, and either to force that Administration into an antagonist position, or obnubilate its glories by this forced and sudden interposition of a policy for which the country was as ripe eight years ago as now. It matters not to me, however, whether this consummation be achieved under the star of General Harrison, whether it be the concomitant of that series of conservative and patriotic measures which are to restore the character of the age and to elevate our institutions, or whether, now urged on by influences no longer to be resisted, the measure has been precipitated upon us by the stern virtue which is felt and appreciated, and, I may add, feared in the character of General Harrison, and by that powerful voice of the people which has pronounced his election.

Connected with the subject of a final settlement of the land question, as proposed by the bill, two antagonist measures have been presented to the Senate. That contained in the amendment of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN] proposes to grant to the actual settler, whose estate shall not exceed the value of $1000, the right of pre-emption to any quantity of land not exceeding 320 acres, and to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States of the Union in just and equitable proportions. The other, proposed by the honorable member from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN] contemplates a cession of the public lands to the several States within whose limits they lie, upon conditions, the principal of which are, that the States shall annually pay to the General Government sixty-five per cent. of the gross proceeds, and that the cession "shall be in full of the five per cent. fund or any part thereof not already accrued to any State; and the said States shall be exclusively liable for all charges that may hereafter arise from the surveys, sales, and management of the public lands and extinguishment of Indian title within the limits of said States respectively." It also provides that the States may pass pre-emption and graduation laws. I shall first consider the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

I object to this scheme as unsettling the whole land system, approved by the experience of forty years, as destroying that uniformity which has contributed so much not only to the security of titles, but to the value of improvements made upon the newly purchased lands. It transfers the muniments of title from the archives of this Government to the custody of the Executives of the several States, the forms of conveyance of course to be devised by the authorities of those States. It reates new responsibilities unknown to the Constitution, and dangerous to our revenues. Who can believe that the States will meet pecuniary engagements of this kind with promptitude? Your laws cannot enforce their collection, and your only reliance is upon the faith of the States. In original engagements of the several States with the world, their plighted faith will be a sufficient guarantee for the redemption of any pecuniary obligation. But here the case is very different. This proposition creates relations between the States and the Federal Government, not very dissimilar to those which existed under the old articles of Confederation. A principal inducement for abolishing the old Confederacy, was because requisitions for money, (even for so serious a consideration as the payment of the Revolutionary debt,) made by Congress upon the States, were not regarded. The failure of a single debtor State to meet engagements imposed by this measure, would produce dissatisfaction, and justify a like remissness on the part of others. In every aspect of the case, the relation of debtor and creditor between the States and this Government is to be deprecated; but when that relation is relied upon to supply a considerable portion of our current revenue, it can result only in disaster and disappointment, until the sense of obligation shall ultimately be broken. But one experiment of the kind has been made since the era of our Constitution, and that was in the act of 1836, depositing forty millions of our surplus revenues with the States. From the moment that this act was passed, and in contravention of its very terms, the sense of the nation has pronounced it a distribution, and not a deposit act. That fund (or rather so much of it as was deposited) has ceased to belong to the resources of the Federal Government; and he who would treat it as such, subjects himself to the just animadversion of every practical man.

But if, for any purpose, and particularly for revenue purposes, it is unwise and hazardous to involve the States in a condition of indebtedness to the Union, how is the argument strengthened, and the danger increased, when the consideration of that indebtedness is the price of their own domain! Some of the States have already asserted that the proprietary interest of this Government in these lands, and the authority necessarily assumed in consequence thereof, is in derogation of the rights and sovereignty of the States. Such doctrines have been held, I believe, at least in Alabama and Missouri. They have been advocated by prominent members, both upon this floor and in the other branch of Congress. I can regard this amendment in no other light than as an entering wedge for the surrender of all the public domain to the States where it lies. What, sir, are the principles of the contemplated cession? Not, surely, the employment of the States as agents merely of this Government for the sale of the lands, but a transfer to them in their own right, by virtue of a contract of purchase. It was so treated by the Committee on Public Lands at the last session, who were friendly to the measure. The amendment ex vi termini recognises a certain right on the part of the States to control these lands, at least so strong an equity as to render it improper in this Government further to direct their management. How long will it be, after a cession made under such motives and impulses, until the States, habituated to regard these lands in the first instance as their own, shall forget the secondary obligation of yielding sixty-five per cent. of their proceeds to the general Treasury? By this act you weaken, nay, almost destroy, the sanction of the old deeds of cession from the original States, which now cannot be violated without convulsion, and tempt the States to forget a contract which, after the lapse of a little time, shall seem to carry with it no moral obligation. I sum up all, when I say that the success of this measure is the loss of the lands.

I forbear to treat of the objection which other Senators have handled, of the great inequality of this plan among the several States to which the cession is to be made, further than to quote a passage upon that subject from the report of a committee in the Indiana Legislature, made in February last. They say:

"Besides the objections that will be made to this measure by the old States, its gross inequality cannot make it generally acceptable to the new States. The portion allotted to Indiana would be double that of Ohio. Illinois would in like manner quadruple Indiana. Missouri, Arkansas, and Michigan likewise. The result would be, that those States are to have the least benefit who have borne the heat and burden of the day. The settlement of Michigan, Illinois, Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, has been comparatively easy to that of Ohio and Indiana. They have endured no devastating wars, their homes have not been pillaged and destroyed, and their citizens massacred as ours have been; nor have they paid into the national coffers any thing like the sums of money that Ohio and Indiana have done; therefore this measure of Mr. CALHOUN'S, so unequal in all its bearings, cannot be acceptable, especially to Indiana."

To this I will only add, that it is impossible so unequal a system can endure, and in its destruction it is inevitable that the States will stand by the deeds you have given them, stripped of all condition. In such a dilemma, of but little avail will be the defeasance in your deed, or your reversionary interest.

The committee of this body on the public lands of the last session, did not attempt a vindication of this measure upon any ground of economy or right, but base their recommendation upon the equity due to the new States, and upon the impracticability of the subject as a topic of Federal legislation; and, as if doubting the validity of their own argument, they attempt to lessen the importance of the matter by disparaging the fund deemed to be available out of the public domain. I shall not attempt to follow the committee through the intricate process of reasoning, by which they endeavor to show that the present value of all the unsold lands in the nine States upon which this amendment would operate, (being one hundred and sixty millions of acres,) amounts only to the sum of twenty-six millions, four hundred thousand dollars, or about seventeen cents per acre, although it would be difficult to assent to such an estimate. The committee, to determine the extent of the subject, should have looked at that boundless territory which lies west of the States immediately named in the amendment, and which will claim its benefits the moment they are admitted into the Confederacy. It is idle to suppose that their claim can be resisted; nor do I imagine that the advocates of this plan contemplate any other result. The consequence is that Iowa or any of the Territories coming into the Union with 60,000 inhabitants will claim an immediate cession of their lands. The average area of the Western States is 30,000,000 acres; this, divided among 60,000 inhabitants, would be 500 acres to each person, and to each family of six persons three thousand acres. Thirty-five per cent. of this (their proper interest) would give to each such family ten hundred and fifty acres. What an appeal to the cupidity of our Territorial inhabitants! What clamorous demands will it beget on the part of the Territories for premature admission into the Union! What conflicts with your authority! How will the gift turn to poison in their cup and corrupt the legislation of the infant States! If there can be an appliance to tempt the population from the old States into the Territories, the wit of man could not devise a more effectual one than this.

But, sir, it will give rise to other and unusual difficulties. The Federal Government will be backward to extinguish the Indian title within the Territories, when the benefit is to enure to the people of those Territories, so soon as they are organized into States. The uniform policy of the Government has been to extinguish those titles as fast as practicable; but now that the neighboring settlement have rendered Indian lands more valuable, there will be a constant struggle between the Territories and the Metropolitan Government, which shall avoid the costly sacrifice. It has been the boast of our institutions, that amidst the jarring interests of States, the Government has always preserved the most paternal relation towards its provincial appendages, the Territories. Let the plan of cession succeed, and this relation will be broken up, and in its place will be substituted the most cold and bitter rivalry. One of the States named in the amendment (Michigan) has, remaining within her limits, about eight millions of acres of Indian lands. These lands lie adjacent to Lake Superior, and are of little value. You had not many thanks from Michigan when you gave her these lands in lieu of those valuable possessions on the Maumee bay, and her gratitude will scarcely be increased when you require her to pay out of her own coffers for the extinction of the Indian title.

I cannot omit, before concluding my remarks upon this topic, to inquire what would be the condition of Indiana if this cession were accepted. Evidently one of positive loss. There are remaining within the limits of Indiana, including that part of the Miami Reserve, not yet purchased, unsold lands amounting to 5,706,508 acres. From this, deduct the sixteen-h sections reserved for school purposes, and the canal lands, (in all about 651,000 acres,) and there remain 5,055,508 acres. A large part of this is refuse land, which has been in market from twenty to thirty years. The whole cannot be estimated at more than seventy-five cents per acre, making a sum of 3,791,631 dollars. Thirty-five per cent. on this amount is 1,329,070 dollars, which is the gross sum to be retained by the State. Against this sum we have to set off the following amounts:

Gross amount due the Miamies and Pottawatomies by existing treaties, - - -	$255,544
Perpetual annuities under those treaties, $38,070, equal at 5 per cent. to a capital sum of - - -	761,400

Three per cent. fund on nett amount of $3,602,050, is - - -	108,061
Estimate for extinguishing the residue of the Miami title - - -	550,000
Estimate, (by Commissioner of Indian Affairs,) for expenses of emigration of the Miamies, - - -	55,000
Estimate for their subsistence one year, - - -	36,666
Five per cent. estimated expenses of survey and sale, is - - -	189,581
	$1,956,252
Estimate by topographical bureau for completing the Cumberland road in Indiana, - - -	3,144,250
Total, - - -	$5,100,502

So that the State of Indiana, without including the Cumberland road, would be loser by the proposed cession six hundred and twenty-nine thousand one hundred and eighty-two dollars; and, with the loss of the Cumberland road, three millions seven hundred and seventy-three thousand four hundred and thirty-two dollars. The Committee on the Public Lands, in recommending this measure, expressly say that "their report has been drawn up on the supposition that expenditures in the new States by this Government for internal improvements would cease should the bill pass," in which they also include the annual appropriations for improving the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. They credit (by the operation of the bill) the Federal Government, and consequently charge the nine States embraced in the bill, among other things, with the withdrawal from those States of the following appropriations:

Grants and donations of land (except the sixteen sections) - - -	$7,017,540
Improvements on the Mississippi and Ohio rivers and Cumberland road - - -	6,939,274
Five per cent. fund to be surrendered by the States - - -	10,214,263
	$24,171,076

This loss, it is true, they distribute through a period of eighty years, (the length of time computed to be necessary to dispose of the lands,) but the States interested in those improvements would hardly be willing to forego, at so critical a period of their affairs, almost the only hold which they have upon the pecuniary patronage of the Government. In every aspect in which it can be viewed, this plan of conditional cession is full of objections, not to be overcome.

The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, [MR. CRITTENDEN,] proposing a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the several States of the Union, is a renewal of a measure offered nine years ago by another distinguished Senator from the same State, [MR. CLAY,] which twice passed this body and was concurred in by the popular branch, by large majorities, but did not receive the Executive approval. It was then a measure of benefit and of fruitful hope—it is now remedial. When we contemplate the present pecuniary condition of the States, and contrast it with what it probably would have been, had the distribution bill become a law, and when we review the substituted series of measures which for the last nine years have marked the progress of the Government, and their influence upon the policy of the States, it is impossible to suppress our regret at a loss which many years of wise legislation will now scarcely suffice to restore. When the distribution bill of 1832 was negatived by the President, the States were involved in the most trivial amount of debt. At the present time, the President estimates the annual interest upon their debts to be twelve millions of dollars, which, at six per cent. makes a principal debt of two hundred millions. It is easy to trace this ruinous condition of the States to its primary causes, most prominent among which stands the defeat of the distribution bill. At that time, your Treasury, from an abundant commerce, (the fruit of an antecedent wise administration of the Government,) was redundant, and your revenues outran the necessities of the Government. Instead of withdrawing this excess from our exchequer (which would have been effected by giving the proceeds of the lands to the States) the whole of our revenues were removed from their accustomed depository, the Bank of the United States, and placed in the local banks. Instructed by the Secretary of the Treasury, these banks immediately increased their discounts to an unparalleled extent, and flooded the country with currency. Suddenly a wild and infuriate spirit of speculation overran the land. Individuals and States were hurried by an irresistible impulse into the most extravagant enterprises, the sequel of which, on the part of the States, is found in the tale of two hundred millions of debt.

Meanwhile our custom houses continued to pour their flood of revenue into the national coffers, until in 1836 a surplus of more than forty millions had accumulated. As a measure of the highest necessity, this surplus was, by an act of that date, directed to be deposited with the States, the true effect of which was a distribution to the States of the amount paid under the act, about twenty-nine millions. Unfortunately, for want of a supposed competency in Congress to do so, no specific application of this fund was directed. Some of the States invested their portion of the fund for various purposes; others divided the principal sum per capita among their people; but the general effect of the uncontrolled possession of the money was to induce new undertakings by the States, and an increased accumulation of liability. Their resources being thus squandered and exhausted, it was impossible that either the States or the banks could long sustain themselves in such a career, and the revulsion has come with which we are all too familiar to require a recital of it.

Having looked at this uninviting picture, let us for a moment imagine what would have been our condition if the distribution bill of '32 had passed. Having withdrawn from our current revenues so much as proceeded from the lands, the deposite banks would have held no excess. The daily drafts of the Treasury would have employed all our funds, and the banks could not have enlarged their discounts beyond the ordinary wants of commerce. That rash spirit of individual adventure, which, combined in masses, controlled and directed the legislative councils of the country to the same ends, would not have been aroused. The moneys received by the States from the land, were directed by the bill to specific objects. These were to purposes of internal improvement or the payment of debts contracted therefor; of education, and of the colonization of free blacks. This stimulated by no exciting influences, and thus prudentially checked, what monuments would not the States already have built in aid of commerce, what prouder monuments in aid of science and of intellect, unburdened with debt, and endowed with means and capabilities for progressive achievements in these great objects of patriotism and benevolence through an untold series of years!

By a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, made in 1838, it appears that if the land bill of 1832 had passed, the States would have received, up to the 30th of September of that year, the sum of $57,227,230. Of this the share of Ohio would have been $4,557,932; of Indiana, $2,616,744; of Illinois, $1,797,554; of Alabama, $1,965,934; and of New York, $3,190,102. These would have been the sums of money received by those States, in addition to the two per cent. fund accruing to the new States, and to the expenses incident to the sales of the land. In addition to this, Indiana would have received 115,000 acres of land to make her equal with former grants to Ohio, and the other new States their proper proportions to reach the same equality. If the author of the land bill of 1832 deserves what posterity will award him—perpetual remembrance from his country—what must we say of those administrators of our affairs who have entailed upon us that counter policy to which we have adverted, and the fruits of which are now like waters of bitterness in our mouths!

But gentlemen say that this distribution is unconstitutional and in violation of the deeds of cession from the original States.

In opposition to this view, I shall not not detain the Senate to recapitulate at any length an argument which has been so ably maintained, and is so familiar to the country. As to that portion of our territory ceded by the old States, it cannot be denied that Congress holds it in trust, in trust for all the States, old and new, and not for the people of the States. In this respect the proceeds of the land are different from ordinary revenues which are collected from the people, and for their benefit, and not for the use of the States. The States are then partners in this great land fund, and Congress the trustee. There is no principle in law or ethics which prevents a trustee from surrendering at pleasure a trust; and into whose hands can he make the surrender but those of the cestui que trust, the beneficiary of the trust? And here this argument ends; and conclusively. For if, according to the very terms of the deeds of cession, this be a trust for the use of the States, it must of necessity be in their several and corporate capacity. The contrary idea cannot be found in our system. It was the States who surrendered to the Federal Government all the powers contained in our Constitution—the most of these powers in their exercise operate upon the people of the United States, and the duties of the Government enure to their benefit; but here is an exception in the very terms of the charter. I cannot, under our Constitution, conceive the idea which has been expressed by the learned Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN] of States in their aggregate capacity; I can in their Federal capacity; and if in this capacity they were intended to hold their interest in the lands, the deeds would have expressed the tenure to be for the benefit of the "United States" and not "for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, and shall become, members of the Confederation or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions," &c.

Then came the Constitution providing that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," operating without qualification or condition upon territory subsequently acquired; and upon the lands previously acquired, subject to the trusts contained in the deed of cession. No proprietor can be vested with a more absolute mastery over his own estate; and the only limit to the powers of the national Legislature in this respect, is that conscientious obligation which binds it, in the performance of all its duties, to consult the welfare of the people and the States.

Many powers have been exercised by Congress which the Constitution has not delegated in terms. For example, Congress have made investments in State stocks—they have remitted duties to railroad companies and other associations, to supply which other classes must be taxed—they have given five per cent. of the lands to the new States, and grants of land—they have granted pensions and bounties to individuals—they have purchased territory beyond the limits of the treaty of 1783, and formed out of it confederate States; and they have made scientific explorations. Not one of these but is of more equivocal authority than the cession of the proceeds of the lands to all the States.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] is indignant at a proposition which he says is to withdraw four millions of annual revenue to be supplied by additional duties upon imports. If it be such an outrage to divert this four millions, (the annual proceeds of the lands,) from our exchequer, into the treasuries of the several States, how much more severely do we wound the Constitution if we annihilate these proceeds altogether, and dry up this source of revenue? And yet, sir, the late President has made this very recommendation. In his annual message of December, 1832, General Jackson says: "It seems to me to be our true policy that the public lands shall cease as soon as practicable to be a source of revenue," and he proceeds to recommend such a disposition of them as shall barely reimburse expenses. This was the very session after the land bill had been first introduced, and had passed this body; and yet the Senator from Missouri now condemns it as an affirmation of the very principle sustained by General Jackson.

For myself, sir, I subscribe to the doctrine that the lands ought not to be a source of ordinary Federal revenue. In their management, so many questions of State policy, of jarring interests, and of patriotic accommodation are mingled, that they furnish too uncertain a reliance; and the competency of this Government to realize from imposts all that is necessary for its economical administration, blended with high interests so immediately connected with the system of impost duties, plainly indicate another and a better direction for the land fund.

That direction, sir, is given in the amendment under consideration, and it is demanded by a force and demonstration of authority which the people have rarely exerted upon their legislative functionaries. We cannot, if we would, shut our eyes to the condition of the States. Laboring under mountains of debt, I will not say that the burden of interest will, in a year or two, become insupportable, and that their faith will be dishonored, because I believe they will sustain their honor at any sacrifice. My own State (Indiana) is largely a debtor State, but during the suspension of 1837 she was one of only two States, I believe, in the Union, who met her engagements in specie; and she will continue to do so. But a few days ago I saw a notice from her Fund Commissioner, of his readiness to pay her present January instalment of interest.

[Here Mr. CLAY of Kentucky inquired whether the State of Indiana had resorted to new loans for the payment of interest.]

Mr. WHITE proceeded. Indiana has not piled Pelion upon Ossa. She may, for the time, have appropriated some domestic funds for that purpose, and has been aided by her bank.

But what will be the condition of the States when their vast amount of principal falls due from 1845 to 1865! A worse blight cannot fall upon the prosperity of the States than a large and permanent debt. Our policy in that respect is essentially different from that of England. We could not survive such a debt as the British nation owes to its own subjects. The debt of Great Britain is equivalent, for the purposes of sustaining population, to an enlargement of her empire. Men live upon stocks there as they live upon land here. It is the garnered and the hoarded wealth of ages deposited with the Government, and the income of the owners is guaranteed by the industry of her millions of artificers, whose laboratories are the workshops of the world, and by the taxes which she draws from the commerce of all nations. In this country, capital finds other and better employment in the improvement of the land. While England was an agricultural country, she had no public debt. After the balance of power had been adjusted in Europe, and the commercial era commenced, the British debt was contracted. Expensive wars and the establishment of a colonial system have been necessary to maintain that commerce, and her debt has been rapidly accumulating. So soon as she shall have established her commerce beyond the competition of the world, there will be an end of her debt. Until our territory becomes too thickly populated to sustain the inhabitants, a public debt will prove a national calamity.

Now, sir, it is in the power of this Government, without in the least impoverishing itself or transcending its proper sphere of action, to allot this rich domain of a thousand millions of acres to the States, and thus to relieve our people from interminable and hereditary taxes. Shall we abuse, by vile inaction, this capacity to do good, and incur the execration of our constituents? Is this confederated Government a mere machine to run in an endless circle of inanity? Are we forever to be settling first principles which, like the blighted flowers of early spring, shall yield no fruit? Has the Constitution no vitality, and is our theory of government a mere abstraction? In ordinary times, sir, we may sit here in cold deliberation, holding to the people the doctrine "that they expect too much from the Government," and escape under that generous forbearance which accompanies a state of prosperity; but in such an exigency as the present, other and sterner duties invite us to action. Salus populi suprema lex, and let him abide the consequences who will not come to the rescue. What is our Union, when the States are ruined—our Confederation, when its links are broken? Strike out the stars from our national banner, and it is nothing but a piece of bunting. Sir, the distribution policy will control the next Presidential election. No, I mistake. Before that time, under different counsels, and another Administration, this measure of safety and of beneficence will have passed; the flag of the Union will no longer prove a barren sceptre, and the triumphs of the Constitution will have been proclaimed.

Senators have chosen, in the progress of this debate, to deride the principles upon which that Administration has been brought into power. They mistake the type for the event, and suppose that a phrenzied majority will erect a log cabin upon the ruins of the Capitol. We rejoice, not, sir, that the log cabin has been brought to Washington, but that power has been transferred to the log cabin—that the Capitol has been removed to the country—that the people have exercised that residuary sovereignty which was always their own, and which heretofore has been suffered only to sleep—that, however the "divine right" of rule may instal itself in the Tuilleries, in Buckingham Palace, or in the Kremlin, in this country its appropriate residence is in the thatched cottage of the American citizen. Let gentlemen cavil at the watchwords of freemen! "Tippecanoe" is now another name for liberty, and henceforward, in every struggle for human rights, and every contest between the ruler and the ruled, to the hopes of the patriot deliverance shall come from the wilderness, and the star of the West is the sign by which he shall conquer.

Montesquieu says that "the fine system of British Government was invented in the woods." For the first time in our history, the territory North-west of the Ohio river has given a President to the Union—one connected with all the labors, with all the experience, with all the glories of our mighty provincial settlements. It would be strange if, under his administration, that social and political development which he so happily began in the valley of the Mississippi should not be urged onward until that great region has reached the destiny for which the Almighty designed it—part and parcel with the Atlantic States of one great confederated empire—borrowing from the old "Thirteen" the glories of the Revolutionary era, the last great drama of which was acted West of the mountains, and imparting to the mother States, through every vicissitude of their future history, that vigor and purity which we trust shall forever reside in the peaceful agricultural valleys of the West.

SPEECH OF MR. BENTON,

OF MISSOURI,

In Senate, Thursday, January 22, 1841.—In reply to Mr. WEBSTER's remarks on the Pre-emption bill.

Mr. BENTON said he had listened attentively to the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] in favor of the constitutional power of Congress to pass the land revenue distribution bill, now so unseasonably, and so perseveringly pressed upon the attention of the Senate. He had listened to it attentively; and in hearing all the argument which that Senator had delivered, condensed, and concentrated as it was, he believed he had heard all that could be said on that point. It was the sum and substance of all that he had heard before, either in this chamber, or out of it. And what was it? Nothing more nor less than a reference of our power to the deeds of cession, and a derivation of our whole right to make this distribution, from the terms and conditions of these deeds. He does not pretend to derive a particle of power to pass this bill except from those deeds—he refers to nothing else. Now, sir, what are the deeds, and what is the bill? What does one grant, and the other cover? The deeds are limited to the original boundaries of the United States—the Mississippi on the west, and the parallel of 31 degrees on the south; the bill extends to the Pacific ocean west and to the Gulf of Mexico south! Such is the difference—the wide difference—between them. If the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts was valid as far as it went, (which in fact it is not,) it would not answer his purpose; it would not cover the subject—it would not cover the bill—no more cover it than an inch square of carpet would cover the ample area of this chamber. The argument reaches no land but the fragments and refuse to be found in a few Western States—the leavings after ten, twenty, thirty, and forty years of sales in Mississippi, Alabama, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan. This is all that the argument reaches. The bill, on the contrary, extends to all Florida, as it stood with its ancient limits, extending from the Atlantic to the Mississippi; and it extends to all Louisiana, in its greatest conceivable extent, stretching from the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean. Such is the difference between the argument and the bill—such the immeasurable distance between the argument and the subject. If the argument was good as far as it went—if the deeds of cession actually conferred authority to divide among the States the money received for the lands which they conveyed—still it would be worth nothing; for the bill is not limited to the money so received. It is not limited to the lands mentioned in the cession acts; and if it was, no one would trouble himself about it. The revenue to be received from those lands is too insignificant, too inconsiderable, too contemptible, to be worth the trouble of distribution. It is not to these fragments and leavings that the distribution party look. They look to the rich mine beyond the Mississippi—to the vast and fresh domain of the ancient Louisiana, spreading from the western bank of the Father of Floods to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, and thence to the shore of the Pacific. It is this to which the distribution party look—it is this to which their bill extends; and having no title to this, not a word to say in favor of any right to touch it, the alternative seems to be to say nothing about it! to eschew the argument in toto; to quote the deeds of cession, which have no relation to Florida or Louisiana; and then rely upon those deeds, and our ignorance, to pass an argument which has no foundation! This seems to be the resource of the whole distribution party, both on this floor and elsewhere, and the Senator from Massachusetts has not been able to add an iota to what we have heard before.

Mr. B. said that he intended to bring this argument to a practical test at a proper time—at the time when the details of the distribution bill shall be under consideration. He should then move to limit the distribution to the lands ceded by the States; and if that proposition prevailed, there would be an end of the matter; for there would be nothing to divide, and no one would care to press the matter. In using the word cession, in speaking of the cession acts, and cession deeds, Mr. B. said, that he by no means admitted that any land had been ceded, or conveyed by those acts to the Federal Government. They ceded nothing but a right of purchase from the Indians, and every acre of this land which had come into the possession of the Federal Government, came by purchase from the Indians—came by Indian treaties, and not by State deeds—by paying money for them, and not by gratuitous donation.

Mr. B. said, that another argument, not of constitutionality, or even expediency, but of pity, was brought to bear in favor of this policy. It was the distress of the States! The States were said to be in debt—to be in distress—to need relief; and the Federal Government is called upon to give it. This was new and alarming doctrine to him; it was new and portentous; and wholly foreign to the objects of the Union, and big with fatal results, either to the States themselves, or to the Federal Government. From temporary relief, either the Federal Government must go on to grant permanent supplies, and thus become the master of the States; or the States, from humble petitioners, must become authoritative claimants; must eventually demand as a right what they asked as a favor, and end with mastering the Federal Government by stripping it of all its supplies. Consolidation of the States is on one hand; the dissolution of the Union is on the other. No one can foresee which danger is to prevail; but all can foresee that the equilibrium between the States and the Federal Government is destroyed from the moment that they have a common Treasury—from the moment they look to the same chest—and either party, no matter which, holds the keys of that chest. From that moment the equilibrium established by our Constitution is destroyed, and one of the parties must become the master of the other.

Mr. President, continued Mr. B. I deprecate this scene—the apparition of the States at the bar of the Federal Government, in the character of distressed petitioners, praying for relief. I regret to see it. I was bred in the political school of Nathaniel Macon, of John Randolph, and of other fathers of the Republic, who were still on the stage of action when I entered upon it twenty years ago; and from them I learnt that if the Federal Government avoided debt, contented itself with light taxes, preserved peace abroad, and kept open the channels of commerce, it was doing its part, and the States and the people would do the rest. This is what I was accustomed to hear from these patriots and sages; and, tried by these principles, how stands the question of misgovernment or misrule between the States and the Federal Government? How stands this question? Certainly more honorable to the Government than ever stood such a question between a Government and a people. In point of debt, there is nothing—nothing in the shape or form of national debt; for a few millions of outstanding Treasury notes, to be paid as due out of current revenue, can form no exception to the proud declaration that we have no national debt. In point of federal taxes, we may be said to be almost free from them. Not a particle of direct, or internal tax, exists by a law of the Federal Government. The duties on imported goods, since the extinction of the late national debt, have gone down to a light and moderate amount. But few articles are now taxed high; the one-half are not taxed at all! Yes, the one-half of the whole of our foreign imports are now free of duty—an advantage which no other nation on earth possesses, and which we only have enjoyed since the glorious administration of General Jackson. As to peace, we have it with all the world. Our temple of Janus is shut; for all the nations of the earth are at peace with our country, and freedom of intercourse existing between them. Commerce was never more safe—was never so extended as it is at present. Not only all the old channels of trade are open, but many new ones have been explored. Our enterprising merchants now go in safety to places whose very names were unknown to their fathers—to the antipodes, and to the poles—and no doubt at this instant, while I stand here speaking, there are American merchants on the opposite side of our world, separated from us by the entire diameter of this globe; and all pursuing their remote trade in safety, freedom, and peace. Thus stands the question of misgovernment and misrule between the Federal Government and the States. It has done its part, and nobly done its part by them—freed them from a national debt—touched them lightly with taxes—preserved peace for them abroad—kept open all the channels of commerce, and given to every citizen, at home and abroad, a clear stage and fair play for the exercise of his talent and the pursuit of his business. This is fulfilling the object of its creation, doing what it was created to do, according to the doctrines of the school in which I was bred. To go beyond this—to become the patron of the States, their treasurer, or their almoner—to undertake to relieve their distresses by doling out money to them from the general coffers—to do this, is to do an act for which the Federal Government was never created, and which cannot be commenced without being continued, and leading to consequences fatal to the independence of one of the parties.

No, sir, the Federal Government has done its part—has done all that it ought to do for the prosperity of the States, except in one particular; and that is in not having subdued the revolt of the political and insolvent part of the banks. In the month of May, 1837—two months after Mr. Van Buren's administration commenced—the banks stopped payment; and, leaving out the large deposit banks which were forced into the measure by the distribution process, and the weaker banks which could not resist a general movement; leaving out these, and the suspension of 1837 was a revolt against the Democratic Administration, and the result of a conspiracy as regularly contrived as any conspiracy has been since the days of Catiline. This conspiracy was hatched in the Bank of the United States, and headed by its managers and its political confederates. Public opinion, and the conduct of the New York banks, prevented the permanent insurrection which was intended—drove the insurgent institutions into temporary submission to the laws, to be followed in 1839 by another revolt which continued, as the first was designed to continue, until the Presidential election was over. The Federal Government did not put down these revolts; it did not reduce these insurgent corporations to subordination to the laws. In that, and in that only, has it failed in its duty to the States. But where was the failure? Not in the Federal head—not in the representative of the Union—not in the President. Mr. Van Buren discharged his duty—nobly—patriotically—wisely—firmly—courageously, discharged it. He recommended the remedy; the constitutional, the adequate, the prompt remedy: he recommended the application of a bankrupt law to bankrupt banks; and if it had been applied when recommended, the second suspension would not have occurred. The Bank of the United States would have been wound up in 1839; and the distress and derangement of business, so injurious to the country, and so beneficial to the bank party during the election of 1840, would have been prevented. The Federal Executive recommended this only measure which was wanting to the public prosperity; Congress refused to pass it; and thus, the only failure of the Government to do its duty was occasioned by the representatives of the States themselves.

Mr. B. deprecated the temper of the times, and the general disposition which now existed to look to the Federal Government for relief from distress, and for favors and privileges of every kind. This spirit began to be engendered above twenty years ago, when protective tariffs, pension lists, a National Bank, internal improvements, and so many schemes to employ persons, and to expend money, occupied the debates and the legislation of Congress. People were seduced from their proper pursuits, and as good as called upon to come to the Federal Government for office, for money, for special legislation, for contracts, and for jobs and favors which were to enable them to live and enrich themselves without labor or economy. This spirit, begun then under the stimulus and the action of Congressional debate and legislation, has been going on ever since, until it pervades and absorbs the community. First individuals, then classes, now States. Congress is importuned now by more than 10,000 claims on our files, some of them rejected for twenty, thirty, forty years; but still pressed upon us, and expected to be passed by dint of importunity. Forty thousand pensioners still swell our pension list. Armies of men, even young men, boys with down on their chins, come here for office. Petitions for protective duties are coming in. Individuals of all ages and sexes, and classes of all kinds except the laborer and the farmer, come here for special legislation. We have seen all this, and now, portentously rising above all the rest, and with power to command what they ask, appear the States! The indebted States are now appearing at our bar—coming here for relief—for money from the general coffers to pay their individual debts. They have had twenty-seven millions from the Federal Treasury. It was a fatal gift—scarcely touched before it was gone, and the incentive to demand more. They now ask for a limited land distribution bill. They will take it in defiance of the Constitution and across its grave. Soon an unlimited land distribution bill will be demanded; and, if the golden eggs are laid too slowly, then kill the goose! divide all the lands at once; and when they are gone, have recourse to the custom house; when that is emptied, the credit and the security of the Federal Government must come into requisition. There is no rule to go by, nor any barriers to arrest the onward course. The barrier of the Constitution being prostrated in the passage of the first land distribution act, there is an end to further resistance.

Mr. B. inveighed earnestly against the thirst for office and for spoil, which was spreading and extending in our country, and giving to our party contests a savage and ferocious character. He attributed the bitterness of our election contests, in a great degree, to the personal interest which so many took in them. Office—money—special legislation—privileges and monopolies—were the pursuit of myriads, and the exciting cause of their zeal and fury in elections. The public good required this spirit to be checked; it required the public mind to be turned in a different direction—to self-exertion—to the pursuits of industry, and the practice of economy—and made to find in these resources the true road to independence of mind and character as well as to independence of fortune. Too much had been done by Congress to give the public mind the wrong direction—to bring individuals, classes, and corporations, to the Federal Government for support and relief. Too much of this work has been done already; and if the States are now to be added to the list, and are to come to this same fountain of supply for relief from distress, where is the end of such a perversion of all the objects of the confederation, but in the consolidation of the States, or the dissolution of the Union?

SPEECH OF MR. SHEPARD, OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, December, 1840—

On the motion of Mr. GIDDINGS, of Ohio, to reconsider the "Navy Pension Bill."

MR. SPEAKER: I am aware that the task which I have undertaken is an unpopular one; he, who endeavors to lop off patronage, will excite the hostility of those who receive its benefits, and must expect opposition from that party, whose doctrine is to strengthen this Government by creating a dependence of particular classes and interests. But having been placed on the Committee of Naval Affairs, I must do what I consider proper, at the risk of incurring enmity, or I must be faithless to the trust, and inflict a wound on my own conscience. Without the slightest hesitation, the former course will be firmly taken.

The motion to reconsider the bill, which passed this House two days ago, is advocated on several grounds. The member from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] thinks that my amendment, which became the 2d section of the bill, was out of order, and he has been pleased to insinuate that there was something unfair or tricky in the proceeding. You will remember, sir, that I inquired of the Chair if the amendment were in order. I did not seize a sly opportunity to thrust it on the House, when my opponents were absent, and the decision being favorable, I have the protection of your shield in differing from the honorable gentleman. He is doubtless well skilled in the law of Parliament; and when he occupied your seat on a celebrated occasion, we were all charmed with the correctness of his opinions, as well as the dignity of his conduct. But, sir, the 2d section was in order, because it related to the same subject as the 1st; heretofore naval pensions have been paid out of a specific fund, and now when we are asked to make a draft on the Treasury for that purpose, the natural inquiry is what has become of the money, set aside by Congress, forty years ago, to meet the just demands of gallant officers and sailors? The act of 1837 has destroyed that fund, and in a bill intended to supply the deficiency it is certainly proper to remedy the evil, and to kill the insect which has eaten up the substance. If, however, we are wrong, it is too late to make this objection; it is a naked technicality, not favored by the rules of Parliament, and should be taken advantage of at the proper time, whilst a motion to reconsider ought not to prevail except on general merits.

The member from Massachusetts also asserts that the amendment was hastily introduced, and adopted without due consideration. Who else is of this opinion? Another gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. REED] And who joins the worthy couple in this complaint? A third member from Massachusetts, [Mr. SALTONSTALL.] If a youthful tyro had asked for time to think, to consult and examine documents, it would not have been surprising, but when "grave and reverend seniors" request delay in order to deliberate, one is tempted to smile. These honorable gentlemen are acquainted with all the laws relating to this subject—with them the pension system is a bantering that attracts peculiar care—and if fifty years were allowed, a hundred more would be asked before they reached what I consider a just conclusion. But to propose the repeal of the act of 1837 is no new thing; if I am not mistaken, Mr. Dickerson and Mr. Paulding agree with me in opinion, and at the last session a bill passed the Senate, embracing a provision of this kind, but was smothered in this House under a mass of business. So that this subject has attracted the attention of Congress for some time.

How was the act of '37 passed? It was not discussed, the yeas and nays were not taken on its passage, no man is bold enough to claim its paternity, and it may be said with truth that it sneaked through this Hall quietly and unnoticed on the last night of the session. Where was the member from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS]? He is a sleepless dragon over the Treasury, when a political opponent is to be assailed, and why did he not in '37 cry against the hasty outrage that was about to be perpetrated? Where was the other gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. REED]? He was a member of the Committee of Naval Affairs, and ought to know something of this extraordinary measure.

The honorable member states that a portion of the fund had been given to Mrs. Decatur by a special act, and therefore it was thought reasonable to invite other widows and orphans to partake of what had been sacredly devoted to a different purpose. This is admirable logic, and might have prevailed with Congress, though the gentleman made no speech to this effect, nor did he object to haste on the night of the 31 March, 1837. It is therefore wise and proper to make an irruption into the Treasury, when the sentinel is asleep, or when good humor and kindly feeling have banished suspicion; but when the enormity is discovered, we are asked not to turn out the intruders with precipitation, but to act cautiously, to consult with each other, to debate, lest harm should come to the unfortunate persons, who have exhibited so striking a fondness for other people's property. Sir, this act was passed stealthily, and should be repealed without ceremony.

The member from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] further stated that my amendment was in conflict with the original bill. The first section, quoth the gentleman, provides for the payment of pensions, and the second repeals the law which grants them—so that the bill is made up of inconsistent enactments. If the law of 1837 were the only one that gave pensions, the reasoning would be conclusive; but the honorable member forgot to mention that pensions were due under that of 1800 and perhaps others; should the appropriation of the first section be more than sufficient to carry into effect the old laws of the country, the remainder will be safely kept in the Treasury as an unexpended balance. I hope that the patriotic anxiety of the gentleman will be relieved by this explanation.

The same member proceeded to say that I had misstated the act of 1837, and thereby led honorable gentlemen into an error—he was also charitable enough to proclaim that I had not read a law which I wished to repeal. This is one of those random assertions, for which the distinguished member is remarkable, and to prove its gross injustice, I refer to the Intelligencer of this morning which contains my remarks of Monday. That journal reports me to have said that the law of 1837 "provided that these naval pensions were to be paid, not to those who had suffered in the service and defence of the country, but to the widows and children of those who might, at any previous time, have died in the service, whether they had suffered or not. And it also provided that, when pensions were thus paid to invalids, or persons who had incurred disability, the pension should be reckoned back to the date of the disability, as well as forward from the date of the act." This is what I said then and what I now repeat: those who refer to the act as published, will find it substantially, if not literally quoted.

Mr. Speaker, I have been particular with these matters, in order to avoid the making of irrelevant issues. I wish the House to decide this question according to its real merits, and, having cleared away the dust and smoke, that might have blinded our eyes, I shall endeavor to take a rapid view of the whole ground of controversy.

In the year 1800 an act was passed for the "better government of the navy of the United States," the 8th and 9th sections of which were as follows: "Every officer, seaman, and marine, disabled in the line of his duty, shall be entitled to receive, for life, or during his disability, a pension from the United States, according to the nature and degree of his disability, not exceeding one-half his monthly pay," and "all money accruing, or which has already accrued, to the United States from the sale of prizes, shall be and remain forever a fund for the payment of pensions and half-pay, should the same be hereafter granted, to the officers and seamen who may be entitled to receive the same: and if the said fund shall be insufficient for the purpose, the public faith is hereby pledged to make up the deficiency: but if it should be more than sufficient, the surplus shall be applied for the making of further provision for the comfort of the disabled officers, seamen and marines, and for such as, though not disabled, may merit by their bravery, or long and faithful services, the gratitude of their country." Thus in the pure days of the Government the corner-stone of the pension system was laid, a fund was established to accomplish the benevolent object, and the great principle was declared which should regulate its disposal.

At that time the country was new and thinly settled; it presented to industry the most flattering rewards, and it was difficult to draw our people from the walks of domestic life. Patriotism is a strong feeling, but cannot be relied on except under the pressure of circumstances; love of glory will stimulate the most intellectual, but it has little influence over the great mass of mankind. It was, therefore, wise in the Congress of 1800, to hold out strong inducements to the ambitious and enterprising; they who serve the nation faithfully, should be treated with distinction, and granted every comfort, consistent with our means and their own efficiency. And yet, sir, we may err on this side; the popular mind is apt to be dazzled by military display—if a man goes into an Indian fight he is thought worthy of a seat on this floor, and if he runs away and robs a fellow-soldier of his laurels, he is fit for the Presidency—so that there is no need of legislation to exalt the profession of arms. But this law was equally free from niggardiness and false sentiment; it conferred no sinecures, whilst it encouraged the navy to the gallant performance of its duty. If an "officer, seaman, or marine," be "disabled in the line of his duty," a pension is awarded to him; injury received in the service is the title to public bounty, and if misfortune comes to the brave and zealous, it is in some degree alleviated by the country's gratitude. The whole nation approves of this policy. To turn adrift on the world those who have become unfit for other employment by their devotion to us, would be inexpedient as well as dishonorable; and, without regard to the financial condition of the Government, Congress provided means to cheer and sustain the unfortunate men who might suffer in defence of our flag. The United States gave up all claim to prizes which should be made by vessels of war; half of the money accruing from this source belonged to the captors, and the other half was to "be and remain forever a fund for the payment of pensions," for "the making further provision for the comfort of disabled officers," &c. or "such as, though not disabled, may merit by their bravery," &c. You will observe, sir, that pensions were not promised to every body who came within sight of the ocean, or who might possess a commission from the President, and that our faith was pledged to keep the prize money a sacred deposit for the use of those who were so particularly described. Such was the spirit of the act of 1800; an act that passed before selfishness and injustice predominated in our councils. Let us now examine the laws which have been subsequently passed. In 1813, pensions for five years, payable out of this fund, were granted to "the widows, and, if no widows, to the children under sixteen years old, of officers who shall be killed, or die by reason of wounds received in the line of duty." This was the first departure from the act of 1800; and, admitting the propriety of giving the public money to widows and children, whether the officer possessed extraordinary merit or not, and without proof that the assistance of Government was needed, there can be no doubt that the promise of Congress was violated by thus using the navy pension fund. In 1814, the provisions of this last act were extended to the "widows and children of seamen and marines"—in 1816, pensions were granted to those who were wounded at Dartmoor prison, or "the widows and children of such as were killed there." Afterwards, at different periods, the acts of 1813 and 1814 were renewed, and in 1834 a law was passed granting pensions to the "widows of officers, seamen, and marines" who may die from "casualties, disease contracted, or injuries received in the line of duty," and directing that the pension "shall commence from the passage of the act" though the husband may still be living, and receiving his regular pay. Thus inroads were gradually made on the fund, and its original object was forgotten; yet the interest was more than sufficient to meet these demands, and the principal amounted to upwards of a million of dollars at the close of the year 1836.

The law of 1837, which my amendment repeals, was then passed, and a new doctrine was slipped into the statute-book; it gave pensions to the widows, and, if no widows, to the children of officers, seamen, and marines, "who have died or may hereafter die in the naval service." However unjust and impolitic previous acts had been, they were not complained of, because the benefit accrued to the relatives of such as "were killed, or died by reason of wounds received in the line of duty"—but now if a sailor should die from an ordinary disease, or the constitution of an officer be broken down by dissipation, their widows and children are entitled to the same pensions as those of the men who fall in battle. Hundreds, therefore, rushed upon the pension fund, and we need not be surprised that it has been nearly consumed; in 1836 the annual charge was $58,009, in 1838 it reached to $103,120 33, and in six months—from March to September, 1837—the retrospective operation of the law took $329,615 from the Treasury.

It is true that something has been lost by the depreciation of State stocks; but in what should the investment have been made? We have heard a great noise about the attack on State credit, and now the Administration is assailed because it showed confidence in the integrity of the States. But this is a small matter; the act of 1837 has done the mischief, and the question is, shall it be repealed, or shall it be permitted to eat up the remainder of the fund, and finally be settled on the general Treasury? I understand that the American army is more liberally paid than that of England, excepting officers of the highest grade. If, however, it can be shown that officers or men receive less than the corresponding classes of civil life, their compensation should be increased. The eagerness of young men to enter the service is strong proof that the country has been generous to its defenders; at an age, when other lads are a burden to their families, the midshipman receives pay, adequate to his wants, is educated at the public expense, visits the most interesting portions of the globe, and the button that he wears confers other advantages of no ordinary kind. Promotion is slow in time of peace; but, if he will observe the many who have failed in the learned professions, or have been wrecked by the whirlwinds of commerce, the naval officer has reason to be content with the snug birth, of which he cannot be deprived. Sir, I am a friend to the navy; honorable gentlemen shall not monopolize its guardianship, and assume that the repeal of this law would be hostile to its interests. This great establishment should occupy a high position—it is destined to be the right arm of our safety—and I repeat that ample pay should be given, the highest reward conferred on skill and bravery, and substantial kindness on suffering and misfortune. But a high minded man scorns to be an alms-taking pensioner, when nothing has been achieved for the nation, and no injury has been sustained in its service. This act of '37 makes no distinction between merit and worthlessness—the brave man's widow receives no more than the coward's relatives—and the drone or the drunkard is allowed to leave a charge on that country which he has disgraced. A friend informs me of a common trick that is played at the eastward; an old sailor, that is worn out in the merchant service, and feels that he cannot last for a long time, enlists on board of a national ship, and in a few months his widow and children receive a pension from the Government. Such a system will bring the navy into contempt, and the people will distrust its patriotism; but if the public bounty be judiciously administered, not a murmur will be heard, and the nation will bear with pleasure the burden on its gratitude.

The member from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] thinks that the act of '37 made a contract, which we are bound to fulfil. An obligation, sir, implies that something is given or done on both sides, and as the gentleman sometimes quotes Blackstone, it is odd that he overlooked the great lawyer on the present occasion. The law of 1800 was undoubtedly a contract, because it was passed at an early period, and may have induced many to hazard their lives in the service; it also embraced the condition of "wounds," "disability," and extraordinary gallantry, which must be complied with before its advantages could be partaken. But the country is not indebted to these who receive pensions under the act of 1837; the husband or father enlisted voluntarily, was paid well, treated kindly, and there is not the slightest evidence of great suffering or uncommon exertions. Does the gentleman contend that pensioners have a vested interest in our liberality? This doctrine would be scouted in Great Britain, the land of pensions and sinecures; if I do not err, a pension was withdrawn from the poet Coleridge, and though such an instance may be regretted, it strengthens my position.

The other two members from Massachusetts [Messrs. REED and SALTONSTALL] have almost shed tears, when speaking of the disappointment which this bill would bring to the widow and the orphan; I admire the generosity of these honorable gentlemen, and would imitate their example on a proper occasion, but I cannot indulge private feeling at the expense of a great principle. My objection, however, to the law of '37, does not arise from its own intrinsic consequence, for the Government could easily pay this draft on its Treasury; a disposition is gaining ground among certain classes of the people to live out of the public granary, and it must be checked or private morals and just legislation will be entirely subverted. This feeling has existed in all countries, and making alliance with tyrants or mobs, according to circumstances, it has had a powerful influence over the internal affairs of nations. Here, it is in close intimacy with the disinterested wish of a few stockjobbers to control the currency, and the still more honest desire of taxing one man's industry for the benefit of another; and yet, sir, all these things are advocated for great national purposes. The tyrant has a plea for his atrocities, and legislative corruption will always be provided with a decent pretence; the meanest creature that walks the street endeavors to conceal her degradation with gaudy clothing, and it is easy to dignify an abstraction of the public money with the name of charity or national benevolence.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, let me notice an expression which fell from the honorable member from Massachusetts. Yesterday, when speaking on this subject, he used the word "dishonorable." I do not suppose that this term was applied to me, but a friend intimates that he understood the gentleman to refer to the course which I have pursued.

[Here Mr. ADAMS, with great animation, denied that such a reference was made, and hoped that Mr. S. would treat ear-wigs as they deserved.]

Sir, the honorable member need not have been so hasty. I had no intention of retorting. My humble character can be left with safety to those who know me on this floor, and to the country, which will ultimately do justice to all her servants. I have often listened to the honorable member with the deepest indignation—he has frequently indulged in severe animadversions on the people whom I partly represent, and the institutions under which I was born—yet, sir, I have abstained from using the poisoned arrows which he delights to throw. Were I able to contend with a gentleman of such wit and knowledge, respect for age and services forbids the treatment that his behavior merits. When I compare what the honorable gentleman is to what he might be, it is a source of mortification. Inheriting the blood of a genuine patriot, having passed through all the offices of trust known to the Constitution, and possessing a vigorous intellect, he might become the father and the idol of this House. When younger men, in the ardor of debate, lay aside the courtesies of gentlemen, and rush into the conflict as if we were engaged in a personal warfare, the member from Massachusetts might curb the wild spirit of faction, and save us from many scenes of disgrace. Sir, he might do more. The different States of this great Confederacy sometimes think that they are unjustly dealt with by their sisters—the North taunts the South with slavery, the South writhes under burdens imposed for local purposes, the East accuses the West of taking the lion's share of the national property; the West calls the "Old Thirteen" a cruel stepmother, and so great is the strife that the most sanguine occasionally despair of the Republic. Kind words, conciliatory feeling, and just legislation, would throw oil on the troubled waves of discord, and who could be so fit a mediator as one that, having reached the highest round of human ambition, would now delight to promote the happiness of his country; and, constituting the link between Washington and the present generation, could bring to us the warning words and patriotic exhortations that fell from his almost inspired lips? Did the member pursue such a course, his earlier honors would fade away before a newer and brighter glory; and, what is still dearer to a pure heart, he would enjoy the grateful affection of millions of freemen.

But, sir, I have no right to lecture the honorable gentleman, and I ask pardon of the House for giving vent to my feelings.

SPEECH OF MR. CLAY, OF ALABAMA,

IN SENATE, MONDAY, JANUARY 15, 1840.

THE bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, being the special order of the day, was taken up, the question being on the proposition of Mr. CRITTENDEN to recommend the bill, with instructions to report a bill to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, which Mr. CALHOUN offered to amend, by substituting a bill to cede the public lands to the States in which they lie, upon certain conditions.

Mr. CLAY addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: It is with unfeigned reluctance that I again throw myself on the indulgence of the Senate, to participate further in this discussion. Had the debate been confined to the bill, as originally introduced, or as it has been amended, I should have been content with the few brief remarks submitted by me in its commencement. But, sir, it has been made to assume a far broader latitude, by the motion for recommitment made by the Senator from Kentucky, and the amendatory motion of the Senator from South Carolina. It now involves, not merely the question, whether we shall grant the right of pre-emption, to the limited extent of 160 acres of land, to the actual settler and cultivator of the soil, but whether we shall distribute among the several States the entire revenue arising from the sales of the public lands, amounting, as I shall hereafter show, to a probable average of some $5,000,000 annually, and lay taxes, or borrow money, to make up the deficiency, with all the incidental questions of power and policy; or whether we shall sell to the States that portion of the public domain lying within their limits, for an adequate consideration, and on safe conditions, and thereby settle definitively the multifarious and perplexing questions of controversy concerning them which present themselves, and occupy our time and attention, at each successive session of Congress.

I am aware that the discussion now belongs, more especially, to the two propositions of the Senators from Kentucky and from South Carolina; they have, however, intimate connection with the original bill; and before I proceed further, I must submit a few remarks in reply to some of the objections which have been urged by its opponents.

The quarter from which this opposition comes, Mr. President, may well excite the surprise of some, and is not entirely unworthy of notice. It is from the opponents of this Administration, and the friends of that which is shortly to take its place. Although in my opening remarks, it will be recollected, I extended to those gentlemen the courtesy of supposing they intended to carry out their late professions in practice, I must confess my faith in the sincerity of those professions, as well as in many others made by them in the late canvass, was not very strong. I had too often witnessed here, and in the other House, while a member, their very decided and inflexible opposition to this and all kindred measures, to use no stronger expressions, to justify me in feeling much surprise at the course they have thought proper to pursue on this occasion.

But, sir, what must be the astonishment and disappointment of the numerous, meritorious, plain, and unsophisticated class of citizens, whose interests are sought to be protected and advanced by this measure, when they see the very men who were, but the other day, loudest in their professions of ardent attachment, and devotion to their welfare and interests, now its most uncompromising opponents, and seeking to defeat it wholly, or to so clog and embarrass it with amendments as entirely to destroy its usefulness? I know an attempt somewhat ingenious has been made by one of the gentlemen on the other side [Mr. CRITTENDEN] to explain away this apparent contradiction between present acts and former professions; but, sir, it will not do. Their professions and emblems must, and will, be construed according to ordinary rules of common sense. Did not the Opposition, with one voice, charge the present Administration and its friends with hostility to all the great interests of the country? With having destroyed the currency, and produced the existing scarcity of money? With having reduced the price of property and produce, and the laborers' hire? With having warred against the interests of the farmer, the mechanic, and the workingman, as well as those of the merchants and manufacturers? We all know they did—and amongst the emblems of their feelings, their principles and their policy, were log cabins and their appendages.

Such was their devotion to log cabins, Mr. President, that they were not content with building them in almost every city, village, and hamlet of the country, where they had before been unknown and unused, but they imparted to them an entire new quality—hat of locomotion. An electioneering pageant or procession could not be gotten up, nor regarded as complete, unless a log cabin formed a part. Hence we saw them placed on wheels and drawn by triple teams through the streets of our cities, followed by thousands and tens of thousands of shouting, enthusiastic, and devoted friends—according to the Whig chronicles of the times. And, sir, on these occasions, age forgot its decrepitude, and threw aside its accustomed gravity and reserve; and we might have seen grave and reverend Senators falling into those processions of the last summer and autumn, and marching through suffocating clouds of dust, and panting and sweating under the burning heat of an almost vertical sun, responding to the sentiment, and keeping time with the melody, of such delectable ditties as "Tippecanoe and Tyler too," "Jim along Josey," and the like. Was all this apparent enthusiasm devoted to the insensate wood, of which those log cabins were constructed? Or, was it not designed, in connection with the fact that Gen. Harrison had formerly voted for both pre-emption and graduation, (which was urged throughout the new States,) to make the impression on the humble inhabitants of log cabins, every where, that the candidate of the Opposition and his supporters, were their peculiar friends? To say otherwise, would seem to me to be barefaced mockery—nay, sir, the violent opposition which this bill has encountered, and that which it is now but too obvious the graduation bill and all kindred measures are destined to encounter from those same gentlemen, proves incontestably that all those exhibitions of kind feeling and generous sympathy were but a cruel mockery!

Sir, as I remarked on a former occasion, this bill is free from the objection of partiality which has always been urged against those heretofore passed; it is no longer confined to the citizens of the new States, nor to those already on the land. The pre-emption bill, now before us, opens the door to every individual of the old as well as the new States, and enables him to obtain a freehold and a home. To former pre-emption bills our opponents raised the objection of partiality; to this they raise the objection of its too great universality: it is now too broad, and admits too many to the enjoyment of its privileges.

Do you believe, Mr. President, it would be possible so to frame a bill as to obviate the difficulties of such objections? No, sir, as fast as we remove one ground of objection, another is taken. They complained that former bills were too narrow; we extended the provisions of this; and now, forsooth, it is too wide! Sir, were I to indulge a conjecture, I should say that no bill, narrow or wide, would suit the palates of these fastidious gentlemen, so long as it contained the pre-emptive feature, extending the protecting shield over the humble cultivator of the soil against the power of the heartless speculator, and parceling out the public domain, in small tracts, to those who will improve and render it productive, instead of selling it in large bodies to the rich monopolist, who will suffer it to lie waste and unprofitable till the necessities of the cultivator compel him to give the desired profit.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky farthest from me [Mr. CLAY] on this occasion, as heretofore, heads and leads on the opposing host. However versatile he may have proved himself on other great questions, of which some prominent instances might be given, he still remains, as he has always heretofore been, the immovable and inflexible opponent of this and all other measures of liberality to the people of the new States. That Senator has thought proper to refer to the incidents of last year, to which I have just alluded; and while, in one breath, he thinks proper to call us, who have uniformly supported former pre-emption and graduation bills, "new converts" to log cabin principles; in the next, he taunts us with having failed, by our friendship, to conciliate and secure the votes of more than four out of the nine new States. He called those measures "land traps to catch votes," and exulted that they had failed to accomplish the desired object. Sir, if they did fail, in the sense intimated by the Senator, they may have had some influence in the Western States, as Abolition had in other quarters in deciding, at Harrisburg, last winter, who should be the standard bearer of the Federal party. And, sir, this same Federal party were ready enough, and did avail themselves of General Harrison's supposed popularity, by representing him as "an older and better soldier" in the cause of the pioneers of the West than the present incumbent. Let not that honorable Senator suppose for a moment—let him not "lay the flattering unction to his soul"—that he will ever live to see the day when the honest, intelligent, and high-souled people of the West, will forget the wrongs they have suffered, in connection with this subject, and reward those with their confidence by whom they have been inflicted. No, sir: if the chivalrous sons of that region are to be conciliated, it must be by honorable atonement, not by continued and persevering hostility.

Mr. President, I cannot pass by, altogether unnoticed, another topic, introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] though, to my mind, without any very natural affinity to the subject under consideration. After denouncing the original bill as "a fearful extension of the pre-emption system"—as "an untried and most hazardous experiment," he appealed to the Administration Senators not to introduce and pass new and important measures, "just as a dismissed ministry were going out." How magnanimous! and how meekly he wears his blushing honors! But the Senator must have forgotten, at the moment, that Congress passes laws, and not any ministry, which may be going out or coming in. He must have forgotten, too, that his illustrious "military chieftain" holds the doctrine that the Executive is not a branch of the law-making power; and that he has said, in effect, that he would veto no law which might be passed by a majority of Congress, and be desired by a majority of the people.

Sir, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has followed this up, by furnishing another disclosure of the difference in the conduct of aspirants, before and after elections—another discrepancy between promises and performance. We all recollect the denunciations against the present Administration for its alleged "proscriptions for opinion's sake." The Opposition assumed, as one of its various party cognomens, that of the "anti proscription party"—no man was to be removed from office for a mere difference of political opinion. Yet, sir, what does the Senator—who speaks as one having authority—what does the Senator now tell us on this subject? In allusion to the appointments which have been, or may be made by the present Chief Magistrate, he very clearly intimates, they are not to be much in the way of his successor. He tells us significantly and emphatically, that "General Harrison means to be President on the 4th of March next." He says "General Harrison, when he comes, will look at those whom he finds in office; and, if he finds that they are honest and capable and faithful, that they have not been noisy and forward politicians, nor brought their official influence in conflict with the freedom of elections, if any such there be"—(at the same time making an emphatic pause and shaking his head most incredulously, and satisfying all who heard and saw him that he meant to be understood that he believed there would be none such) "he hopes he will let them stand (though he feared there would be but few) as monuments of the liberality of a Whig Administration, acting on patriotic principles." Such, the Senator tells us, are the chances of Democrats, who may be found in office, to remain as monuments of Whig magnanimity and forbearance! The Senator evidently means to be understood that there will be none such; and I submit the question, whether a single one—whatever may have been his capacity, his purity, his fidelity, or his discretion—will be able to pass the ordeal which awaits him, or run the gauntlet unscathed, amongst the thousands and tens of thousands of hungry expectants and greedy office seekers, who are said to have already visited North Bend in pursuit of the spoils; and who will shortly infest every avenue leading to the Presidential mansion in greatly augmented numbers? Why, sir, before I left my residence, I heard the names of some twelve individuals mentioned, as aspirants to the office of postmaster of a town containing a population of only some 3,000 souls—yet, I never heard the first imputation against the capacity, integrity, or fidelity of the incumbent. And so it is, sir, throughout the country: there is scarcely an office of the most humble grade, held by a Democrat, for which there are not many applicants to be found in the ranks of this office-hating, anti-spoils party. I have seen it stated that but a few days ago, the Legislature of a neighboring State, in which the Whigs have recently obtained the ascendancy, turned out indiscriminately every Democrat, even down to the men who swept the floors of the Capitol. Such, sir, are the evidences of Whig sincerity, and such will be the monuments of Whig magnanimity!

Another topic (said Mr. C.) has been brought into this discussion, and dwelt upon at some length by several Senators, who are opposed to the bill, which has no sort of connection with the subject. I allude, sir, to that of the naturalization of foreigners; and whether a State is competent to extend the right of suffrage to a foreigner, not naturalized. As it is a question not involved in the bills nor in any other proposition under consideration, I shall neither attempt to discuss nor pass upon it on this occasion. It is true, sir, that a motion was made, so to amend the bill, as to exclude foreigners from the benefits it is intended to confer; and that amendment, with my concurrence, was voted down, as was a similar one, when the pre-emption bill, passed in 1838, was before us. It was an attempt to introduce an entirely new feature into our system. From its foundation to the present day, the law of this Government has indiscriminately authorized sales of the public domain to foreigners, as well as citizens. It is wholly a question between such individuals and the State in which they purchase, as to how far they shall be permitted to hold real estate, or transmit it by inheritance to their children. No gentleman can doubt the power of a State to constitute any description of persons legal owners of such property as they may purchase, and to determine all the incidents of such ownership—it properly belongs to State authority, nor does it conflict at all with the constitutional power of this Government over the subject of naturalization. Sir, there are reminiscences connected with our earlier history, which I cannot and would not willingly forget—when the natives of other climes generously came forward and fought the battles of our independence shoulder to shoulder with our fathers. The time was, when we would not have raised this question, and I am unwilling to raise it now. In other times, it was our proud boast that our country was the refuge and the home of the persecuted stranger, and the asylum of the oppressed of all other nations; and it shall continue to be our boast, so far as my vote is concerned, as long as we have unoccupied space in our wide spread and happy land.

Mr. C. said the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had thought proper to give them the history of the pre-emption policy, commencing with John Cleves Simmes, and the persons holding under him, and going through the various acts which had been passed to protect occupants, in Louisiana and elsewhere. To this he (Mr. CLAY of Alabama) presumed the Senators had turned their attention, and understood it thoroughly. But the Senator had charged that after General Jackson came into power, there was ever attendant on the land system disorder and fraud, and conduct of a most improper character. Yet, where was the proof of it? He (Mr. CLAY) denied that disorder or fraud had increased under the legislation of General Jackson's administration; and he told the Senator if he would look back to the memorials on file, he would find there had been infinitely more riot and disorder before that period, than from that to the present. Why, on those occasions almost an universal combination of capitalists would take place, and they took the land from men of small means, and monopolized the whole at the Government price; and they would hold the land in an uncultivated and unproductive state, until the necessities of the cultivators compelled them to give to the speculators the desired profit. On some occasions the sales were suspended, in consequence of those combinations of the speculators; and appeals were made to the authorities here, to know whether the sales should be proceeded with at all, so great was the annoyance from that cause. But had they heard recently of a sale being broken up by riot or combination? Far from it: on the contrary, so far as he knew, every thing had been peace and quiet; and except in a few isolated cases, there was no evidence of fraud. Where was the inducement to fraud? And if there were inducement, where, under their pre-emption laws, could it be successfully carried out? Could it be done by the individual who sits down on a small tract of 160 acres of land? by the emigrant who went from an old to a new State, with the wish to till the land? Oh! it was said, money was made by the pre-emptive right, by fraud and perjury. If this were so, the parties would be subject to prosecution; but had there been any prosecutions? and where was the evidence that such frauds and perjuries had ever taken place under this law? In the part of the country that he (Mr. CLAY) came from, he knew of no such instance. There every thing under these laws was peace and quiet.

But gentleman told them they were introducing the credit system. Now, as it regarded the fresh land brought into the market which was subject to the pre-emption law, there was not the color of any ground for the imputation. According to all the pre-emption bills which had hitherto been passed, and such would be the law if the present bill passed, the sales could not be postponed beyond the period appointed by the President's proclamation. If no pre-emption law ever passed, the time of sale would be the same. Could the Senator find, in any law heretofore passed, a provision which denied to the President the power to bring the land into the market at the earliest moment? No. Well, then, how was it with the land which was subject to private entry? It was allowed to them before to enter, and they were privileged to enjoy it during the two years of the operation of the laws, and now they were restricted to a period of twelve months, and if the payments were not then made, any other individual was entitled to pay for it, and the occupant was ousted from it. Was that credit? By no means: the Government forbears merely to sell to any other man, until after the lapse of twelve months from the passage of the law, or the time of settlement. There is no sale to the occupant until he makes payment; and, of course, no credit.

But the Senator went still further, and said that great losses had accrued under these pre-emption laws; and how did he make this appear? He called their attention to the President's message of December, 1837, and pointed to the statement that the average excess, as he alleged, according to that document, was six cents per acre, and they were told by the Senator that this was made out by spreading it out over all the sales by private entry, as well as those at auction. Now he (Mr. CLAY of Alabama) assured the Senator from Kentucky that he was totally mistaken. If the Senator would look at the document sent to the Senate in the beginning of January, 1838, which was in progress of preparation from the month of September of the preceding year, and from which, doubtless, the President made his representation of the land sales, he would see that it did not embrace the lands sold by private entry, but was confined to lands sold at auction, beginning in the year 1830 and coming up with the cash system to 1837, just before that document was communicated to Congress. The average excess spreading over all the land sold at auction, and by private entry, was but 2-4-5 cents per acre. He would, moreover, call the attention of the Senate to another report, which showed that all land sold at auction after the passage of the pre-emption law of June, 1838, up to the last year, was but 4-38-100 cents per acre above the minimum, and the average price of the whole by private entry, and all, was but $1 26 and a fraction per acre. Independently of all this, had the Senate forgot that, for two years and a half before the first pre-emption law was ever enacted, it was but one cent an acre excess? If Senators would look further back into a document embracing Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, it would be found that the general average excess in those States for three years, (before the passage of the pre-emption law of 1830,) was only six mills per acre above the minimum price; and this would not cover the expense of sales by auction, in the employment of an auctioneer, the extra compensation to the Registers and Receivers, clerks, &c. The pre-emption bill then, was not a proposition to give away the public lands; nor to reduce the amount of money received for them, materially below that which would be received under the auction system.

[Mr. CLAY of Kentucky here interposed, and said he alluded to this subject to show what the difference was with and without pre-emption laws. He then went into some explanations, as we understood, to sustain his former views, and concluded by reading the following extract from the message of President Van Buren, in December, 1837, to which he had referred:

"Upon a critical examination, it is found that the lands sold at the public sales, since the introduction of cash payments, in 1820, have produced, on an average, the net revenue of only six cents an acre more than the minimum Government price." &c.]

Mr. CLAY of Alabama resumed. He said the extract from the President's message, which had just been read by the Senator from Kentucky, proved that he had been mistaken in his former statement, and agreed precisely with what he (Mr. CLAY of Alabama) had said. As the extract read by the Senator showed, the President expressly referred to "the public sales, since the introduction of the cash system, in 1820," and did not mention nor embrace the sales by private entry, in fixing the average excess, above the minimum, at six cents an acre. He said, if the Senator from Kentucky would review his remarks, as published in one of the daily papers of this city, he would find that he had been understood by others, as saying that the average excess was reduced to six cents per acre, by being spread over all the sales made—those by private entry, as well as those at auction. This was the error he (Mr. CLAY of Alabama) was endeavoring to correct.

[Mr. CLAY of Kentucky again interposed, and asked if the six cents average above the minimum, was not made out by including the lands sold at private entry.]

Mr. CLAY of Alabama maintained the contrary; and repeated what he said before in substance; that the general average, including private, as well as public sales, from the commencement of the cash system in 1820, to the 30th of September, 1837, only exceeded the minimum 2-4-5 cents per acre. He said this was shown by a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, made on the 8th of January, 1838, responsive to a resolution of the Senate, of the 20th September preceding, to which he would invite the attention of Senators. Mr. C. said, aware that the Senator from Kentucky had heretofore maintained that the average alluded to had been made out by embracing private sales in the estimate; and being anxious to satisfy him, that the difference would be inconsiderable, he had twelve months ago called on the the commissioner of the General Land Office, and obtained a statement of the quantity of public land, which had been sold at auction, from the 22d June, 1833, to that time. The result was that, in the sale at auction, exclusive of nearly two millions of acres, the average price had been but $1 29-38-100 per acre, being a gain of only four cents and a fraction above the minimum, without any deduction for extra expenses; and the general average was but $1 26-18-100 per acre. Mr. C. remarked that these facts were sufficient to show incontestably that the gain of the Government, by selling at auction, was too insignificant in a pecuniary point of view, to have any material influence on the policy of the Government.

I have felt it my duty, Mr. President, (said Mr. CLAY,) to say this much in reply to the objections which seemed most worthy of notice, urged, by its opponents, against the original bill. I come now to the second branch of the subject under consideration—the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] to distribute the revenue arising from the sales of the public lands amongst the several States—a proposition, in my opinion, more objectionable than any other. This is a question which I have heretofore had occasion to examine; but I have now re-examined it, with care and attention, and have been confirmed and strengthened in all the objections which I have urged against the measure on former occasions.

The first general reflection that arises irrepressibly to my mind, in approaching the discussion of this proposition, Mr. President, is the time, and the circumstances, under which it is brought forward. If we had a redundant Treasury—a large surplus revenue—as we had a few years ago, although it would not, in my judgment, warrant the exercise of such a power, it would render it more plausible. But, sir, what has been the state of our finances for the last three or four years? and what is their condition now? Four years ago, we had a redundant Treasury—it contained more than $40,000,000. Under an act of Congress previously passed, near $30,000,000 of this amount was deposited with the several States, on the 1st of January, the 1st of April and the 1st of July, 1837. In the mean time the commercial revulsion of May, '37, took place—the banks suspended specie payments, and refused, or were unable, to refund the public money deposited with them—thus crippling our ordinary resources, and reducing the Treasury below the current demands for the support of Government. It became indispensably necessary for the President to convene Congress on the first Monday in September, within six months from the day of his inauguration. We were compelled to anticipate the receipts of the revenue, and to raise money by loans to keep the Government in motion. At each succeeding session down to the present, we have been constrained to adopt similar measures, and, at this moment, there is a bill before the other branch of Congress again to anticipate the receipts from the revenue by the issue of Treasury notes to the amount of five millions of dollars. Indeed, we have been charged on this floor by some of the Senator's political friends, since the commencement of the present session, (how truly, it is not my present purpose to inquire,) with having created a national debt to the amount of near thirty millions of dollars; and we have been urged to increase the tariff on certain articles to supply the ordinary wants of the Government, and supersede the necessity of an extra session of Congress. Yet, sir, under all these circumstances, and with this gloomy picture of our financial condition, presented by the Opposition, a distinguished member of that party comes forward with a proposition to abstract from the Treasury the entire revenue from the public lands, not only for the present year, but for an indefinite period—forever. I have said this would amount to the probable sum of $5,000,000 annually. My estimate is predicated on the receipts into the Treasury, from the same source, according to a table now before me, for a period of ten years—from 1828 to 1837, both inclusive—during which an average sum of more than seven millions of dollars was annually received from this source of revenue. And taking into view the quantity of fresh lands that will be coming into market in the new States and Territories, it is not probable the average will be reduced below the sum I have supposed, within the next ten years. Well, sir, what must be the inevitable consequence of withdrawing this large annual sum from the ordinary means of meeting the public expenditures? Will it not become absolutely necessary to supply the deficiency, thus created, by taxation to that amount, or by borrowing money? If we take five millions of dollars out of the Treasury, and are compelled to pay it back again, in the form of new taxes, or an increased tariff, what do we gain? Or, rather, is it not obvious that, so far from gaining anything, the expenses of collection and disbursement are a dead loss? On the other hand, if we make up the deficiency by borrowing five millions annually, are we not creating a permanent national debt which, with the accumulating interest, will, in a few years, amount to an hundred millions of dollars?

It seems to me, Mr. President, that there can be no diversity of opinion upon this subject. The proposition of the Senator from Kentucky plainly involves the alternative, to be submitted to the American people, whether they will take from the Treasury of the United States the annual proceeds of the public lands, to be refunded by increased taxation, or by contracting a new national debt, which is to go on augmenting, year after year, indefinitely. Sir, divested of the plausible robes in which it has been clad by the ingenious sophistry of the mover, and its other advocates, it is a naked and graceless proposition to borrow money for the purpose of distribution among the States. Can the people be prepared to sanction such a policy, if that were the only question? Sir, I cannot believe it.

These views, Mr. President, go to the expediency of the proposed measure; but there are other objections of more insuperable character. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] has said the States have a right to demand a distribution under the compact between the ceding States and the General Government. Now, sir, I hold that the States have no right to demand—nor has the General Government any right to make such a distribution. It is, in my opinion, perfectly demonstrable that such an act would violate the terms of cession, as well as the Constitution of the United States. To sustain the first branch of my proposition, it is only necessary to recur to the history of the times, and the language employed in the acts of cession themselves.

To form a more satisfactory opinion upon this subject, said Mr. CLAY, it will not be unprofitable to go a little back and examine the proceedings of Congress antecedent to any surrender of territory by the States. It must be recollected that there were two parties to these compacts—Congress, on the one hand, holding out inducements and tendering propositions for an adjustment of territorial difficulties, and the States, on the other, responding to those propositions. An examination of the proposals and negotiations between contracting parties will always facilitate a correct understanding of the contract itself. We all know that, even before the close of the Revolutionary war, there were difficulties amongst the States in regard to the extent of territory claimed by some of them. There was a vast amount of unoccupied and unimproved land claimed by some of the States, while the others maintained that, if the war terminated successfully, and those wild domains were thus conquered and secured, it would be accomplished by the united patriotism, courage, toil, and blood of all the States; and, consequently, they should enure to the common benefit of all. The Congress of the confederation concurred in the view of the question last mentioned, and on the 6th of September, 1780, agreed to the report of a committee, to whom had been referred, for consideration, communications upon the subject from the Legislatures of Maryland, New York, and Virginia, which, amongst other things, contained these views:

"That it appears more advisable to press upon those States which can remove the embarrassments respecting the Western country, a liberal surrender of a portion of their territorial claims, since they cannot be preserved entire without endangering the stability of the general confederacy; to remind them how indispensably necessary it is to establish the Federal Union on a fixed and permanent basis, and on principles acceptable to all its respective members; how essential to public credit and confidence, to the support of our army, to the vigor of our councils and success of our measures, to our tranquillity at home, our reputation abroad, to our very existence as a free, sovereign, and independent people," &c.

Now, sir, said Mr. C. there is not an idea to be found in this report, so adopted by Congress, about separate or distinct interests of the several States. Every motive held out, relates, in the language of that patriotic body, to the safety and "stability of the general confederacy"—to the establishment of "the Federal Union on a fixed and permanent basis"—"to public credit and confidence, to the support of our army"—"to our tranquillity at home, our reputation abroad, to our very existence as a free, sovereign, and independent people."

This report, sir, was followed up by the adoption of a resolution on the 10th of October, 1780, which is expressly referred to by the preamble to another resolution upon the same subject, which was adopted in April, 1784, (after the cessions from New York and Virginia had been made,) as "having fixed the conditions to which the Union should be bound on receiving such cessions." The former may, therefore, be justly regarded as the fundamental proposition of the General Government—the very basis of all the cessions which were made by the several States, as they all followed after it, and may be considered as assents or agreements to the proposed "conditions to which the Union should be bound." Consequently, it must have an important influence in determining the proper construction, to be placed on the several acts of cession, and I must beg the indulgence of the Senate till I read it entire. It is in the following words:

"Resolved, That the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States, by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress of the 6th day of September last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct Republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States; that each State which shall be so formed, shall contain a suitable extent of territory, not less than one hundred, nor more than one hundred and fifty miles square, or as near thereto as circumstances will admit; that the necessary and reasonable expenses which any particular State shall have incurred since the commencement of the present war, in subduing any British posts, or in maintaining forts or garrisons within and for the defence, or in acquiring any part of the territory that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States, shall be reimbursed."

Now, sir, is it possible for any ingenuity or sophistry to put on this resolution a plausible construction, to sustain the idea of separate interests in the proceeds of the lands among the States? On the contrary, is not the language plain and emphatic, that the lands which may be ceded to the General Government, "shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States"—the name by which this Government was called and known under the Articles of Confederation, as well as since—and and not for the benefit of the several States? If any thing were wanting to establish more conclusively, that the interest of the States in the proceeds of the lands expected to be acquired under these proposals, was, on all hands, understood to be joint, and not several, it is to be found in the last clause of the resolution, which specially declares "that the necessary and reasonable expenses which any particular State shall have incurred since the commencement of the present war, in subduing any British post, or in maintaining forts and garrisons within and for the defence, or in acquiring any part of the territory that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States, shall be reimbursed."

It is a legal maxim, which the gentlemen engaged in this debate on the other side cannot fail to recognise, that "exceptio unius, exclusio est alterius;" and it is a principle of reason and common sense, to which all minds must assent, that when a particular reservation or exception follows a general grant, the mere specification of the exception implies that there is no other, and strengthens and confirms the grant to all that is not reserved. Then, sir, I am sustained in the conclusion that, so far as the terms of the proposals to the States, by the General Government, are concerned, we are bound to appropriate the revenue, arising from the sales of the public lands, "for the common benefit of the United States," and not for that of the States severally, with the single exception that "any particular State" was to "be reimbursed" for "necessary and reasonable expenses" which had been "incurred" for the objects specified in the last clause of the resolution.

Having thus seen the obligations proposed to be assumed by the General Government, let us now, Mr. President, proceed to examine the acts of the several States, purporting to cede or relinquish their claims to Western territory. And here it may be well to remind Senators that all the acts of cession, with the exception of those of North Carolina and Georgia, were made before the adoption of the Constitution, and, consequently, had reference to the Articles of Confederation. It is fair to presume that all the States that relinquished territory, were actuated by the same high motives of patriotism and policy, and had a common object in view; but as there is some difference in the phraseology of the several deeds, and some of the gentlemen, who have addressed the Senate, having laid great stress on the particular words employed in some of them, it may facilitate us in making a proper construction to bring into one view those clauses of each, which express the purposes contemplated by the grantors. I shall take the deeds of cession in the order of time that they were executed.

The deed from New York declares that the territory ceded—

"Shall be and enure for the use and benefit of such of the United States as shall become members of the Federal alliance of the said States, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

"That from the State of Virginia declares—

"That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, (with certain reservations not necessary to be recited,) shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become members of the Confederation, or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

Those from Massachusetts, Connecticut, and South Carolina, adopt the same language, and convey "to the United States of America, for their benefit"—the respective States "inclusive." And the deed from North Carolina corresponds with that from Virginia. The deed from Georgia differs from all the rest in several respects, and shall be hereafter noticed.

Now, Mr. President, the question to be decided is—do these several deeds respond to, and agree with the "conditions" proposed by Congress, "to which the Union should be bound on receiving such cessions"—that is, "for the common be-neft of the United States?" Do not all the deeds, which I have brought to the notice of the Senate, use the same language in effect? Those from Virginia and North Carolina declare that the lands "ceded to the United States shall be considered a common fund, &c." Do not these words distinctly convey the idea of a joint fund, in contradistinction to one in severalty? Could language have been used more expressive of a full assent to the terms which had been proposed by Congress in their resolution of the 10th of October, 1780? I think not, sir—and the terms employed in the other deeds of cession, though not the same, may be regarded as equippollent. For instance, as I have shown, those of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and South Carolina, conveyed "to the United States of America, for their benefit." Is not this a conveyance for joint benefit, in the absence of any qualifying expressions? It cannot be denied: and, sir, I may remark, that there is not a clause to be found in any one of the deeds of cession, which reserves any separate interest or dividend to the State by which it is made. Can it be reasonably supposed, that the States would have used such language as they did, with the distinct avowal of Congress before them, that the ceded territory should be "disposed of for the common benefit of the United States," if they had intended to secure to themselves any separate or distinct interest? On the contrary, admonished, as they were, of the purpose and intention of the General Government, they would have carefully inserted express reservations of such distributive shares as they intended to secure.

But, sir, there are other clauses in some of the deeds of cession, which have been seized upon by some of the friends of distribution to give color to their construction. In some of them this language is used: "for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become members of the Federal alliance, &c." "according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure." It seems to me, sir, that this argument is easily answered. It is only necessary to bear in mind that all the cessions which have been enumerated, except that of North Carolina, were made before the adoption of the Constitution, and hers in the same year; and that the language just quoted had reference to the mode of raising revenue, under the Articles of Confederation. Article 8 is in the following words:

"All charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common Treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States, in proportion to the value of all land within each State granted to or surveyed for any person, as such land and the buildings and improvements thereon shall be estimated, according to such mode as the United States in Congress assembled shall from time to time direct and appoint."

"The taxes for paying that proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the Legislatures of the several States, within the time agreed upon by the United States in Congress assembled."

Sir, although Congress then made appropriations "for the common defence" and "general welfare," and paid them "out of a common Treasury," we see they had not the power of taxation. They only had power to lay down the rule for the assessment of taxes, and make requisitions upon the several States, under whose authority alone they were to be levied and paid over. Then, sir, when a "common fund" was placed in the general Treasury "for the use and benefit of such of the United States as had become, or should become, members of the Federal alliance," "according to their usual and respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure," it was merely intended to relieve them, respectively, of the payment of that proportion of the amount of the requisitions which might be made on them by the General Government. In other words, it was equivalent to a credit to be estimated by that rule, to which each State, belonging to the Federal alliance, was to be entitled at the "common treasury;" for the absurdity of paying over this "common fund" to the several States, "according to their usual and respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure," to be immediately returned, or repaid by them into the "common treasury," could never have been perpetrated by the wise men of that day.

Mr. President, there is another point of view, in which the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky for the distribution of the revenue arising from the sales of the public lands, or any other proposition heretofore made, having the same object in view, is imperfect, and, I may add, totally impracticable. If a distribution can, or ought to be made under the deeds of cession, it must be done by the rule of taxation established by the Articles of Confederation; at least the clause on which I have remarked, and on which gentlemen rely, evidently refers to that rule, and indicates no other.

The "usual respective proportion in the general charge and expenditure" was fixed by the 8th article already quoted, according to the value of all "the land within each State, granted or surveyed, and the buildings and improvements thereon." No such rule of taxation, or "charge and expenditure" now exists, nor is the plan of distribution predicated on that principle, or on the provisions of the Constitution, which has been since adopted. Under that instrument Congress may raise revenue by taxation, direct, or indirect. In the second section of the first article it is provided, that "representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States, which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons." Now we know that this rule of taxation is altogether different from that established by the Articles of Confederation; and that it is not the criterion referred to by the deeds of cession, for apportioning among the several States "the general charge and expenditure." But, sir, if it were otherwise, we have no "direct taxes," but a system of indirect taxation, by duties and imposts, under which it is impossible to know what each or any particular State pays. Having no criterion whatever, then, by which to ascertain the respective proportions of the several States "in the general charge and expenditure," or in what proportions they contribute to the common Treasury, we consequently have none by which to apportion amongst them the revenue arising from the sales of the public lands.

Again, Mr. President, the history of the times seems to me to furnish a conclusive refutation against every argument I have heard in favor of distribution. We know that, throughout the Revolution, Congress had no power to raise money, even for the common Treasury, except through the intervention of the States. We have already seen that, under the Articles of Confederation, taxes for that purpose were expressly required to "be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the Legislatures of the several States." Until the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the States never surrendered to Congress the power of raising revenue, even for the general purposes for which this Government was instituted; and they were slow and reluctant to part with the power to that limited extent. This being the case, can it be supposed that they ever intended to constitute this Government an agent to raise or collect revenue from any source whatever, to be divided or distributed amongst themselves? No, sir, such an idea is contradicted by the known jealousy with which they ever guarded the exercise of power by the General Government, and the extreme caution and hesitation with which they granted to it the powers deemed indispensable to its efficient action by the most wise and patriotic.

I will now, sir, submit a remark or two on the deed of cession from Georgia. It was executed on the 24th of April, 1802—more than thirteen years after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States—and its language conforms to the change of Government which had taken place. It declares "that all the lands ceded (after satisfying certain claims) be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, Georgia included, and shall be faithfully disposed of, for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever." Here is no reservation of any thing but a joint and common interest; it is to be "a common fund," and "for the use and benefit of the United States"—that is, the Government of the Union, and not of the States severally—and to be "faithfully disposed of for that purpose" only. In this deed, we do not find the clause about "the respective and usual proportion (of the States) in the general charge and expenditure," on which gentlemen have predicated most of their arguments in favor of distribution—because the rule and the mode of taxation to which that language referred had been superseded by the provisions of the Constitution. The States no longer laid and levied taxes for the General Government; hence there was no longer need of a rule for apportioning the credits.

In further confirmation of the views I have expressed on this subject, I may remind the Senate, that the idea of distributing the proceeds of the public lands is of modern origin. More than forty years had elapsed after all the cessions, except that of Georgia, and thirty years after that, before any attempt was made to establish the divisibility of those funds. During all this time, the money received for the public domain was paid into the common treasury, like other portions of the revenue; and it was appropriated and paid out in the same manner, indiscriminately, for all the liabilities of the Government. I am not aware that any of the States ever set up a claim to a separate or distributive share of this fund, until after the project was started in 1832, nor do I believe that such a thought was ever entertained when the several compacts were made, either by the States or General Government.

But, Mr. President, if the views I have expressed in reference to that portion of the public domain ceded by the States be erroneous, on what principle can gentlemen claim a distribution of the revenue arising from the sales of the lands in Louisiana and Florida, purchased from France and Spain? In regard to those, none of the States, separately, ever had any claim, or ever made a cession, or a compact with the General Government. They were purchased by the Government of the United States with its own revenue, with the common treasure, created by its own power. Yet those lands have been treated like the balance of the public domain, and the money received from them, like that received from all other sources of revenue, placed in the common treasury. No one denies that the Government can purchase land: does it follow that money expended in this way, when it is brought back into the Treasury by a sale, acquires any new property to change the power of the Government over its destination? If so, it is but necessary for us to convert the revenue, which we are only authorized to collect for specified objects, into land, and then re-convert it into money, to give the Government of the United States a power over it beyond all the restraints of the Constitution. However, this is an absurdity, for which, it is to be hoped, few will be reckless enough to contend.

But, sir, although every proposition for a distribution of the revenue has been broad enough to embrace all the public domain, as well Louisiana, comprising the whole of our territory beyond the Mississippi, as Florida and the whole country south of the thirty-first degree of latitude, I have not yet heard any one bold enough to maintain that the deeds of cession from the States extended to any portion not included within the chartered limits of the original States.

From these views, Mr. President, it follows that a distribution amongst the States, of the revenue arising from the sale of such portions of the public land as were purchased from France and Spain, cannot be sustained on any ground, which has been hitherto assumed in this discussion. I think we have seen, too, that so much as was ceded by Georgia, wants the support of the argument which gentlemen have founded on particular clauses in the other deeds of cession, and must be excepted. As regards the cession of North Carolina, it may be said there is nothing to distribute; for we have more than once passed bills through this branch of Congress, which amount (and very properly too) to an abandonment of all claims to the refuse, unappropriated lands within the State of Tennessee. And, sir, the result is, that the only colorable claim, supported with any plausibility, by the friends of distribution, extends to the remnants which remain unsold in the Northwestern States—being so far as the plats of survey have been returned, in Ohio less than a million of acres—in Indiana less than five millions—in Illinois something more than fourteen millions—and in Michigan about fourteen millions—amounting in the aggregate to 34,345,871 acres. Yes, sir, even if their deeds of cession sustain their pretensions, they go thus far, and no farther.

But, Mr. President, there is another aspect of this subject which presents a conclusive bar to any claim of distribution which can be set up in behalf of the States. It certainly cannot be pretended, on any fair principle, that we are bound to divide any thing but the net profits of the concern; nor that we are bound to divide those profits before they accrue. The gentlemen on the other side represent the Government as a trustee for the management of the public domain for the benefit of the several States; and that much may be conceded. But it will be recollected that the performance of this trust has been attended with much expenditure of money, as must have been well understood would be the case at the time it was confided. Now, admitting for the sake of argument (and I am sure I could not otherwise make the admission) that a division of the proceeds was contemplated by the parties to those contracts, when they were made, is it reasonable to suppose that it could have been intended, on the one hand, or expected on the other, to divide all the money that might be received for the lands, without first deducting the expenses necessarily incurred in the performance of the trust? If the General Government was bound to return any thing to the States, must it not have been the net proceeds? The Indian titles were to be extinguished to a large portion of those lands; and vast sums of money have been paid to effect that object. We have paid for Louisiana and Florida about thirty millions of dollars. Again, it was necessary for all these lands to be surveyed before they could be brought into market. And then district land offices were to be established and supported; and a General Land Office to exercise a superintending control over the whole business. Ought not these necessary expenses to be deducted from the amount received before any thing is demandable from the Government? If you, sir, were to employ an agent to manage and sell a large real estate, necessarily to be divided into smaller tracts, and unavoidably attended with great expense, would you expect him to hand you over the whole amount of his receipts, or, indeed, any part of them, before he had refunded himself the amount of his expenses? No, sir, you would not, nor would any reasonable or fair man; and the same principle applies in its full force to the claims of the States in their most favorable aspect. Then, how stands the account? Why, sir, according to a statement from the General Land Office, a little more than twelve months ago, the aggregate expenditures of this Government for the public domain amounted to $134,229,375 20, and the aggregate receipts into the Treasury on account of sales of the public lands amounted to $116,198,179 15, leaving an excess of expenditures above the receipts into the Treasury to the amount of $18,031,196 05. This is the state of the case, on the supposition that division was ever contemplated, a balance in our favor in the account current of more than eighteen millions of dollars! And this balance cannot be probably met and cancelled within less than three or four years by the net proceeds of sales.

Then, Mr. President, the public domain not having refunded the General Government the amount of the expenditures actually incurred in its purchase, management, and sale, and the entire revenue from all sources, including this branch, being inadequate, as all admit, to meet the current demands upon the Treasury, the plain question is, have we the power, and is it expedient to lay new taxes and collect revenue, or shall we borrow money to distribute amongst the States? This is the true question, and one which demands, and, I trust will receive the calm and solemn consideration of every intelligent and patriotic citizen.

Sir, said Mr. C. where do we find our power to distribute revenue amongst the States at all, much less to raise it for the purpose of distribution? He asked, was there any single expression in the Constitution which could be interpreted to justify such a proceeding? When we ask gentlemen on the other side to show us our authority, to what clause of that instrument can they refer us? We may answer triumphantly—to none. The exercise of such a power is against the whole genius of the Government, and would be destructive of the principles on which it is founded. The Constitution declares that "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." Yes, sir, for those purposes, and those only, have we the power to tax the people—"to pay the debts" of the United States, and "to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States"—not to raise money to pay the debts of the States, nor to raise money to provide for their separate welfare, but in common with the other members of the Union. Gentlemen must admit that no express power is delegated to us to lay and collect taxes for the benefit of the States separately; nor can they show that it is "necessary and proper for carrying into execution" those which are granted. Far from it, Mr. President. As I have already remarked, the taxing power, even for the general purposes of the confederation, for the common benefit of the United States, was the last with which the States parted, and the one which they surrendered, perhaps, more reluctantly than any other.

But, sir, it is unnecessary to pursue this view of the subject any farther. The friends of the proposition now more immediately under consideration have not met the question of constitutional power, nor undertaken to sustain it by any direct argument. They attempt to get round it by reference to the acts of cession, and by placing on them a construction not warranted by their language, their spirit, nor the history of the times, as, I think, has already been sufficiently shown. Yet, sir, I trust the people will understand it, and regard the motion of the Senator from Kentucky as it truly is—as a proposition to divide money amongst the States, which is assuredly to be refunded by a tax on themselves—as a proposition for this Government to become the tax-gatherer for State and local purposes, thereby cutting off and destroying all that salutary responsibility of the taxing power which is now felt by their immediate representatives; and, worse than all, as a proposition to sink the State Governments into insignificance, and make them dependent upon the General Government. No other measure has ever been proposed so well calculated to bring about that centralization and consolidation of all power in the Federal Government, so justly deprecated and cautiously guarded against by our ancestors, as that now under consideration. Once establish the principle that the States may look to this Government as the great money power upon which they may depend for all their local wants, and you will realize the most sanguine hopes and expectations of the Federalists in former times, by building up a splendid Government at the national metropolis, which must, and will, sooner or later, absorb all political power.

I fear, Mr. President, I have already occupied too much time in my remarks on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky; but there is one other point, which I cannot pass by altogether unnoticed. I mean, sir, the effect which the proposed measure would have on the interests and prosperity of the new States. They have already had sufficient cause of complaint against the course of policy which has been pursued towards them by the General Government, as the numerous memorials and remonstrances of the Legislatures and the people of those States, which have been presented session after session, for many years past, and are now on your files, will abundantly testify. Their great, and at the same time well founded cause of complaint, has been the inflexible adherence of this Government to one fixed price for lands of all descriptions, whether rich or poor. They have, again and again, appealed to your sense of justice, and referred you to the terms of your compacts with them, on their admission into the Union, showing, as they believe, that while you retained by their consent the right to the unsold and unappropriated lands within their limits exempt from taxation, you at the same time undertook to sell them in a reasonable time—but, thus far, they have appealed in vain. What are they to expect when you shall have enlisted the cupidity of all the other States of the Union against a reduction of the price of their inferior lands? Need they expect the representatives of States; that are to receive annual dividends from their proceeds, to an amount sufficient to support the Government of some of them, and exempt their citizens from taxation, to vote for their graduation bills, the passage of which they have so long anxiously desired? No, sir; and I now tell the people of the new States, if their petitions on this subject have heretofore been unavailing, should the proposed measure become a law, they will be utterly hopeless. They may expect, for a half century to come, that millions of acres will remain the property of this Government, nominally, but in fact the domain of the several old States—unsold, unsettled, unimproved and unproductive.

But, Mr. President, I turn with pleasure from the discussion of a measure to which, I think, there are so many insuperable objections—fraught, in my opinion, with so many evil consequences, not only to the new States, but to the whole Union—and will direct your attention to the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] Perhaps no measure of its importance, which has ever been brought forward here, has been more misrepresented, and less understood, than the bill of that honorable Senator "to cede the public lands within the limits of the new States, on certain conditions therein mentioned." It has been characterized and denounced as a proposition to "give" the public domain to those States; and such representations have been sent abroad, and have had their effect, unaccompanied by a single condition of the proposed grant. Sir, the bill does not contemplate a donation, and its exanimation is sufficient to repel the imputation. It proposes a sale, not a gift. These are its provisions: The first section cedes the public lands to the States in which they lie, which may remain unsold after the 30th of June, 1842, excepting the usual reservations for public purposes, on condition that the States shall pay to the General Government sixty-five per cent. of the gross proceeds, as the Senator proposes to fill the blank; that the minimum price shall remain, as now fixed by law, until the said 30th of June, 1842, but, after that period, the price may be reduced to $1 per acre for all lands then remaining unsold, which have theretofore been offered for sale for ten years; that, five years after the day aforesaid, all lands which may then have been offered for a period of fifteen years and remain unsold, may be reduced to seventy-five cents per acre; and thus going on with a reduction of the price in the same ratio, for every additional term of five years it may have been in market, till it comes down to twenty-five cents per acre; after which, if it shall remain unsold five years longer, it shall be ceded absolutely to the respective States in which it is situated; and the system of graduation to commence with all land not now embraced by it, so soon as it shall have been offered and remain unsold ten years. A further condition is, that the lands shall remain subject to the same legal subdivisions which now prevail; those not heretofore offered for sale to be first offered at auction—afterwards to be subject to graduation; and that all laws of the United States on the subject of public lands in force at the passage of the act, to remain so, except so far as modified by its provisions. Another condition is, that the cession is to be in full of the five per cent. fund, not already accrued, which was reserved to the new States by the compacts for their admission into the Union, for the purpose of making roads within, and leading to, those States; and the States to be "exclusively liable for all charges that may hereafter arise from the survey, sale, and management of the public lands." And, finally, any violation of these conditions is to be followed by a forfeiture of all the rights granted by the act; and all grants, or titles thereof made by the State so acting, to be null and void. The second section of the bill authorizes the several States, in which the lands are situated, to grant the right of pre-emption to ever actual settler for a period of ninety days, at each successive graduation, or reduction of price, after which, if the settler should not avail himself of the privilege, it is to be subject to entry by any other purchaser. The other provisions are not necessary to be noticed on this occasion.

These, sir, are all the material enactments proposed by the bill of the Senator from South Carolina. While they are fresh in our recollections, let us test the accuracy of some of the representations of its characteristics, which have been sent abroad. Is it a gift—a donation of the unsold lands to the States in which they are situated, as has been broadly asserted? So far from the fact, we see, at the first blush, the States are to pay the General Government 65 per cent. of the gross proceeds of the sales, and are to release the United States from the payment of the 5 per cent. of the nett proceeds, reserved for making roads for their benefit—these two items being 70 per cent. of the gross amount received. The States, too, are to be at the entire expense of the management and sale of this domain which constitutes another important item of deduction. What would be its amount, of course cannot be determined with precise accuracy; but I find it stated in the report of the Committee on Public Lands, prepared with much care at the last session, that there were then "spread over the new States fifty-nine land offices; connected with which there were one hundred and eighteen registers and receivers, eight surveyors general, with a host of deputies, clerks, draftsmen, chain carriers, and axemen, at an aggregate annual expense of upwards of $334,000, on an average of the last two years" preceding. Then suppose the aggregate amount of sales, in all the States, to be equal to three millions of dollars—and, without the territories, it would not probably exceed that sum—the expenses, at the rate just stated, may be estimated at nearly 12½ per cent. which brings up the credits to 82½ per cent. Then, sir, add 12½ per cent. more, the amount proposed to be given to the new States above an equal dividend with the old States, by the former distribution bill of the Senator from Kentucky, and which I suppose to be again contemplated, and we have accounted for 95 per cent. of the gross amount which may be paid to the States receiving the cessions. And, sir, it is just as fair, and not more liberal, to make the allowance of the last named item to the new States, under the bill proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, as under that of the Senator from Kentucky; for the citizens of those States, in the one case as well as the other, almost exclusively pay this large amount of money into the general treasury, and may be expected to go on increasing in population, more rapidly than their elder sisters, at least for some time to come.

[Mr. CLAY of Kentucky desired to give a more full and fair explanation of one point. It would be recollected that he introduced a bill for the distribution of the public lands in 1833, near the beginning of a period, at the end of which, the population of the United States would be greatly increased. His leading motive then, in proposing 12½ per cent. over and above, was that the new States had, at that time, and would continue to have up to the time for taking the next census, a vast amount of population more than by the rule proposed would be estimated, and great injustice therefore would be done if they were to receive by the census of 1830. That was the main motive. It was from a disposition to effect a satisfactory adjustment that it was done; for the new States, for the reason he had given, were entitled to something more than the old—but whether it should be 10 or 12½ per cent. would be a subject for consideration.]

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he perfectly understood the Senator's motive in the matter alluded to, he knew it was, at least in part, on account of the more rapid increase of population in the new than the old States, that he proposed to allow them more than was granted by the compacts for their admission into the Union. He was also satisfied that the same inducement for the discrimination still existed, and he hoped the new States would still go on increasing in population in the same ratio they had done since the census of 1830. Mr. C. by no means objected to the discrimination in their favor—it was just and fair not only on the ground stated by the Senator from Kentucky, but also on the other ground which he (Mr. CLAY of Alabama) had alluded to. What he meant to say was, that the additional twelve and a half per cent. could as properly be allowed to the new States under the bill of the Senator from South Carolina, as under that of the Senator from Kentucky. Under the latter the deduction of twelve and a half per cent. was first made in behalf of the States in which the lands were situated, and then a distribution made of the remainder amongst all the States, on terms of equality. So, he contended, under the bill ceding the lands, it was no less just that the new States should be allowed the additional twelve and a half per centum; for under its provisions, too, the inhabitants of those States would pay all the money for the lands, which went into the general Treasury, as well as increase more rapidly in population than the old States; and although it was not divided amongst the several States, they all shared in it as equally, for it ensured to their common benefit, by exempting them proportionately from that amount of taxation. What, then, Mr. C. asked, will be left to the new States, above the payment and deductions stated? Probably not more than five per cent. Then, sir, this is the amount of the sacrifice, if any, that is proposed by the bill of the Senator from South Carolina; and it must be apparent that, so far from being a donation, as heretofore alleged, it is a sale, and for an adequate consideration.

I am aware, Mr. President, that great loss has been apprehended in another respect. It is assumed, in the first place, that the entire one hundred and sixty millions of acres intended to be ceded are worth, and will ultimately command the present minimum price; and, in the next place, that, under the power of graduation, the States would sell them greatly below their value. A remark or two will be sufficient to show that both these assumptions are erroneous. It is altogether unfair to suppose that the entire quantity of this land would ever be sold for any price; and it is still more improbable that it would all bring $1 25 per acre, if ever sold. We know from the official documents that a large portion of it has been in market without finding a purchaser for periods of fifteen and twenty years, and some of it thirty and forty years. We know, too, that a great deal of it consists of mountains, swamps, and pine barrens, that would never command ten cents an acre: indeed, it is certain that some of it would never be received as a donation, as it might impose on the donee the responsibility of paying taxes. Very little would be sold annually; and I am safe in saying that all would not be sold in a century. It is obvious that such land, as I have truly described much of it to be, would never be purchased at the minimum, when we have such a boundless extent of rich, fresh soil, that can be bought at the same price.

Another consideration, worthy of notice, is the large annual expense of keeping up our land system—a deduction which should manifestly be made to determine the nett value of this property. The committee which had the subject under consideration at the last session, taking all these things into view, estimated the present cash value of the whole at $26,400,000. They also went on the supposition that the land might all be sold in a period of eighty years, which, as I have already intimated, was going too far. The sum of twenty-six millions four hundred thousand dollars, at six per cent. interest, would produce $1,584,000 annually, which in eighty years would amount to $126,720,000 in interest alone; added to the principal it would make the aggregate $153,120,000. Thus we see that this apparently small sum, at low interest, would almost amount to the average of one dollar an acre within the time stated. An average of seventy-five cents an acre, which is above all reasonable expectation, would make the aggregate sum received amount to $120,000,000—being $6,720,000 below the interest alone on the sum estimated by the committee. It is then manifest that the opponents of the bill have greatly magnified and overestimated the value of the property in question. It would be better to receive the sum estimated by the committee now, than to obtain any probable price after the lapse of so many years. As to the apprehension that the States would reduce the price too rapidly, it is equally unfounded. It would be against their interest to do so, more especially if the lands were as valuable as gentlemen supposed; and they would be restrained from such a course by the restrictions of the bill on their power of graduation. The land must have been in market unsold ten years before it can be reduced to $1 an acre; it must then remain unsold, at that price, five years longer, before it can be reduced to seventy-five cents; and the reduction of price continues in that ratio every additional five years. There is no danger of less in this respect; the objection would be more plausible, that the reduction of price is too slow, and postpones too long the receipt of its real value.

Sir, another objection against the proposed cession is the want of power. Mr. C. asked, can this difficulty be seriously entertained by those who have examined the subject? Does not the Constitution provide that "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations, respecting the territory or other property of the United States?" Regarding the cession as a sale, there can certainly be no doubt, whether it be for cash, or on credit; for we have given our sanction to both modes in practice. Nor can it be denied, that we have as much power to sell to States as to individuals. The Constitution does not prescribe to whom, nor in what manner, we may "dispose of" "the territory, or other property of the United States," but gives us a broad discretion to "make all needful rules and regulations" respecting it; and we have exercised it in almost every possible manner by sales and donations. We certainly have power, too, to employ whatever agent we may think proper in the disposition of the public property—a State, as well as an individual—and it must be admitted there is more safety in the former, than the latter kind of agency—by the one we have lost nothing, by the other we have lost millions.

Again, said Mr. C. it has been urged against this bill that it would establish the relation of creditor and debtor between the General Government and the new States; and the most frightful consequences have been shadowed forth by the imaginations of gentlemen as likely to result from it. They have told us that, although the bill did not make a donation in terms, that owing to the course which the States would pursue, and their failure to comply with the conditions of their compacts, it would become so in effect. Heart-burnings, discontent, and even the danger of disunion, had been alluded to as likely to flow from this measure. Mr. C. said, he appealed to every gentleman to say, whether the new States had not hitherto observed their compacts with the General Government? He appealed to every honorable Senator, whether they had done any thing to warrant the insinuations that had been uttered against their good faith in the course of this debate? He asked on what terms the new States had been admitted into the Union? Go to the acts providing for their admission, and you will find they were required to pass an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of Congress, disclaiming all right and title to the waste and unappropriated lands lying within their limits; that no tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States; that every tract of land afterwards sold by the Government shall remain free from taxation, for any purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the respective days of the sale thereof; and that land belonging to non-residents shall never be taxed higher than those of resident citizens, besides other conditions, which need not be recited. These, sir, were some of the conditions extorted from them as the price of their admission into the Union, notwithstanding they were promised admission on a footing of perfect equality, in all the rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence. The General Government retained the power to sell the unappropriated land within the States, and, of course, virtually undertook to perform that duty. When was this to be done?—never? Was it not the spirit of the compact, that it was to be done in a reasonable time, and for its fair value? This certainly cannot be controverted; for it cannot be supposed that one Government would willingly agree for its domain to be held exempt from taxation and improvement interminably by another. Well, sir, what is the fair value of property? Is it the price it may possibly command a quarter or half century hence? or is it not, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] justly remarked, the other day, the price it will command in cash at the present? This is the true test of value, by the common consent of all business men. And has the General Government performed the conditions of this compact according to its spirit. On the contrary, in despite of the memorials which have been sent here annually for the last twelve or fifteen years, by the Legislatures and the people of the new States, appealing to your justice, and calling on you to fulfil your agreements, have not millions of acres of the most inferior qualities been held up from sale—some twenty, some thirty years, and some still longer—because it would not command the same price you receive for your richest alluvial soils? Yes, sir, it is undeniable: and, during all this time, those lands have remained unsettled, unimproved, unproductive, and exempt from taxation. Yet every new State has observed good faith in the performance of the conditions imposed on her. I am not aware of a single violation on the part of any one of them. Is not this a sufficient test of fidelity to satisfy the most incredulous and skeptical? And does it not afford an unquestionable guaranty that the same Governments will faithfully perform whatever they undertake? Sir, sustained by such facts, I feel warranted—nay I feel called upon, to repel the unjustifiable insinuations which have been made against them. However, to obviate conclusively any objection on this ground, it has been suggested by a friend of the bill, [Mr. SEVIER,] that the 65 per cent. payable to the United States, shall at once be paid by the purchaser to an officer of this Government. If gentlemen think it safer to trust individual agents, when they have so often swindled us, rather than the States which never have, (and, I may add, never will,) be it so—the friends of the measure will cheerfully acquiesce in the modification.

But, sir, the bill itself contains the best answer to this objection, and a sufficient guarantee of good faith. It provides, "that on a failure to comply with any of the above conditions, (those before enumerated,) or a violation of the same," &c. the cession made to the State failing to comply, &c. "shall thereby be rendered null and void." In this provision there is an ample remedy, even in the event any one of the States should tarnish her escutcheon by a breach of good faith. By the same clause it is further declared, that "all grants or titles thereafter made" by such State, shall be "null and void, and of no effect whatever." Hence, should such a remote contingency happen, as that which seems to be apprehended, the Judiciary would have jurisdiction; and could peacefully and effectually settle the question.

Gentlemen have objected to the inequality with which the benefits of this measure would be distributed amongst the different States; and have dwelt, more especially, upon the small quantities of the public domain, remaining unsold in the States of Ohio and Indiana, and the large quantities in Missouri and Arkansas: thence, they argue that the latter would be vastly benefited while the former would be very little. Now, sir, this view of the subject is evidently founded on the idea that the bill proposes donations and not sales to the States. Enough has already been said upon the subject to satisfy the Senate that, if the States gain any thing above what has been proposed in other schemes, it would be but a paltry difference. If gentlemen wish to expend their complaints and animadversions on inequalities amongst the States, I would turn their attention to a more striking class—to those under which the younger members of the confederacy now labor. Behold them, sir, not only without the power to sell the unappropriated domain, but cut off from the ordinary sources of revenue, without the power to tax, in some instances, half the lands within their limits. Let them bear in mind, too, that this state of things exists under the solemn declaration by Congress that they shall be, and that they have all been admitted upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever. How long it will continue to exist, Heaven only knows—but perhaps interminably, unless the price shall be graduated according to the quality of the soil. Yet, gentlemen on the other side consider the General Government as having been wondrous kind to the new States; and one of them has illustrated his views by comparing the former to a kind guardian, and the latter as its wards. Let us test the conduct of the General Government by the principles applicable to such a case. Suppose a guardian, having possession of his ward's estate, were to require him to surrender a portion on his arrival at full age, as a condition precedent to his enjoyment of the balance; would it not be regarded prima facie as a fraud? Who, as a judge or juror, would look with any forbearance on such a transaction? And is there not a strong analogy between such a case and the course pursued by this Government as their political guardian toward the new States, upon their admission into the Union—when they are required to surrender a portion of their sovereignty, that they may enjoy the remainder.

Sir, said Mr. C. one of the best features in the measure proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, is that it goes further than any other hitherto offered to remove speedily the just complaint of inequality, to which I have referred, and to place the new States, in truth and fact, somewhat on an equal footing with the older members of the Union. It is the theory of our system that the States should be equal in sovereignty. Under the Articles of Confederation they had the same weight in Congress—each of them having one vote. And under the existing Constitution the principle has been so far preserved that they all stand upon a footing of perfect equality in the Senate. It is certainly not less just that they should have equal rights of sovereignty within their own limits. If they cannot be placed on that footing at once, they have a right to claim the adoption of some measure which will put an end to their present inequality within a reasonable time.

This measure should be acceptable to all parties, more especially to the opponents of the present Administration, on another ground: it will go far to diminish Executive patronage, against which we have heard such repeated denunciations for many years past. It will take from the Executive the appointment of about one hundred and twenty registers and receivers, and six surveyors general, with their numerous deputies and subalterns, now dispersed throughout the new States, at an annual expense of more than three hundred thousand dollars. It has been maintained that very extensive and dangerous influence has been exercised through the instrumentality of so many dependents; and that such might be the case, may be readily imagined. I hope the enemies of Executive patronage will avail themselves of this occasion to evince their sincerity, and vote for a proposition which will, to a considerable extent, remedy the evil of which they complain.

The proposition of the Senator from South Carolina also challenges the support of the friends of retrenchment. Independently of the large amount of expenditure, which I have already noticed as incident to the district land offices, and the other machinery at present required by the system, we should take into the estimate the time which is occupied at every session of Congress in the consideration of the numerous memorials, claims, and other applications connected with the public lands. The committee which had this subject before them at the last session, supposed that the passage of the bill "would probably diminish the business of Congress a third, or a fourth, and shorten the sessions in the same proportion;" and, it seems to me, the experience and observation of every gentleman who has been here for the last ten or twelve years, will fully sustain that opinion. And, if we take the lowest estimate of the committee, is it not apparent that it would save the expenditure of several hundred thousand dollars annually? Then, sir, it is a retrenchment measure, and we have a right to expect the support of all the friends of economy and reform.

Sir, said Mr. C. I have no hesitancy in givin my preference to the bill of the Senator from South Carolina over any other that has yet been submitted to the Senate. The people of the States, including the public land, desire the privilege of pre-emption to be extended to the enterprising settler, who goes into the wilderness, gives it the impress of civilization, and renders it productive: this bill embraces that principle. The same people desire the graduation and reduction of the price of inferior lands which have been in market, and remained unsold, ten, twenty, thirty, and, in some instances, forty years, that they may find purchasers who will improve and cultivate them, and augment the resources of their States: that principle, too, is embraced by this bill.

They are unwilling that this Government should continue to be their perpetual landlord, holding vast domains within their limits exempt from taxation, and yielding nothing for their benefit or that of the Union. They wish to be assured of some probable termination to their present state of colonial dependence. This measure responds to those sentiments. If it should become a law, it will settle definitively the numerous, intricate, and perplexing questions, which are almost incessantly agitating the councils of the nation, and producing collision and controversy between the old and the new States. I submit the question to this enlightened body, whether such results be not desirable. The harmony of the Union was one of the principal grounds on which the States were pressed, and upon which they ultimately agreed to surrender portions of their territorial claims. It is a subject no less worthy of consideration now; and must ever be, so long as "the stability of the general Confederacy" remains desirable.

Sir, I will detain the Senate with but one single further remark. Whatever may be the ultimate purpose of gentlemen, in regard to the bill offered by the Senator from South Carolina, I trust they will, at least, prefer it to that of the Senator from Kentucky, than which, in my opinion, no other measure has ever been brought forward here more prejudicial to the interests of the new States, or more dangerous to the welfare of the Union itself.

SPEECH OF MR. REYNOLDS,

OF ILLINOIS.

In the House of Representatives, December 24, 1840—

On the following instructions which he presented to the House: "That the Committee on the Public Lands report a bill to grant prospective pre-emptions to actual settlers, and to reduce the price to settlers according to the value of the land."

Mr. REYNOLDS having the floor, said:

MR. SPEAKER: I consider it my duty to my "constituents" to present this subject to the House, and to the people. There is no subject that is so interesting to the people of Illinois, and particularly to the district in that State which I have the honor to represent, as that of the proper disposition of the public domain. All other subjects dwindle into insignificance in comparison with this; and as I am well acquainted with the feelings, wants, and wishes, of the people I represent, on this subject, I would be derelict in my duty to them, and be unworthy of the high trust which they have reposed in me, were I to remain inactive on this subject at this or any other session of Congress. I am well aware that this subject, with many members in this House, is extremely unpopular. Many persons residing in the old States, and perhaps some members in this House, consider the public lands belonging to them, as much so as their own plantations on which they reside. To such people as these, I would be pleased to speak. Reason and facts would convince them that they are in an error. They are laboring under a misapprehension of the subject. These lands were ceded to the General Government at a time when the nation was embarrassed with a public debt, occasioned by the war of the Revolution. They were acquired principally to relieve the country from this embarrassment, and to settle and improve them, as other sections of the Union. That these lands were acquired principally to secure the payment of the great national debt existing at that time against the Government, is established by the following resolution, or act of the old Congress, which passed April, 1784:

"Resolved, That the same subject (the cession of the public lands) be again presented to the attention of the said States—that they be urged to consider that the war is now brought to a happy termination, by the personal services of our soldiers, the supplies of property by our citizens, and loans of money from them, as well as foreigners. These several creditors have a right to expect that funds shall be provided on which they may rely for indemnification; that Congress still think that vacant territory is an important resource, and that therefore, the said States be earnestly pressed, by immediate and liberal cessions, to forward these necessary ends, and to promote the harmony of the Union."

This public domain was never designed by the original contracting parties, or by the acts of cession, to become the private property of individuals or individual States. They were acquired for two great objects; first, to secure the national debt, and in the next place to improve and settle them by the American people. One great object of their acquisition being accomplished—the payment of the national debt—they are now in the power of Congress to dispose of them as they may deem just and proper to advance the best interests of the country.

[Mr. EVERETT having called Mr. REYNOLDS to order, the SPEAKER observed that he was not out of order, and that he was at liberty to proceed.]

Mr. R. said: I know well that the gentleman from Vermont desires every thing to be in strict order and form. I complain not of this. This exact adherence of technical order and form is born with some individuals. On those principles for which the gentleman professes so much attachment, I hope to be able to convince him that I am right, and that he will, in the end, support my proposition.

Mr. Speaker, I consider I am in duty bound to say to the Committee on the Public Lands and to this House, that I mean no disrespect to the committee by moving and advocating these instructions. Such instructions are not uncommon. It frequently becomes necessary to move and adopt them. I deem it necessary and proper on this occasion. The Committee on Public Lands have had, to my knowledge, on former occasions, and no doubt have now, numberless memorials and resolutions submitted to them on the subject of the public lands, and the same permitted to remain with them without action. I pretend not to say this will be the case at this session; yet, at any rate, as this is an interesting subject, I deem it my duty to present it to the House in this manner, and at this early period of the session. I have been laboring with assiduity to obtain an opportunity to present to the House a bill with the following title, to wit: "A bill to grant prospective pre-emptions to settlers, and to reduce the price of the public lands to settlers according to the value of the lands;" but cannot succeed as yet. I was prevented once by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD.] This he had a right to do, and of which I complain not. He wishes to debate a proposition, and he can, as I know well, make an excellent written speech.

These are the reasons which induced me to move these instructions, and which will be satisfactory, I hope, to the House and the committee.

There are two propositions contained in these instructions—one for prospective pre-emptions, and the other to reduce the price of the public lands to settlers according to the value of the land. The various modes and manner of carrying out these propositions are left to the judgment and discretion of the committee. The principles of these measures I wish to see settled at once by the House.

It is not strange or unreasonable that my constituents and myself feel such a deep interest and extreme anxiety on this subject. Suppose the old States were prevented from taxing the soil within their limits, and were even compelled to ask of the Congress of the United States permission to locate a road within their limits on the public lands. What would their people and members say on the occasion? Would not their members laboring under this oppression raise a clamor in this House, that could not, and ought not to be resisted? Suppose, by some act, I will not say, wise or unwise, the Bay State, for example, had bartered off her sovereign power to tax her soil, and nevertheless the laws and Constitution of the country had guaranteed to her at the same time that she should remain in the Union, "having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence as the other States." Under these circumstances, would her citizens or representatives in Congress remain silent and satisfied spectators of their own dependence and vassalage? I pretend not to say they would violate their honor and honesty in nullifying the act that caused their degradation; but I do say they would try all honorable means to relieve their country from this condition, and place themselves, as the God of nature had done, on an equal footing with the rest of the American people, and the American States.

This equality of condition and standing with the original States, is all I ask for my constituents, and I ask it to be granted to them on honorable and honest principles. Their rights on this subject are based on the fair and honest construction of the original cession acts, and the equitable and common sense understanding of the pledges of the General Government, given in various acts of Congress.

In the cession act of Virginia is contained this provision: "That the States so formed shall be distinct Republican States, and admitted members of the Federal Union, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States."

The following is the provision contained in the act or "resolve" of Congress of March, 1784, to wit: "Which States shall hereafter become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the original States."

This extraordinary provision is contained in the act of Congress of 18th April, 1818, authorizing the Territory of Illinois to form a State Government, to wit: "And the said State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union, on the same footing with the original States, in all respects whatever."

Giving the cession act, and the several acts of Congress on this subject, a fair and equitable construction, what will be the conclusion? Will any candid man believe that the State of Virginia—a State that has been so signally characterized for her liberality and enlightened policy—had the least intention, at the time she made this liberal and generous cession of the Northwestern Territory to the General Government, that the States formed in this territory should be on a dependent and different footing with "the original States." If the policy of Virginia had been as oppressive as that practised by the General Government on the new States, Kentucky would not yet have finished paying for her lands. If this were the policy, the people of Kentucky would have been compelled to pay for their lands, as those States north of the Ohio river have to do at this time.

It cannot admit of a doubt, because the expression is clear and explicit to the contrary, and the fair and honest construction of the acts of Congress will also compel us to come to the same conclusion.

It is a fundamental principle laid down by the most enlightened and intelligent statesmen and law writers, that a sovereign State or Government has no power to deprive itself of any of its essential attributes of sovereignty. Any alienation of the sovereignty of a Government which would deprive that Government of its ordinary action for the good of the people, would be null and void. The rights of eminent domain must be preserved in a State, or else it would cease to be a Government of such sovereign power as would enable it to act for the good of the people.

The taxing power in all Governments is an essential attribute of sovereignty, and falls most manifestly within the above rule. The conclusion cannot be resisted, that any act by which a sovereign State is deprived of the taxing power, is null and void.

If the State of Illinois were to levy a tax on all the lands within the limits of the State, the subject of the sovereignty of the State would thereby be presented to this nation in an attitude, which, in my humble judgment, would secure success to the State. The reasonable and common sense construction of the doctrine of State rights, would also furnish an argument in favor of the State, that would be unanswerable and irresistible. This appendage to the General Government, of our stupendous land system, weighs like a mill stone around the neck of the States. It is giving the General Government a patronage which the framers of our Constitution never intended; and the sooner the Government can be released from it, on equitable principles, the better for the whole nation.

Yet, notwithstanding the above, I have no idea that the State of Illinois will adopt any policy in relation to this subject that will be harsh or unconstitutional. They have confidence in the honesty and integrity of the American people, and will wait for the ordinary action of the Government to do them justice. The people of Illinois regard the peace and harmony of the Union above all earthly considerations, and will, under the influence of this reason, retain themselves within the bounds of moderation, and a proper regard for self-government. Nevertheless, under these circumstances, and having, as they believe, justice and the laws of the land on the side of the people, is it strange or unreasonable, Mr. Speaker, that they should feel a great anxiety on this subject, and should desire the subject to be urged on the consideration of Congress at all suitable and proper times and occasions.

Were the people of the new States to take fire for their rights, as the Southerners do when an Abolition petition is seen within the walls of this Capitol, this land subject would have been settled long since. Were a convention of all the new States assembled, and make it a common cause among themselves as the gentleman [Mr. PROFFER of Indiana] suggested the other day, the subject would by these means be quieted down, and justice done us. This mode of assembling together is proper and constitutional; and if justice be not done the new States, I hesitate not to say it will be resorted to. Yet, in Illinois, it will be satisfactory to the people at the present time, as far as I am advised, to have the lands reduced in price according to their value, and sold under the prospective pre-emption system.

There can be nothing more just and equitable for both the General and State Governments than the permanent establishment of prospective pre-emptions. In the first place, they are to be confined to a limited and small quantity of the public domain, to wit: one quarter section. This quantity will afford a man in moderate circumstances a small farm on which to settle himself and to raise his family. In the next place, it is confined to the actual settler and to none others. This is also just and proper; as the country is then settled and improved, and the public lands not squandered off to non-residents and speculators. And, in the third place, the revenue of the Government is not injured, but improved.

The following exhibit from the General Land Office shows the amount of sales from 1st July, 1838, to 30th November, and the average price per acre. So it will be seen that the lands sold at a very small fraction more than the minimum pre-emption price:

Land Districts in Illinois.	Amount of acres and purchase money from 1st July, 1838, to 30th Nov. 1840.	Average price per acre.
Shawneetown,	163,048.85	$207,600 54
Edwardsville,	99,745.85	124,692 48
Kaskaskia,	242,034.53	302,619 11
Palestine,	261,323.63	326,673 61
Springfield,	96,453.07	121,170 56
Vandalia,	301,275.12	377,854 65
Danville,	60,269.88	96,692 45
Quincy,	214,349.00	268,202 14
Chicago,	333,677.49	517,726 74
Galena, (now Dixon),	270,763.02	338,494 16
Aggregate,	2,101,945.49	$2,671,746 76
Average price per acre each period,		$1 27 10

The additional settlement and improvement of the country by means of these pre-emptions, would increase the sales of the public lands with much more advantage to the revenue than the small loss of a fraction of a few cents per acre would injure it.

Pre-emptions have been found just and equitable. The Government has so considered it, as we see, Mr. Speaker, that that policy has prevailed until it has ripened into a system. Yet, what is strange, the trouble and expense of granting temporary pre-emptions have been continued in Congress to the present time. The prospective system which I have proposed in the instructions, is much better than the other, in every respect. It will be, amongst other things, a great saving to the Government to cease legislating on the subject, and at the same time it will secure certainty and stability to the actual settler. The time can be allowed for one or two years from and after the time the improvements and settlements are made, so that the pre-emptor can remain secure and in peace on his improvement until the time expires. In that time, the cultivator will be enabled to procure the necessary amount of money to purchase his farm. This will increase the settlement of the country, and at the same time increase also the revenue arising from the sales of the public lands.

Mr. Speaker, I am astonished to find so many individuals in the old States, who are utterly opposed to the growth and prosperity of their younger sisters in the Confederacy. The whole Union is composed of the same common people, and each ought to be proud of the growth and prosperity of the others. This is the case of many of the liberal and enlightened citizens of the Union: but the cold and benighted policy of some is to retard and prevent the increase of wealth and population of the new States. They say, the new States drain the wealth and population from the parent stock, and thereby become, in a short time, mighty empires. Moreover, the strange and unfounded assertion is made, that it is by the liberal and enlightened policy of the General Government, that new States grow and prosper in such an unparalleled manner. "Mark now, how plain a tale shall put these assertions down."

In the first place, it is true, that no country on the globe has prospered, and increased in wealth and population in such extraordinary manner, as the State of Illinois has done within a few years past. The great increase of the popular vote given at the Presidential election in November last, was astonishing to the people of the State, as well as to those out of it. It amounted to ninety-three thousand and thirteen votes. The reason of all this is not what Congress has done for the State; but is to the action of an infinitely higher power that we ascribe the cause of our prosperity and happiness. It is the natural fertility of the soil, the great number of navigable streams surrounding and intersecting the State in all directions, and the congenial and salubrious climate of the country, that have all conspired to render this State the most desirable residence for the masses of mankind of any other country on earth. I may add further, that our State has not only these advantages, but is located on the shore of one of the great inland seas, and has, with these facilities, the means of carrying her products to either the Southern or Northern markets in a few days. One more fact, and then the whole foundation of our growth and prosperity is exhibited to the world; and that is that "no involuntary servitude" does exist in our State.

It must also be recollected that the whole valley of the Mississippi presents one of the largest and most fertile regions of country on the globe. It is almost three thousand miles in diameter in every direction, and its fertility unequalled. This whole region is fast filling up with population and wealth, and no earthly power can arrest it. The die is cast; the old States must surrender at the discretion of justice in a few years. When the old States are filled up to overflowing with their hardy working population, and their workshops and factories are crowded so as to injure and oppress the inmates, then we will give them a hearty welcome in the West, and place them in prosperity on the patrimonial estate of the nation.

Let us turn our attention to the subject, and see what Congress has done for Illinois. It is true that Congress has been graciously pleased to permit us to remain in the Union; and this is about all the blessings we have received, as far as my recollection serves me, from that quarter. We have had granted to us some of our own soil, which was appropriated either for national objects, or to enhance the value of the rest of the public lands, and to expedite the sales of the same. And in return, what have we done? The people in the West found the country a wilderness, inhabited and surrounded by savages. With labor and hardship, persevering through, and overcoming all perils and dangers, they improved the country, and reclaimed it from its original wild state. This was no easy matter to accomplish. Many of the best men, and the most choice spirits, perished in the progress of the work. Sickness, and the danger of the Indian enemy, were frequently visited on the pioneers of the West; and, on many occasions, death was the result. While the people of the West were experiencing all these hardships and privations in settling and improving the country, the other class of citizens in the old States was enjoying the blessings and luxuries of a civilized life, surrounded with all the comforts and enjoyments of which man is susceptible. With our enterprise and labor we have made roads, public and private improvements throughout the country; so that by our work, hardships, peril, and toil, we have given to the public lands almost all the value they possess. What has been the consequence? Lands being thus made valuable, were purchased with rapidity; almost all the money in circulation in the State was paid into the land offices, and scarcely one dollar of it ever returned. Very rarely has there been any disbursements of the public money on national works or otherwise in the State. Heavy drains of money out of the country, and no return, is the policy under which we have been laboring in Illinois for many years. It is the great natural advantages of the country that has sustained us under these circumstances, and not the liberality or generosity we have experienced from the General Government.

The following exhibit from the General Land Office will show the amount of moneys received from the State of Illinois for the sales of the public lands within her limits:

Payments into the Treasury from sales in Illinois from the commencement of the sales to
31 Dec. 1834	-	$3,519,268 78
1835	-	2,461,125 03
1836	-	3,705,013 93
1837	-	1,075,239 73
1838	-	818,923 32
1839	-	1,460,525 65
30 Sep. 1840	-	528,883 01
		$13,568,979 45

The above large amount of money was paid by the citizens of Illinois to sustain the Treasury of the United States, where, at the same time, the citizens of the old States paid not one cent into the Treasury under a similar system of taxation. We consider it unjust to be taxed for our lands when the citizens of the old States had their lands for little or nothing. Nevertheless, I am not disposed to array in hostile attitude one section of the Union against another. Justice will be done us. We have the utmost confidence in the honesty and intelligence of the American people. Time and investigation will do justice on the occasion, and that is, in fact, all that we in the least desire on this or any other subject.

The pre-emption laws are for the peculiar benefit of the poor man; and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the party all over the Union, who have figured so conspicuously and with such success, in the recent campaign of log cabins and coon skins, will now come to the relief of the tenants of log cabins, and carry out in practice their professions. In the heart of the city of New Orleans is a log cabin, decorated in the usual style, with coon skins and a canoe on top; one in Mobile, and one in this city. These cabins, with a thousand others over the Union, stand as so many monuments of professed friendship and attachment for the poor man. These demonstrations cannot be denied, and the poor man will expect the party who have promised so much in this manner, to redeem their pledges. A failure to perform now, in granting the pre-emption rights, will be considered by the real log cabin tenants as abusing their confidence.

It is so manifestly just and right in all respects to grant prospective pre-emptions, that I will submit the subject to the House, and examine in a very brief manner the other proposition—the reduction of the price of the public lands according to their value.

This proposition appears so self-evident to the comprehension of all mankind, and is so intimately connected with the plain principles of common sense, which are recognised by the whole mass of the people, that it seems to me it needs no elucidation whatever. All I wish is for the land to be sold according to its value; and that, too, to actual settlers in limited parcels.

It is frequently stated that the whole country West is fertile, and that the minimum price is cheap for the worst quality of these lands. This is a misapprehension of facts. Although there are great quantities of good land in the West, yet in many of the new States and Territories there is also much of an inferior quality, which is almost entirely valueless. In some of these States and Territories there are barren mountains, and in others swamps and inundated lands near the great rivers. These are not common; but when they do exist it is just and right that this inferior quality of land should be sold as well as the other, so that settlements may be formed throughout the whole country. To settle and improve the country was one of the stipulations of the Government, when it acquired this territory, and to carry out this policy is the honest performance of the contract.

The transactions of the Government in relation to the public soil must be regulated by the common sense course observed amongst mankind. There can be no mystery or miracle practised by the Government so as to sell the public lands different, or adverse to the common sense of the people. Let us test the subject before us with the notions and actions of business men. Suppose an individual has articles to sell—land if you please—and he is in truth and in fact desirous to make sales, having need for the money, and not at all wanting the article which he has for sale, as it is with the case of the United States. After offering the article, or land, for a reasonable time, at public auction, and at private sale, and finds no purchasers, what does he do? It requires no book education to say what to do. He reduces the price, and reduces until a sale is effected. It is not the seller alone that regulates prices, it is the general sense of mankind in relation to money, which is the standard that fixes the prices of all things. Therefore the Government alone has no power to fix an arbitrary price on the public lands higher than public opinion will justify, and that too under the agreement entered into at the time these lands were ceded to the United States.

It will be seen, by the following table from the General Land Office, the time the public lands have been in market in Illinois:

Lands remaining unsold in Illinois on the 30th of June, 1840, that were brought into market, or offered at public sale, during the following periods, viz:			Acres.
From 30th June, 1805, to 30th June, 1810,	-	-	70,837
" 30th June, 1815, to 30th June, 1820,	-	-	4,210,460
" 30th June, 1825, to 30th June, 1830,	-	-	3,409,661
" 30th June, 1835, to 30th June, 1840,	-	-	1,034,994
" 30th June, 1830, to 30th June, 1835,	-	-	1,913,981
" 30th June, 1835, to 30th June, 1840,	-	-	3,357,549
			13,997,682

It appears from the above official statement, that a considerable quantity of land has remained in market, in Illinois, for thirty-five years. These lands have remained in market for sale for more than half the period of our national existence, and are yet "unsold in Illinois on the 30th of June, 1840!" Is this complying with the fair and equitable understanding of the contract made at the time these lands were acquired? These lands remain in the hands of the Government unsettled and unimproved, to the great injury of the country.

I may further add, that the Government stands in need of the proceeds of the sales of these lands. By a fair and reasonable reduction of the price these lands would sell; and thereby the Treasury of the United States be improved and benefited.

In every possible bearing of this subject, and every consequence considered, it seems to be just and right to reduce the price of the public lands to actual settlers, according to their quality and value.

I pretend not, Mr. Speaker, to dictate to the committee, or to this House, the mode and manner of ascertaining the real value of these lands. There may be various modes adopted; but that which seems to me the most reasonable and practical, is to judge the quality and value according to the time the lands have been in market. I do not expect or solicit the indiscriminate reduction of the price of all the public lands before they are offered in market. Nor do I expect them reduced until they are offered for sale during a reasonable time under the present system.

I am not alone in these sentiments. President Jackson, in his fourth annual message, delivered Dec. 4, 1832, presses this subject, in a very forcible manner, on the attention of Congress and the nation. The same recommendations were heartily followed up by Mr. Van Buren, the present Chief Magistrate, and urged on Congress.

I will present to the House an extract from the above message of General Jackson, which will exhibit his sentiments on this subject in a very energetic manner, to wit:

"It seems to me to be our true policy that the public lands shall cease, as soon as practicable, to be a source of revenue, and that they be sold to settlers in limited parcels, at a price barely sufficient to reimburse to the United States the expense of the present system, and the cost arising under our Indian compacts. The advantages of accurate surveys and undoubted titles, now secured to purchasers, seem to forbid the abolition of the present system, because none can be substituted which will more perfectly accomplish these important ends. It is desirable, however, that in convenient time this machinery be withdrawn from the States, and that the right of soil and the future disposition of it, be surrendered to the States, respectively, in which it lies.

"The adventurous and hardy population of the West, besides contributing their equal share of taxation under our impost system, have, in the progress of our Government, for the lands they occupy, paid into the Treasury a large portion of forty millions of dollars; and of the revenue received therefrom, but a small part has been expended among them. When, to the disadvantage of their situation in this respect, we add the consideration that it is their labor alone which gives real value to the lands, and that the proceeds arising from their sale are distributed chiefly among States which had not originally any claim to them, and which have enjoyed the undivided emolument arising from the sale of their own lands, it cannot be expected that the new States will remain longer contented with the present policy after the payment of the public debt. To avert the consequences which may be apprehended from this cause, to put an end forever to all partial and interested legislation on this subject, and to afford to every American citizen of enterprise, the opportunity of securing an independent freehold, it seems to me, therefore, best to abandon the idea of raising a future revenue out of the public lands."

I will also bring to the consideration of this House, the views of Mr. Van Buren on the subject of the graduation of the price of the public lands. They are contained in his message of the 2d December, 1839, to wit:

"The passage of the graduation law, with the guards before recommended, would also, I am persuaded, add considerably to the revenue for several years, and prove, in other respects, just and beneficial.

"Your early consideration of the subject is, therefore, once more earnestly requested."

These sentiments, both emanating from such authority, must have great influence in the adjustment of this question. The exalted station which they both occupied at different periods, gave them the opportunity to contemplate the subject with calm disinterestedness, and to give such judgement therein as will have much weight and influence with their countrymen.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it cannot be found in the history of any nation, save that of the United States, where the public domain has been sold to the people at so high rates, as in our own country. Good grounds may have existed for this policy when we were emerging from a most severe contest in the Revolution, and when we were weak in numbers and wealth at the time we commenced our national existence. These times and circumstances have all passed away. This nation, in population and in wealth, at this time, bears no comparison to itself in former days. It needs no revenue from the public lands, but should derive its resources from an improved and wealthy country. The real wealth and prosperity of the nation is not found in the acres of the public lands held by a doubtful title; but its real wealth and resources are based on an improved and cultivated country, inhabited by an honest and industrious population. This is the wealth and prosperity which the nation will experience, by extending to the West a wise and liberal policy in the adjustment, and in the proper disposition of the public lands. So soon as these measures are accomplished, and the whole country in the West is occupied by farmers, residing on their own freeholds, there will exist a political millennium. After this subject is settled, no common cause of dissatisfaction can exist, nor any other general question can arise that can agitate the whole country, as the present subject of the public lands does.

I sincerely hope these times may soon be experienced in our country; and for their advancement, and their happy consummation, I depend on the good sense and honesty of the American people.

A decisive vote of this House approving of these instructions, would be a considerable step towards the proper and equitable adjustment of this question, and be hailed in my district in Illinois, as the harbinger of good times and good feelings.

SPEECH OF MR. TURNEY, OF TENNESSEE,

In the House of Representatives, January 15, 1841—

In Committee of the Whole, on a bill for the relief of Nathaniel Goddard, Thomas H. Perkins, and others.

MR. CHAIRMAN: The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTINSTALL] the other day, when I inquired of him respecting one of the petitioners, Thomas H. Perkins, seemed to deny my right to do so, and doubted the propriety of answering my inquiry, on the ground that it was irrelevant to the case, and improper in itself, and that his answer could not and ought not to have any influence upon the question. In order that the House may judge of the relevancy and propriety of my question, I will read from the Intelligencer the question I propounded, and his answer, as they are reported in that paper:

"Mr. TURNEY rose, and said he wished Mr. SALTINSTALL to inform him whether the Thomas H. Perkins, who appears to be one of the parties interested in this bill, was the same Thos. H. Perkins who was one of a committee sent by the Hartford Convention to Washington, in 1814, to ask Mr. Madison to resign the Presidency of the United States.

"Mr. SALTINSTALL said he did not recognise the right of the gentleman to put such a question; nor was he certain that he ought to answer it; it was irrelevant to the case, and improper in itself, and the answer to it could not properly have, and ought not to have, any influence on the question before the House. This House, the country, and the gentleman himself, knew very well who Thomas H. Perkins was. The Thomas H. Perkins who is a party in the present claim is, probably, the Thomas H. Perkins alluded to by the gentleman; but he was as pure, as virtuous, as honorable, as high-minded, and as patriotic a man as the country contained."

Now, I submit to the House whether this inquiry was not relevant and proper, and whether the answer of the gentleman does not elucidate the merits of the question before the House. What is the question? It is, as I understand it, that, notwithstanding the ship Ariadne had violated the laws of the United States in having on board a British license, and was therefore legally and rightfully condemned, yet the petitioners claim that the amount of the forfeiture accruing to the Government for the vessel and her cargo ought to be refunded to them, because the petitioners were ignorant of the law, and acted in good faith to the Government. If this were true, there would be some equity in the claim. To establish these facts, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SERGEANT] and the chairman of the Committee of Claims [Mr. RUSSELL] and, also, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTINSTALL] all directed the whole force of their arguments. Whether they succeeded in convincing the House, I am unable to tell; but I can say, that they did not satisfy me. How are we to ascertain whether the petitioners had a knowledge of the laws? And how are we to arrive at their intentions in violating those laws? The fact is not only proven, but admitted by the petitioners themselves, that the ship and cargo had been forfeited by its owners, and legally and properly condemned. Further, the fact that Cadiz, the Spanish port to which the ship was bound, was known to be in possession of the British, has not, and, I presume, will not be denied. That this cargo of flour was used by the British forces, at a time when there was a war between England and the United States. If this flour was furnished to the British with a full knowledge of the existence of the war, and with an intention to aid and assist the enemy, it was treason against our Government, for which the petitioners, instead of being relieved by the passage of this bill, deserved to be hung until they were dead. Then, sir, the intention with which the petitioners carried on this illegal trade with a hostile nation, becomes a most important inquiry in the consideration of this bill. The acts of men serve as an index to their secret thoughts and designs. If the petitioners were shown to be patriotic friends of their country in the prosecution of the war of 1812, it would go far to prove the absence of a criminal intent in prosecuting their commercial transactions. But if, on the contrary, it should be shown that they were in the constant habit of affording to the enemy all the aid and assistance in their power, it would, in my judgment, be conclusive evidence of treason. The object of my inquiry was to ascertain whether Perkins (one of the petitioners) supported his Government during the war, or whether he was in any wise connected or identified with the Hartford Convention.

It having an important bearing on the merits of the question now before the House, I wished to know whether he sanctioned or approved the treasonable designs and proceedings of this ever memorable convention. If so, and I expect to prove it before I take my seat, instead of regarding him "as pure, as virtuous, as honorable and as high-minded, and as patriotic a man as the country contained," I shall not hesitate to denounce him as a traitor to American liberty, and not entitled to sympathy or relief from freemen.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTINSTALL] admits that one of the petitioners is the identical Thomas H. Perkins who was of the committee sent to this city in 1814 by the Hartford Convention, to ask Mr. Madison to resign the office of President of the United States. Now, sir, before I inquire into the merits of that famous convention of which Mr. Perkins was the advocate, and afterwards one of its missionaries to Washington, I propose to examine the part he took in the earlier stages of the war. I think I shall be able to show that he was virtually engaged in a conspiracy against his Government from the beginning of the war to the time that the news reached him of the treaty of peace, and the no doubt still more unwelcome news to him, the overthrow of his British friends at New Orleans. Here let me remark that this news reached him, while acting as minister plenipotentiary of the Hartford Convention. I now hold in my hand a document, the title of which is "WHIGERY IS FEDERALISM," prepared with great care and accuracy by two highly respectable gentlemen of Massachusetts, for which they are entitled to the thanks and gratitude of their countrymen, and I now sincerely tender mine; they are Charles G. Greene and B. F. Hallett, esqs. From this document, I hope to establish, to the satisfaction of this House, that Mr. Perkins is one of the last men in the Union who should ask or expect to receive any favors at the hands of his country. I will call your attention, sir, to the following paragraph:

"In the Massachusetts Senate, October 8th, 1814, Harrison Gray Otis reported the bill for the Hartford Convention, which was carried, 22 to 12. Its principal advocates were Messrs. Otis, Quincy, and White, all now Whigs. Of those who voted for it, there are now living Josiah Quincy, President of Harvard University, Harrison Gray Otis, THOMAS H. PERKINS, and Daniel Sergeant, of Boston."

Here, sir, we find Mr. Perkins, in the Senate of the State of Massachusetts, voting for the Hartford Convention. The objects and design of that convention I will show before I shall resume my seat; for the present, I will proceed with Mr. Perkins. We next find him voting for a resolution which declared, that in a war like the present, (1812,) waged without justifiable cause, it was not becoming a moral and religious people to express any approbation of military exploits. Sir, he did not stop at this: he went further, and voted for a report of a committee, which is as follows:

"The resolve of the 13th of June is in itself highly correct and expedient to form the grounds of constitutional opposition and patriotic discouragement to the prosecution of the war."

"This passed, 20 to 8; and the survivors who voted for it were Josiah Quincy, Thomas H. Perkins, Samuel Putnam, Silas Holman, Daniel A. White, S. C. Allen, Solomon Strong, Nahum Mitchell, and James Richardson, of Dedham—all but Mr. Allen prominent Harrison men, and all now holding Whig State offices, three of them being judges in the land."

The sentiment expressed in this report is, that it is constitutional to oppose, and patriotic to discourage, the prosecution of the war—a high-toned Federal sentiment—it is even more—it is the sentiment of a Tory. This is Federal patriotism for you, and I am free to admit that Mr. Perkins has as much of that kind of patriotism as any man in the whole country. Yes, sir, to oppose the prosecution of the war was considered constitutional and patriotic—it was so established by the Federal party in their legislative enactments of the State of Massachusetts—and it is no doubt the kind of patriotism to which the gentleman from Massachusetts alludes in his eulogium on the character of Mr. Perkins; if so, I think it well bestowed. Even after the war was over, so late as 1824, when there was scarcely a division of opinion in regard to the war, Mr. Perkins's patriotism remained the same as it was when he sailed his vessel under a British license. It was in that year that the Democratic party elected a majority of the members of the Legislature of Massachusetts, and an attempt was made to relieve the journal of those disgraceful resolves which had been placed upon it eleven years before. A few lines read from this valuable document, will show the part Mr. Perkins acted:

January 17, 1824, "That the resolve of the 15th of June, 1813 and the preamble thereof, be, and the same are hereby EX-PUNGED from the journals of the Senate."

The survivors who voted against the expunging, are Thomas H. Perkins and Peter C. Brooks of Boston.

Here, sir, we see that Mr. Perkins acted in accordance with his old Federal feelings and principles. In opposition to the Democratic party in the effort to expunge the disgraceful resolution that it was unbecoming a moral and religious people to rejoice at their country's victories, he, true to the Federal party, and uncompromising in his hostility to the Republican measures of the Government, reiterated one of the most odious sentiments that ever received the sanction of legislative enactment in this country. Yes, sir, in the whole of his career, so far as the history of the times brings it to my view, he has been uniform and consistent in opposing the best interests of his country. He was at first kind and liberal in supplying the British with provisions in direct violation of the laws of the United States; and in the next place aided and abetted the treasonable assemblages at Hartford, in their unholy efforts to destroy the Government. Yet we are told by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SALTONSTALL] that Mr. Perkins is as patriotic as any man in the country! The gentleman must mean in the whole country of Massachusetts, and with particular reference to the Federal party in that State; for I am certain that his remark would not apply to Tennessee. Nor do I imagine that any person in the State of Massachusetts would endorse the eulogy which has been pronounced upon Mr. Perkins on this floor, unless it be by those whose opinions corresponded with those who voted for the resolutions which declared it constitutional to oppose, and patriotic to discourage, the prosecution of the war. In this kind of patriotism I am free to admit that Mr. Perkins has few rivals of equal pretensions.

I will prove to the House that it was not only held to be patriotic to supply the enemy with money and provisions, and every other aid and assistance which could be afforded, but it was regarded by the patriots of the Federal school as disgraceful and infamous to afford aid to the Government in prosecuting the war. I will read the proof of this.

"At this awful moment the disorganizing, the Jacobinical idea was not unfrequently advanced in our coffee houses and in our streets, that the war having been begun by the Democrats, they must carry it on; that they had no right to call on the Federalists for assistance, which the latter ought not to afford; that if the Democrats compromised the honor and interest of their country by dishonorable peace, the Federalists should take the power out of their hands, and then contend for the violated honor and dignity of the country; that the British could not, nor consistently with a regard to their honor, ought they to treat with Mr. Madison, who should be compelled to resign; with a vast variety of the same patriotic doctrines, which were publicly promulgated in some of our newspapers. At the same time a few desperate men were preparing to add to the general distress and difficulty by a dissolution of the Union."

Sir, this needs no elaborate comment from me. It was asserted to be a war commenced by the Democrats, that the Democrats should carry it on, and that they had no right to call on the Federalists for assistance, and that none ought to be afforded by the latter. Thus, according to the Federal creed, it was not a national, but a Democratic war; and pursuing the same mode of reasoning, it was patriotic in the Federalists to refuse lending money to Government, and to discourage enlistments of men to prosecute the war. Perhaps, under patriotism of this kind, a justification could be found for supplying the enemy with provisions. Sir, there is another idea expressed in this extract, which strikes my mind with great force; it is what the "British could not, nor consistently with a regard to their honor, ought they to treat with Mr. Madison, who should be compelled to resign." Why could they not consistently with their honor, treat with Mr. Madison? and why should he be compelled to resign? Was it because they had entered into treaty, alliance, or engagement with the Federal party of the United States, wherein they had promised or agreed not to treat with Mr. Madison? or had they promised or agreed to assist the British in forcing him to resign, and which the Hartford Convention attempted to execute by sending a committee, of which Mr. Perkins was one, to demand the resignation of the President? Was it the object and intentions of the high contracting parties in forcing Mr. Madison to resign, to place the Federal party in power in order that they might so change and remodel our form of Government so as to make it meet the views of the Federalists and the British? How was Mr. Madison to be forced to resign? Was it to be done by the British bayonet, sustained and supported by the Federal party of the United States? If this was not the understanding between the contracting parties, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] or some other Federalist can inform us what it was. I will not dwell longer on this passage; the evidence is stronger and more conclusive than any argument I can adduce. I will now read another extract from the same book, page 312:

"Men in the 'moral and religious' town of Boston are obliged to lend their money to their own Government by stealth. But in the face of day, within the knowledge of a whole community, they send specie to the common enemy; can human nature sink lower? They are 'too moral and too religious' to rejoice at the victories of their fellow-citizens; but they are neither 'too moral, nor too religious' to aid the enemy to victory. An age of penitence in sackcloth and ashes would not efface this foul blot from the escutcheon of Boston."

This, sir, is a sample of the Federal patriotism—constitutional and patriotic, agreeable to legislative enactments of the State of Massachusetts to which I have referred. I will not consume more of your time in reading from this volume to prove the opposition of the Federalists to the war, and having shown that during that gloomy period they were engaged in supplying the enemy with money and provisions, I shall turn my attention to Mr. Perkins and the Hartford Convention; the part he took in getting up that Convention, and his endeavors to enforce its resolves. It remains to show the objects and designs of its authors.

[Here Mr. T. was interrupted by Mr. WINTHROP of Massachusetts, who called him to order, alleging that it was out of order to discuss the merits of the Hartford Convention on this bill; but the CHAIR decided that Mr. TURNER was in order. Mr. TURNER then proceeded, when he was again called to order for the same cause. The CHAIR adhered to its former decision, from which an appeal was taken; when a number of Whig members alleged that it was out of order to discuss the merits of the Hartford Convention on this bill. Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts then rose and requested his colleague to withdraw his appeal, remarking that the discussion was out of order, but he hoped that the appeal would be withdrawn, and Mr. TURNER permitted to conclude his speech; and he expressed the further hope that none of his colleagues would reply to it. The appeal was then withdrawn, and Mr. TURNER proceeded.]

Mr. Chairman, is it not remarkable that I am so often interrupted by gentlemen in calling me to order? and is it not more remarkable still, that in every instance it is done by the Whig members of this House. Why is this? Have I attempted to discuss party politics? Have I not confined my remarks to the merits of this bill? Why are the Whig members so exceedingly sensitive whenever the subject of the Hartford Convention is mentioned? Why shrink from this investigation? Is it because they shudder at the conduct of their own party, or is it because they are apprehensive that the identity will be shown and expressed of the modern Whigs with the old Federal party, as it easily can be, and often has been done? Where were the old Federalists in the late Presidential election? Were they not all good and true Harrison Whigs! Mr. Perkins voted for Harrison; the old Hartford Convention Federalists voted for Harrison, and they are now the leaders of the Whig party coming into power. They do not desire that the people should know this, and hence their great uneasiness, whenever the subject is mentioned. On the contrary, it is a part of their system to conceal their real designs, just as they did during the war; for exposure is certain defeat to their party. Sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CALHOUN] hopes that my speech will not be replied to; no doubt of it; because he knows that my facts cannot be controverted, and that the conduct of his party is indefensible. An attempt to reply would confirm my facts and give strength to my arguments; he is therefore right in requesting his colleagues to be silent. Now, sir, I will proceed to show the objects and designs of the Hartford Convention; in doing which I will not ask the House to take my statements, but will rely upon the proof of others. I will now read a letter of Mr. Aaron Wallis, who is vouched for as a gentleman of high respectability, and a worthy member of the church.

Here Mr. TURNER read as follows:

"Sir: After perusing Mr. Parmenter's speech, in relation to the Hartford Convention, I find a very important part omitted viz: the view the British took of their assembling together."

"Being at that time at Halifax, a prisoner of war, at work, with John Shatswell, of Salem, and Alexander Black, of New York, in the King's Store, on the north side of the Parade, at Melville Island, in the winter of 1814, one Major Nickholde, or Nichols, of the 90th or 92d regiment, (I think the 92d,) acting, as was said, as assistant quartermaster general of his majesty's forces at Halifax, came on to the island about 2 o'clock, p. m. After transacting some business with the royal artilleryman, with relation to the telegraphic flags, &c. he came into the store, where Shatswell and myself were making a chest of drawers, and Black a sleigh, all for Captain Cuttchett, of the royal navy, the transport agent for prisoners, and said, 'Well, boys, what are you at?' 'At work for the agent, sir.' After inquiring as to our fare, treatment, &c. he said, 'Well, boys, where do you belong?' Shatswell and myself hailed from Salem, and Black from New York. 'How long have you been here?' We answered according to time; when he immediately said to Shatswell and myself, that we should be sent home in a few days, as the Nantucket men had been. We inquired the cause; and he immediately stated, that 'a convention of delegates from the New England States meet this day at Hartford, for the purpose of withdrawing from the Union, and declaring their neutrality, when all the New England men will be sent home, as the Nantucket men have been, immediately.'

"We made inquiry how this was to be brought about; and he replied, 'The whole has been arranged. The fleet in Boston Bay will watch a favorable wind, and appear off the light, when the troops at South Boston will take up their line of march through Boston for Charlestown, ostensibly for the protection of the navy yard, but in fact to prevent Commodore Bainbridge from shedding blood. The fleet will sail up past the Castle, without firing a gun; and the troops at Charlestown will immediately march into the navy yard; and the choice officers, already selected, will surround Commodore Bainbridge, and say to him, Sir, do yourself no harm; you must not burn powder this day; and no one will hurt you. The fleet will anchor off Long Wharf, and all will be quiet immediately, as the naval commander has his orders to place Harrison Gray Otis at the head of affairs, until the pleasure of the Prince Regent is known. All this has been arranged among the leading men, but will not be made public until the fleet anchors off Long Wharf?

"Black inquired, 'what will you do with me?' 'As you belong to New York, you must ride it out; we shall not go to New York—only to the New England States.' 'By God,' said Black, 'you had better not go there; you will find old Tompkins at home!'

"So sanguine was Major 'Nickhols of the success of the whole plot, that he declared his belief that the five-striped flag would fly at the State-house in less than one fortnight. He further stated that we should know all about in a few days, as a gun-brig or sloop-of-war, (I think a gun-brig,) had sailed for Castine, a week ago, to fetch down the news, and would be back shortly, when we should know all about it.

"Sir, when you were at Ipswich, last fall, I stated to you that I supposed I was in possession of some facts in relation to the Hartford Convention that I was desirous of making known, but dared not, for fear of the consequences to my family. The above are the facts alluded to at that time. They are now at your disposal, provided you work them into the history of our country, where they belong.

"Your obedient servant,

"AARON WALLIS.

"To B. F. HALLETT, ESQ.

"Ipswich, June 24, 1840."

Sir, does not this letter prove a settled purpose and systematic plan of the Federal party to dissolve the Union, and trample under foot the fairest fabric of human liberty ever conceived by man? Can any one doubt it? It may be said by some sceptic, who is either unwilling to believe, or is fearful that the people will see into the unhallowed objects of the Federal party, that this is only the statement of Mr. Wallis, and that they will not, and ought not, to condemn the whole party on the testimony of a single witness. Sir, this would be enough; but I will go further, and sweep from under them even this flimsy defence. I have abundance of testimony yet to submit, which corroborates the statements of Mr. Wallis, and testimony, too, which I do not suppose that any will dare to question. I will now read an extract from the British United Service Journal of May, 1840:

"Among the many dangers to which the American Republic must always be exposed in a war with Great Britain, not the least is that of a split among themselves, and consequent break up of their Federal Union. The slave question is a wedge strong enough to effect this at any time; but we could employ another nearly as powerful."

After stating that the Western States were in favor of the war, the British writer adds:

"Not so with the New Englanders: they, on the contrary, began to cast about to see how they could best extricate themselves from the strait to which the mad policy of Mr. Madison and the General Government had driven them. The inhabitants of the island of Nantucket made an overture to our commander-in-chief to remain perfectly neutral during the war, excluding the armed vessels of both belligerents from their harbors; whilst in another quarter, a far more extensive scheme of 'nullification' was seriously set on foot, and began to make a rapid progress amongst some of the most respectable and influential inhabitants of New England."

"Which thus originated the Hartford Convention; and the object of that body, the British writer says:

"Was to separate the Northern and Eastern from the Southern and Western States, to establish a limited monarchy in the first named States, placing one of our princes of the blood on the throne, and strengthening the new transatlantic kingdom by an alliance offensive and defensive with England. The treaty at Ghent put a stop to the correspondence, which was in active progress on this subject; but that correspondence is still in existence, and however improbable it may appear to Yankee pride, were a war to break out again between us, something similar would occur before the 'United States' were two years older. The destruction of the public buildings at the nominal seat of the Federal Government, it was conceived would indirectly, if not directly, forward the views of the New England separatists."—United Service Journal of May, 1840.

Sir, I will not offer one word of comment on this proof, which is so conclusive in itself that any comment of mine would only tend to mystify that which is of itself clear and certain. I will only add that this proof corroborates and sustains the statement of Mr. Wallis; and now I will proceed with my proofs. The next thing is the instructions of Governor Craig to the celebrated John Henry, and Mr. Henry's letter to the Governor, and which are as follows:

"Governor Craig's instructions to Henry, dated

QUEBEC, February, 1809.

"I request you to proceed with the earliest conveyance to Boston—to obtain accurate information. The wealth of Massachusetts—the number of its inhabitants—the known intelligence and ability of several of its leading men, must give it a considerable influence over the other Eastern States, and will probably lead them in the part they are to take. Your judgment and connections there will guide you."

"I use general terms in describing the object in view. It has been supposed, that if the Federalists of the Eastern States should be successful, and obtain the decided influence which may enable them to direct the public opinion, it is not improbable that, rather than submit, they will exert that influence to bring about a separation from the general Union. How far, in such an attempt, will they look to England for assistance, or be disposed to enter into a connection with us?"

"You are not to appear as an avowed agent—continue to obtain an intimacy with the leaders, and cautiously advise them, that if they wish to enter into any communication with this Government, you will transmit it to me."

Henry, in his letter to his employer, thus described, in 1809, what actually was begun, and, but for the peace, would have been consummated in 1816.

"Boston, March 6, 1809.

"I have already given a decided opinion that a declaration of war is not to be expected; but, contrary to all reasonable calculation, should Congress possess spirit and independence enough to place their popularity in jeopardy by so strong a measure, THE LEGISLATURE OF MASSACHUSETTS WILL GIVE THE TONE TO THE NEIGHBORING STATES: WILL DECLARE ITSELF PERMANENT UNTIL A NEW ELECTION OF MEMBERS: INVITE A CONGRESS, TO BE COMPOSED OF DELEGATES FROM THE FEDERAL STATES, AND ERECT A SEPARATE GOVERNMENT FOR THEIR COMMON INTEREST. A. B."

Thus it seems that the reasonable plans of the Federal party had been so far matured, that the British Government had a secret agent in the United States as early as 1809, aiding and assisting the Federal party in devising and executing the plan of not only the dissolution of the Union, but the establishment upon its ruins of a monarchial form of Government. This is not all the evidence I shall submit. I have reserved for the last, what no Whig in this House will dare to call in question; I allude to a letter written by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS.] It is dated in 1828:

Extract from Mr. Adams's letter.

"It was in those letters of 1808 and 1809, that I mentioned the design of certain leaders of the Federal party, and the establishment of a Northern confederacy, &c."

"This plan was so far matured, that the proposal had been made to an individual, at the proper time, to be placed at the head of the military movement which, it was foreseen, would be necessary for carrying it into execution."

"The interposition of a kind Providence averted the most deplorable of catastrophes, and turning over to the receptacle of things lost upon earth, the adjourned convention from Hartford to Boston, extinguished (by the mercy of Heaven, may it be forever!) the projected New England confederacy."

Now, sir, you have the object and designs of the Hartford Convention portrayed in language not to be misunderstood, and from the highest sources of authority. After producing as much of such evidence as that which I have read to the House, it can scarcely be deemed necessary for me to repeat that the design of the projectors of the Hartford Convention, and of those who participated in it, was the destruction of our present form of Government and the substitution of a monarchy. Sir, I would ask where are the surviving friends of the Hartford Convention? They are to be found in the ranks of the modern Whigs. Ask Harrison Gray Otis, Thomas H. Perkins, or any of their associates during the last war, who they supported in the late Presidential contest? My word for it, they will tell you that they voted the Whig ticket. Such men as those I have just mentioned, compose the leaders of the modern Whig party—they put General Harrison into nomination, and by means which I shall not stop to discuss, have elevated him to power; and by virtue of his elevation, we need not be surprised if the Hartford Conventionists, under the next Administration, should be the most conspicuous persons and leaders. It is upon such men the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTENSTALL] passes such high wrought eulogiums. But to the bill. Did Mr. Perkins know that this cargo of flour was intended to feed the British forces? What did the public prints of that day say on the subject? To show you, I will read a paragraph from Niles's Register, published in 1812:

"In twelve months, the United States sent to Spain and Portugal to supply the British and allied armies, &c. 7,000,000 bbls. of flour. The editor of a British paper makes the supply hereafter a matter for 'serious consideration,' having heard of our embargo. This 'serious consideration' will become much more serious when the news of war reaches England, unless, indeed, the British Ministry should pursue the kind policy that some of their friends in the United States have already proposed to adopt, which is of granting licenses to American vessels to carry provisions to those countries; provided always, nevertheless, the Government and people of the United States shall generously agree to nourish their enemies, and prolong the war, for the more pleasure of fighting."

Was it the object of the owners of the Ariadne to supply the British forces with provisions? If a doubt remains of this being the object of the petitioners, I think it will be dissipated on reading the British license which was found on board at the time the ship was captured. I will read it to the House; it forms a part of the report of the committee upon this claim:

"To the commanders of any of his Majesty's ships of war or private armed vessels belonging to subjects of his Majesty."

"Whereas, from a consideration of the great importance of continuing a regular supply of flour and other dry provisions to the ports of Spain and Portugal, it has been deemed expedient by his Majesty's Government, that, notwithstanding the hostilities now existing between Great Britain and the United States of America, every protection and encouragement should be given to American vessels laden with flour and other dry provisions, and bound to the ports of Spain and Portugal; and, whereas, in furtherance of these views of his Majesty's Government, and for other purposes, Herbert Sawyer, esq. vice admiral and commander-in-chief of his Majesty's squadron on the Halifax station, has directed to me a letter, under date of the 5th of August, 1812, (a copy whereof is herewith annexed,) and wherein I am instructed to furnish a copy of his letter, under my consular seal, to every American vessel so laden and bound, either to any Portuguese or Spanish ports, and which is designated as a safeguard and protection to such vessel, in the prosecution of such voyage: now, therefore, in pursuance of these instructions, I have granted unto the American ship Ariadne, Bartlett Holmes, master, burthen three hundred and eighty-two and two ninths fifths of a ton, now lying in the harbor of Alexandria, laden with flour, and bound to Cadiz or Lisbon, the annexed document to avail only for a direct voyage to Cadiz or Lisbon, and back to the United States of America. Requesting all officers commanding his Majesty's ships of war, or private armed vessels belonging to subjects of his Majesty, not only to suffer the said ship Ariadne to pass without any molestation, but also to extend to her all due assistance and protection in the prosecution of her voyage to Cadiz or Lisbon, and on her return thence, laden with such other merchandise to the nett amount of her outward cargo, or in ballast only.

Given under my hand and seal of office, at Boston, this fifth [i. e.] day of September, A. D. eighteen hundred and twelve.

ANDREW ALLEN, Jr.

His Majesty's Consul."

Now, sir, I have submitted to the House all the facts and circumstances in this case, upon which it seems to me that there scarcely can be a doubt as to the character of the traffic and intercourse which the British license itself informs us that it was the great importance of obtaining supplies of provisions which induced the British Government to grant such a safeguard to American vessels. Of what then were the delinquent ignorant? Was it of the fact that the law prohibited it? Did they not know it was wrong in itself to supply the enemy of their country with provisions? Whether the law prohibited it or not, they knew that it was aiding an enemy to defeat their own countrymen. Surely they were not so ignorant as all this. No, sir, they were acting upon the principle or their party—that it was right and praiseworthy to aid and assist the enemy and infamous to support their own Government.

Mr. Chairman, I am much astonished that any committee of this House could be induced to report and recommend the passage of this bill, while those who really fought for their country are denied payment for their horses lost in the public service. Yet, with this denial of justice staring us in the face, we are called upon to reward not only traitors in feeling, but those who availed themselves of a British protection to aid and assist an enemy in time of war! I am the more astonished at this when I reflect upon the difficulties existing at this moment—we are now threatened with another war with England; and judging from the past, we might again expect to see these same patriotic men, and all who would be influenced by their example, engaging in the old trade of supplying the enemy with money and provisions; and if you succeed in detecting their treasonable practices, they will again ask you to remit the penalty, quoting this case as a precedent. For one, I will never give my assent to the passage of this bill. No, sir; never.

To prove that the Federal party, which is coming into power by the election of Gen. Harrison under the revered but delusive name of Whig, and to show that the change of name from Federalist to that of Whig, was a mere device to resuscitate the old Federal party, and bring it into power, I have thought it advisable to publish the annexed extracts as an appendix to my speech:

"In 1812, at a Federal convention held in Brentwood, Mr. Webster reported resolutions justifying the public enemy, and condemning his own Government."

While in Congress, he opposed the war at every step. Among volumes of speeches, denouncing the war and the Administration, he said:

"Utterly astonished at the declaration of war, I have been surprised at nothing since. I saw how it would be prosecuted when I saw how it was begun. There is an unchangeable relation between rash councils and feeble execution."

"They (the Federalists) know the limit of constitutional opposition. Up to that limit they will walk, and walk fearlessly."

He thus exulted at the defeat of our arms and the murderous inroads of the savages:

"This is not the entertainment to which we were invited. We are told that these disappointments are owing to the opposition, which the war encounters. This is no new strain. It is the constant tone of every weak or wicked Administration!"

Let the recorded votes of Mr. Webster in Congress show where he was and ever has been.

July 1, 1813, Daniel Webster voted against a bill for assessing and collecting taxes to sustain the war; July 9th, against a bill for duties on refined sugars and sales at auction.

January 7, 1814, he voted against a bill to fill the ranks of the army; January 10, against a bill to detect and punish traitors and spies; January 22, against a bill to enlist troops during the war, in a minority of seven; January 25, against enforcing the non-importation laws; February 8, against raising five regiments; March 29, against calling out the militia to execute the laws and repel invasion; December 1, against providing revenue for maintaining the public credit; December 10, against calling on the States for their quotas of militia to defend the frontiers, on the 19th, against a bill to provide for the expenses of the war, and against a bill to provide for rebuilding the Capitol and public offices which had been burnt by the enemy!

In the same spirit, in 1836, when we were threatened with a French war, and it was proposed to put means in the hands of Andrew Jackson to defend the country, Daniel Webster exclaimed in the United States Senate, "I would not vote for this bill if the enemy were battering down the walls of the Capitol."

A very natural sentiment from the man who voted against rebuilding the Capitol after the enemy had burnt it down.

So much for the army. What did Mr. Webster do for the navy? He now pretends that was his favorite in the war, and the Federalists lately gave him a cane made from wood of Perry's flag ship. What did he do for the navy?

The 7th of January, 1841, Mr. Webster voted against an appropriation of one million for defraying the expenses of the navy! This was less than four months after the victory of Perry on the lakes, so that had the country depended on Daniel Webster, the gallant Perry's flag ship could not have been kept afloat.

The catalogue is not full, but it is sufficient.

And who are Daniel Webster's associates in Massachusetts, and who have made William Harrison the bearer of their standard? We will identify some of the leaders.

WHO WERE THE HARTFORD CONVENTION LEADERS? AND WHERE ARE THEY NOW?

At his speech at Alexandria, June 11, 1840, Daniel Webster, who appointed General Harrison his "standard bearer," exclaimed:

"Fellow citizens, we must not stop or falter in our opposition to the Administration, till our lost prosperity is restored!"

When the Federal Massachusetts Legislature assembled to oppose the war, preliminary to the Hartford Convention, Benjamin Russell exclaimed in his Centinel:

"All the branches contain majorities of the friends of peace; and whatever can be done to restore their country to its lost prosperity, will be attempted."—Boston Centinel, May 26.

The Federal measure to restore lost prosperity in 1814, was the Hartford Convention. The Whig measure to do the same in 1840, is to restore the lost influence of the Hartford Convention men, by means of the Harrisburg Convention, under Harrison and hard cider!

LIST OF SURVIVORS WHO VOTED FOR THE HARTFORD CONVENTION.

In the Massachusetts Senate, October 8, 1841, Harrison Gray Otis reported the bill for the Hartford Convention, which was carried, 22 to 12. Its principal advocates were Messrs. Otis, Quincy, and White, all now Whigs. Of those who voted for it, there are now living:

Josiah Quincy, president of Harvard College, Harrison Gray Otis, Thos. H. Perkins, and Daniel Sergeant, of Boston.

Essex.—Samuel Putnam, a Judge of the Supreme Court, appointed by Governor Strong; Daniel A. White, of Salem, Judge of Probate and president of a Bank panic meeting, and also of the great Whig dinner given to Daniel Webster in 1834, when the decapitated figure-head of the frigate Constitution was exhibited by Parker H. Pierce, then chairman of the Boston Whig Committee of Safety, and subsequently the fugitive president of the Whig Commercial Bank; Caleb Fote, the famous Whig Editor of the Salem Gazette, and an ex-member of Governor Everett's Council, is Judge White's son-in-law.

Worcester.—Silas Holman, of Bolton, holds a State office from a Whig Governor.

Hamilton and Franklin.—Samuel Labrop, Samuel C. A. Linn.

Bristol.—Samuel Crocker, of Taunton, member of a great Whig corporation, and an office holder.

Plymouth.—Wilkes Wood, Judge of Probate, and now nominated for Harrison Elector for Plymouth District, by the Whig Convention held at Worcester the 17th of June last—voted for and to approve the Hartford Convention, and to send ambassadors to Washington.

Judge Wood headed the hard cider procession, with canoes and cabins, that marched from Middleborough to Bridgewater, the 4th of July last, to hear Robert C. Winthrop, esq. the Whig Speaker of the Massachusetts Houses of Representatives. Wilkes Wood was chosen a Federal Senator from Plymouth, in 1814, over Nathan Willis, then of Rochester, who was a Republican Senator for that county in 1813, with Seth Sprague, and voted with him for his resolve to build a 71 gun ship, for the use of the United States, to carry on the war, and against Josiah Quincy's resolution not to rejoice at our naval victories. He was chairman of the committee that reported that Marcus Morton was chosen clerk of the Senate in 1813. Mr. Willis, now of Berkshire, is the Democratic candidate for Lieutenant Governor, while Mr. Wood is a candidate for Harrison elector!

Of the above 11 survivors, out of the 22 who voted for the Hartford Convention in the Senate, all but one are Whigs and Harrison men. Mr. Allen, of Franklin, is a decided Democrat. He was one of those whom Mr. Otis described as not exactly Federalists, but "the flying squad." In 1818, in a letter, Mr. Otis speaks of "the Federalists," (or persons composing the majority), for, he adds, there were a few among them a few of the "flying squad" in both Houses, in the session of 1814, when the Convention was formed. Mr. Allen declined voting on the first motion for the Hartford Convention.

Neither can we positively speak as to Mr. Labrop, who has taken no part in politics for some time. All the rest are earnest supporters of Harrison. They are "where they have been and ever mean to be."

SURVIVING MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE.

It is a difficult task to obtain a full list from so numerous a body. In what we have got, we have taken great pains, and carefully studied accuracy. If there is any error, it is inadvertent, and we beg it may be pointed out.

In the House, the years were 260, years 90; for Maine, 41 years, 21 days; for Massachusetts proper, 219 years, 69 days. Those belonging to Massachusetts, who voted for the convention, and are ascertained to be now living, are as follows, as accurately as we can learn. We attach the Whig offices they now hold:

Boston.—Jonathan Hunnewell, (an ex-Whig Senator;) Stephen Codman, (of the Quorum;) Benjamin Russell, (a Justice, ex-Editor of the Boston Centinel, master of Harrison the last 4th of July, ex-member of Gov. Everett's council, &c. &c.); Benjamin Whitman, (ex-Judge of Police under Govrs Lincoln and Davis, of the Quorum;) William H. Sumner, (now of Roxbury, ex-Adjutant General, and Justice of the Quorum;) Benjamin Weld, (now of Maine;) Oliver Keating, of Chelsea; Daniel Messinger, and William Harris, (who were on the committee that gave a pretended mechanics' dinner to Daniel Webster, Prentiss, of Mississippi, and Menifee, of Kentucky, in Faneuil Hall, July, 1833; both have been members of the House;) Geo. G. Lee, (formerly of the Essex Junto;) Lynde Walter, (Justice Peace;) Lemuel Shaw, (Chief Justice of Supreme Court, appointed by Governor Lincoln;) Thomas Barry; Richard Sullivan, (holds a State office;) Benjamin Gorham, (ex-Whig member of Congress;) William Sturgis, (recently of the Senate and House, made a speech in the 10 cent rebellion in Faneuil Hall, May, 1837, said to the enraged assembly that Amos Kendall would be eaten up if he was present.)

ESSEX COUNTY.

Salem.—Dudley L. Pickman, (member of the House in 1834, voted to denounce Jackson for veto of the bank,) Benjamin Hawkes; Elisha Mack, (Judge of Police Court;) John Glen King, (of the Quorum;) and Leverett Saltonstall, (Whig member of Congress, of the Harrison Executive Committee, defender of the (Hartford Convention) faith in Congress, restorer of patriot Presidents, described by John Quincy Adams as "just such a monarchist as Jonathan Jackson, one of Essex Junto, was!" delegate to the "Rebel Convention," with Timothy Pickering, in 1812, master of ceremonies to receive John Roll, when he laid Tennessee at the feet of Webster, in 1837, &c. &c.)

[Mr. Saltonstall must still be a Federalist, or a very bad man; for he says: "A Federalist turned Democrat is the worst of all politicians!"]

Robert Emery, another Salem member, is now of Springfield. E. H. Derby is also living.

Danvers.—Nathan Felton, Sylvester Osborn.

Ipswich.—Joseph Farley, (Justice of Peace.)

Beverly.—Robert Rantoul; Nathaniel Goodwin, (Cashier of Plymouth Bank.)

Gloucester.—James Appleton; Jonathan Kimball, (now of Salem.)

Rowley.—Thomas Gage, jr. (now senior, Whig member of the House in 1833, a Justice.)

Newbury.—Josiah Little.

Newburyport.—Jonathan Gage, (Justice of the Peace;) Isaac Adams, (now of Methuen;) Samuel Newman, (now of Andover.)

Boxford.—Parker Spofford.

Andover.—Timothy Osgood.

Haverhill.—David Howe, (Justice.)

MILKES COUNTY.

Charlestown.—Joseph Hurd, (now of Stoneham;) John Soley, (of the Quorum.)

Cambridge.—William Hilliard, (member of the House in 1833, recently deceased;) Royal Makepeace, (Stock Agent of the Canton Company at Baltimore.)

Medford.—Dudley Hall, (of the Quorum.)

Weston.—Isaac Fiske, (Register of Probate.)

Frammingham.—Abner Wheeler, (of the Quorum, county Commissioner, and a Whig candidate for Senator.)

Reading.—Timothy Wakfield, (Justice of the Peace.)

Groton.—Luther Lawrence, (very recently deceased, Whig Mayor of Lowell.)

NORFOLK COUNTY.

Quincy.—Thomas Greenleaf, (Secretary of the Federal Convention that nominated John Brooks for Governor, in 1822, and now a Justice for the Commonwealth. He is the only survivor of the seven out of all Republican Norfolk, who voted for the Hartford Convention.)

PLYMOUTH COUNTY.

Plymouth.—Barabas Hedge, (just deceased, a Justice;) Benjamin Bramhall, (now of Quincy;) Nathaniel M. Davis, (now a Whig counsellor, elected by a Whig Legislature to advise Governor Morton, member of the Harrisburg Convention.)

BRISTOL COUNTY.

Taunton.—Jonathan Ingalls.

Raynham.—John Gilmore, (Justice peace.)

Norton.—Isaac Hodges.

Somerset.—David Anthony, (Justice.)

Berkley.—Apollon Toby, (now of New Bedford, a Justice of the quorum.)

Troy, (now Fall River.)—Joseph E. Reed, (a big Whig, member of Bristol county Whig convention.)

Westport.—Abner Brownell, (of the quorum.)

New Bedford.—Jireh Swift, (then jun.) J. Williams.

BARNSTABLE COUNTY.

Yarmouth.—James Crowell, (Justice and commissioner.)

Wellfleet.—Josiah Whitman (Justice and ex-postmaster, a Whig)

[Nantucket and Dukes county sent no member.]

WORCESTER COUNTY.

Spencer.—James Draper.

Uxbridge.—Daniel Carpenter; Samuel Read, (of the Legislature in 1837.)

Grafton.—Jonathan Wheeler.

Tenaster.—William Cleveland.

Bolton.—Stephen P. Gardner, (of the quorum.)

Stirling.—Samuel Sawyer, Thomas H. Blood.

Paxton.—David Davis, (then jr.)

New Braintree.—Joseph Bowman, (then jr. member of John Davis's Council in 1834, Justice.)

HAMPSHIRE COUNTY.

Southampton.—Asahel Birge, (Justice.)

Middlefield.—John Dixon, (Justice.)

Granby.—David Smith, (Justice.)

Ansonia.—Simon Strong, (Justice;) Noah Webster, (of dictionary fame, an ardent Whig, in Connecticut.) [Not one NAY in all Hampshire.]

HAMPDEN COUNTY.

Longmeadow.—Calvin Buttrick.

Palmer.—Alpheus Converse.

Blanford.—Alanson Knox.

Chester.—Asahel Wright.

FRANKLIN COUNTY.

Shelburn.—William Wells, (Justice.)

Hawley.—Thomas Longley, (before described.)

Ashfield.—Enos Smith, (now of Granby.)

BENKESIRE COUNTY.

Lanesborough.—Henry Hubbard, (Counsellor of Governor Lincoln in 1833, Whig member of the House, 1836, and of the Quorum.)

Eighty-five members of the House, who voted for the Hartford Convention, now living, [except three just deceased,] and of these all but two are known members of the present Whig party, and supporters of Harrison!

Adding the eleven surviving Senators and the six surviving members of the Hartford Convention, who were not of the Legislature in 1814, and of this aggregate of ninety-nine survivors, all but three are modern Whigs and Harrisonites!

Of the sixty-nine Massachusetts members who voted against the Hartford Convention, but twelve survive. Of these, eight are still Democrats, one unknown, and but three are Harrison Whigs, viz: Lincoln, of Worcester, Gurney, of Boston, and Fish, of Falmouth.

SURVIVING MEMBERS OF THE HARTFORD CONVENTION.

The Massachusetts Legislature chose these delegates to the convention, in convention, October 18, 1814. The Federalists cast 215 votes—the Republicans all refusing to act in this treasonable proceeding.

The survivors of the Massachusetts delegates are: Hon. S. S. Wilde, (Judge of the supreme court;) Harrison Gray Otis, (a member of Congress in 1800, and voted for Aaron Burr against Jefferson;) William Prescott, (an ex judge and justice for the Commonwealth;) Holiiah Baylis, (Judge of probate till 1834;) Daniel Waldo, (Justice of the quorum;) Stephen Longfellow, of Portland; Joseph Lyman, (sheriff of Hampshire, and commissioner to qualify officers;) and Thomas H. Perkins, (one of the commissioners to treat with the President, signed the Whig handbill in 1832, that Pennsylvania had gone against Jackson.)

Of Governor Strong's Council, who advised the Hartford Convention, two only survive, and both are Whigs, viz: Nahum Mitchell, member of the House, and Benjamin Pickman, the son of a distinguished Tory of the Revolution, member of the Essex Junto, and one of the committee to celebrate, in Boston, the restoration of the Bourbons.

The only known survivors of that convention, out of Massachusetts, are correctly ascertained to be, Calvin Goddard, and Roger M. Sherman of Connecticut; Benjamin Hazard, of Rhode Island; and Josiah Dunham, a supernumerary from Vermont, now in Lexington, Kentucky. They are all Harrison Whigs.

Here are one hundred and five of the direct original Hartford Convention school, now prominent Whigs, and Democrats, (?) as is pretended of the Jefferson school! Add to these other survivors who supported legislative measures to get up or approve that convention, seventeen in number, and the prominent men in the primary conventions, still living, eighteen in number; and ligives an aggregate of one hundred and forty-seven men of that school, nearly all in Massachusetts, who are principal advisers and actors in the efforts to restore the days of the black cockade, and, in the language of their expounder, Mr. Webster "have made William H. Harrison the bearer of their standard!"

Who can doubt the character of that flag, when these are the men who rally under it? Who can deny the aptness of the motto on "the significant banner!"

"We are where we ever have been and ever mean to be!"

Trace it still farther. Mr. Otis, in his defence of that convention, (which Mr. Saltonstall, as one of the Harrison Executive Committee declares was a patriotic body,) remarks that the actors in that convention have continued to receive in Massachusetts ample testimonials of public confidence.

This is true. In fact, the principal offices in the State are now held by them; and of those whose names are given in this list, ninety two now hold offices of Whig appointment.

To these men, the prominent Whig counsellors in Massachusetts, General Wilson says, in owing the nomination of General Harrison! Massachusetts did it, and if the Whig party of Massachusetts directed the movement, who doubts that it is what Judge Hopkins of Pennsylvania described, viz: the old Federal party striving again to get into power?

THE HARRISON ELECTORS AND HARTFORD CONVENTION.

Of the fourteen candidates now in nomination for Harrison electors in Massachusetts, all but two apostates are old Federalists, viz:

Isaac C. Bates, secretary of the Hampshire, Hampden, and Franklin Rebellion Convention to resist the war, July, 1812, and orator of the Washington Benevolent Society, and one of the Federal Committee of Safety to oppose the Government during the war, &c. [Mr. Bates continues his warlike propensities against his own Government. At a recent Whig gathering at Greenfield, he advised the Whigs, if they could obtain redress in no other manner, to take down their muskets, and pick their flints!] John B. Thomas, another Harrison elector, is a Federal son of Joshua Thomas, a member of the Hartford Convention.

Robert G. Shaw, another, was a member of the Washington Benevolent Society in 1813, 14, organized as Federal clubs to oppose the war. [See Stebbins's Directory of 1813.] George Grinnell, another elector, was a member of the same Federal conspiracy, and one of the Committee of Safety! appointed in 1812, by the Hampshire and Franklin Federal Convention, to oppose the war.

Wilkes Wood, another elector, voted for the Hartford Convention measures in the Massachusetts Senate; voted to approve the acts of that convention; voted against a vote of thanks to Andrew Jackson for the battle of New Orleans; voted against admitting Louisiana into the Union; voted not to provide for the United States' direct tax to sustain the war of 1814, &c.

EXPORT OF GOLD.—From the Boston Patriot.—It is a notorious fact, that there is at this moment a traffic carried on between the United States and Canada, more destruction to our national interest than an evasion of the embargo, or even partially supplying the enemy with provisions, as its effect are so much more extensive. We mean the taking from this country an immense quantity of GOLD to Canada; and receiving therefor British Government bills. It is well known that thousands of pounds sterling are daily offered on the exchange; and such is the demand for gold, that it will bring upwards of four per cent. advance, for the purpose of the above mentioned traffic. Would it not be well for our Government to take it into serious consideration, and would the British find in difficult to furnish supplies, and to pay their troops, was it not for this intercourse!—Niles's Weekly Register, March 19, 1841.

DISHONORABLE COMPLIMENT.—A late Salem, (Massachusetts) paper, after mentioning a number of small vessels burnt by the enemy on the neighboring coast, says: "That they boarded one with intent to burn her, but discovering she was called the 'Federalist,' observed, they would not destroy her 'for her name's sake,' and she was not destroyed."
[Niles's Weekly Register, June 25, 1814.]

SPEECH OF MR. RHETT,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, January 21, 1841—
On the Treasury note bill.

Mr. Chairman: There are three propositions submitted to the House for supplying the necessities of the Treasury. The first is that submitted by the Committee of Ways and Means—an issue of five millions of Treasury notes—based upon the supposition that the deficiency in the Treasury is but temporary, and that the greater part, if not the whole of the emission, will be redeemed during the fiscal year. The next is the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] a permanent loan of ten millions of dollars. The last, auxiliary to both of these, submitted by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] is taxation upon silks, wines, and linens. The Committee on Manufactures have anticipated one of these expedients of taxation by proposing a bill laying a duty, almost prohibitory, of twenty per cent. on silks only. All of the expedients proposed, excepting that of the Committee of Ways and Means, assume the fact that there is a permanent deficiency in the Treasury, which must be supplied by permanent means, a funded debt, and increased taxation. I propose, sir, to show that no such fact exists, and that the five millions of Treasury notes proposed by the bill immediately under consideration, will be sufficient to relieve the Treasury for the ensuing year.

The permanent deficiency in the Treasury, supposed by gentlemen, has been estimated variously. The gentleman from Maine (Mr. EVANS) puts it at $7,000,000 to $10,000,000; the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] at $16,000,000; my colleague [Mr. THOMPSON] at $15,000,000; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] at $40,000,000. The gentleman from Maine, who commenced all this prodigious cyphering, began his table by taking up the current expenditures of the last year; and then, calling upon those who proposed retrenchment to show in what particulars they could be reduced. The Secretary of the Treasury proposed to reduce them from $22,000,000 in 1840, to $19,000,000 for 1841. Show in what particulars this can be done. The call is a fair one, and ought to be fairly and fully met.

The chief sources for retrenchment, pointed out by the Secretary of the Treasury, are, the public buildings, pensions, the fulfilment of treaties, and removal of Indians. The gentleman from Maine conceded the reduced expenditure of the public buildings of $200,000; but he strenuously combated the two other items of reduction. He showed, from the returns in the Pension Office, that the deaths of the pensioners last year did not, on an average, reach four per cent; but, in his generosity, he allowed ten per cent; and as to the removal of the Indians, there had been appropriated for that purpose, the last year, but $300,000. All the saving from these sources would not reach $1,000,000.

The fallacy of taking the returns of deaths to the Pension Office as the criterion of expenditures in that Department, should have occurred to a far less acute mind than that of the gentleman from Maine. Hundreds of pensioners may die, and yet no statement of the fact be conveyed to the Pension Office. The pension will only not be called for; and after remaining in the hands of the pension officer, the time allowed by law, the money appropriated will be returned to the Treasury. An inference may be drawn that the pensioner is dead; but it cannot be stated to be so officially; and if not dead, he can claim his arrears of pension. And should it not have occurred to the gentleman, that even his ten per cent. might be too small an estimate for the deaths of men between eighty and one hundred years old? Nothing but fraud and perjury could keep up the pension-roll at such a rate of extinguishment; and, if he chooses to assume, in his computation, the deficiency of all moral principle among the Revolutionary pensioners, who chiefly come from his portion of the Union, I shall not take this for granted in my legislation. I take the estimate made, not by the Secretary of the Treasury, but by the Commissioner of Pensions (a man of undoubted capacity and integrity) and the pension bill reported by a committee to the House; and they show an expenditure of $858,455, in 1841, less than was required in 1840.

And now, sir, to the other branch of diminished expenditure—the removal of Indians, and payments incident to their removal. It is true, that all which was appropriated the last year for the removal of Indians was but $300,000. But does not the gentleman know that, for years past, there have always been expenditures from old appropriations falling due, from year to year, which make the appropriations under this head, for any one year, no criterion at all of what may be expended? The table of expenditures, in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, shows a large number of these expenditures; and it is computed that about one-half million more of these old outstanding appropriations was expended the last year than will be needed for the year 1841. There is also a half million now in the hands of the agents of the Government, in the far West, to be paid to the Cherokees. It is not yet known whether this amount is expended. It is charged to the expenditures of 1840; but if not made until 1841, the money will be with the charge to meet it. Here, then, sir, is $1,000,000 more expended in 1840 than will be needed in 1841.

There are two other items, amongst others, of reduced expenditure, not mentioned by the Secretary of the Treasury, which gentlemen on the opposite side, I am sure, will not dispute. This is the short session of Congress; and we will continue assembled nearly five months less time than in 1840. This will produce a saving of not less than $300,000. And, in looking over the expenditures of the last year, I find that as large a sum was expended under old appropriations upon rivers, roads, harbors, and creeks. These appropriations, most happily, are all exhausted; and unless Congress authorizes, at the present session, new expenditures on these objects, none can be made. Here, then, is $600,000 that should also be deducted from last year's expenditure. We will now carry out and foot the bill, and see whether the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the expenditures of 1841 may be reduced some $3,000,000, is very extravagant:

Current expenditures of 1840	$22,439,319
Deduct, for 1841
Public buildings	$201,000
Pensions	858,455
Removal of Indians, &c.	1,000,000
Short session of Congress,	300,000
Roads, harbors, &c.	300,000
	$19,830,894

But to all this the answer is ready at hand. Admitting that there are items of expenditure which can be saved from the expenditures of the last year, there are new charges upon the Treasury in 1841 not taken into computation in the project submitted for its expenditures. Let us look, then, on the other side of the account, and estimate the extent of these charges:

Mr. EVANS—	Navy pension fund	$150,000
	Maine claims	220,000
	Florida war	1,500,000
	Census	500,000
Mr. BELL—	Postponed appropriations for building fortifications	1,500,000
Mr. THOMPSON—	Outstanding appropriations,	10,000,000
	Post office deficiency	1,500,000

Such are the items, with the $4,500,000 Treasury notes unredeemed, which make up the calculation of indebtedness these gentlemen submit against the Government.

I might dispute the expense for the navy pension fund, because it is as yet a bill. I might dispute the Maine claim, because it is but a claim. But, as I think that appropriations ought to be made for these objects, I will yield these items. The Florida war is the only formidable charge; not so much on account of any inherent difficulty in the case, as from the vast sums which have been already engulphed in its prosecution. However clear may be our information, there will be a lingering apprehension that we may not comprehend or truly state the demands this war may require upon the Treasury. The Territorial authorities, acting in combination with the authorities of the Government, tend also to increase our confusion as to our eventual liabilities. We must allow for our doubts, as well as our information.

There has been a demand made by the War Department, of but $250,000, to pay the militia for past services during the last year. This we will admit. There must be a considerable sum due, on the same account, since the close of the last quarter in September, when the financial reports were made up to be submitted to Congress. We will double the amount required to pay past services, and put it at $500,000. But it is said that, some time since, the Secretary of War proposed to the Committee of Ways and Means an appropriation of $2,500,000 to carry on the ordinary operations in Florida; and it is on this ground that the gentleman from Maine estimates an expenditure of $1,500,000. If he had any reliance on this proposal of the Secretary, he ought to have gone the whole $2,500,000 at once. But I think the gentleman has misapprehended the Secretary. This appropriation is required by this department, to support volunteers, (1,500 mounted men, and 500 foot,) to be armed, mounted and equipped, according to the provisions of a bill which passed the Senate, and was reported to this House last session by the Military Committee. It is not asked to support militia, but volunteers, to be enlisted, according to the suggestion of General Jesup, and the provisions of this bill, for twelve months or during the war, as permanent adjuncts to the regular army. Unless, therefore, you legislate the authority, no such large expenditure can be made. But admitting that the appropriation is asked to pay the militia force which may be employed during the ensuing year, in prosecuting the war, does it follow necessarily that the expense will be incurred? The militia can be called out into service but three months; and are gentlemen sure that, if now in service, they will be in service on the 4th of March next? and if then in service, will they be called out by the succeeding President, and be continued in service during the year? The Indians, since the proposed appropriation by the Secretary of War, have been broken up in their strongholds, and are daily coming in; whilst the summer heats are rapidly approaching, when military operations must be suspended. Although there are 4,500 of our regular troops in Florida, I do not say that two millions, or twice two millions, may not be expended during the year, in the prosecution of this war. That will depend upon the succeeding Administration. But I do say, that according to our present information and our future prospects, $750,000 will be a fair estimate for all its necessary expenditures.

The expense of taking the census, $500,000, and the postponed appropriations for fortifications, of $1,500,000 more, are easily disposed of. They constitute a part of the next item, of $10,000,000 of outstanding appropriations, charged by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL] as gentlemen will see by looking over the list in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. We come then at once to this great item of $10,000,000. It constitutes the chief argument—almost the only argument, (for without it no argument would have been pretended,) of indebtedness in the Government, and a deficiency in the Treasury for the wants of the ensuing year. I think I will show that, to represent these outstanding appropriations as liabilities upon the Treasury, for which additional means are to be provided beyond the new appropriations, is a gross fallacy.

Great confusion with respect to this item, resulting in some degree from the imperfect heading of the accounts in the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, has been repeatedly exhibited in Congress. Last year the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON,] and many others, insisted that this item was so much money in the Treasury. Now it is insisted that it is a debt, to discharge which, during the year, means must be provided. It is neither the one nor the other. It is seen in all our annual reports, ranging from ten to twenty millions. Last year it was thirteen millions; this year, ten. It consists of liabilities on the Treasury on account of past appropriations, to complete which the money has not been called for; and when the money is called for during any one year, there will usually be as much money undrawn from the Treasury remaining on hand from the new appropriations. Thus the money taken on account of the old appropriations will be balanced by the money remaining in the Treasury from the new appropriations. The whole of an appropriation can seldom or never be expended immediately; because the application of labor is necessarily gradual and limited. Public works are not completed in a day; and whatever amount is drawn for such purposes by virtue of old appropriations, is counterbalanced on the Treasury books by the new, for which money is not required. The account thus runs on from year to year; the outstanding appropriations at any one time being pretty much the same. It is therefore an affair of paper, not of debt, for which money must be supplied. Is it not astonishing, sir, that men old in legislation on this floor should alarm themselves, and endeavor to alarm the country, by such egregious mistakes? And yet, this single item constitutes the main ground for the declamation we have heard about a bankrupt Treasury and profligate Administration; whilst an extra session of Congress is gravely urged, to stop up the enormous gap it has made in the Treasury.

The last charge is on account of the Post Office, made by my colleague, [Mr. THOMPSON,] of $1,500,000. I turn to the Postmaster General's report, and I find that he puts the indebtedness of his Department at but $219,845. Nor will even this small amount be any charge upon the year 1841, for which extraordinary means, by taxation or permanent loans, need be provided. The Postmaster General says, in his report: "But the present apparently unfavorable financial condition of the Department need occasion no anxiety. It can be sustained upon its own resources, and soon placed in a safe and prosperous condition." * * * "With a reasonable expectation of a reduction in the expenses of the transportation, and nearly a certainty of a considerable increase in its revenues, the future prospects of the Department are highly satisfactory."

It should be borne in mind that the contracts for transporting the mail are made for four years; consequently a large portion of the contracts fulfilled within the last two years were made when prices were very high, and have therefore been extravagant for the times. This department has been indebted repeatedly beyond this amount; but it has been left to itself, and has always worked out its own extrication, and doubtless now need no assistance from any resources but its own. This item therefore may be wiped out.

Let us now review the account, and see how it stands:

Navy pension fund	-	-	$150,000
Maine claims	-	-	220,000
Florida war	-	-	750,000
Census	-	-	-
Postponed appropriations for fortifications	-	-	-
Outstanding appropriations	-	-	-
			$1,120,000

So much for the enormous bill of particulars, under which the Treasury was to sink. Add this $1,120,000 to the appropriations for the year 1841, contained in the bills reported to the House, and now lying on our table, in conformity to the recommendations of the Treasury Department, and then let us compare them with our resources for the year:

New appropriations proposed for 1841	$16,621,000
Permanent	1,013,200
Charges admitted above	1,120,000
Treasury notes outstanding	4,500,000

23,254,200

Resources of the Treasury, with the issue of $5,000,000 Treasury notes proposed by the bill:

Customs	-	$19,000,000
Lands	-	3,500,000
Miscellaneous	-	80,000
Balance in the Treasury in January last	-	1,530,855
From banks	-	220,000
Treasury notes which may be issued by the last act	-	342,618

Add new issue of Treasury notes proposed by the bill, 5,000,000

6,479,273

Redeem the $5,000,000 Treasury notes, 5,000,000

Thus, sir, the Government will be enabled, not only to redeem the $4,500,000 of Treasury notes now outstanding, but also the $5,000,000 of Treasury notes authorized to be issued by the bill under consideration, (should it be found expedient to issue them,) and have, at the end of the year, a million and a half of dollars in the Treasury. In my estimate of our revenue from the customs, I have put it at what the gentleman from Maine conceived to be reasonable, and I believe every representative from our great commercial emporiums will approve. The other items of our resources have been undisputed, and I believe to be indisputable. Where now is your necessity for a ten million loan, or increased taxation? Neither expedient can be necessary, according to the scale of expenditure we propose to give; nor, if they are increased several millions, will the Government be embarrassed. But will our scale of expenditure satisfy you? Certainly not. The gentleman from Maine, and the gentleman from New York, have both proved this present Administration to be one of the meanest and most parsimonious that has ever afflicted the country; although never, since the first days of the confederacy, have our foreign relations, constituting as they do the chief object of its creation, been conducted with more skill and dignity, nor our national character stood higher abroad, than within the last four years. But yesterday, it rioted in extravagance, and wanted in its profligate expenditures of the people's money. But now, it has neglected its duty to the country, in the unprincipled attempt to spend only what is absolutely necessary, instead of aiming at that position of dignity and efficiency which a larger and more liberal expenditure would secure. The times, sir, have changed. A new Administration is about to run its course. In the accusation of parsimony and meanness now, no more than in the imputation of extravagance formerly, was justice regarded towards the present Administration. But the purpose now is to prepare us for the glorious advent of that enlarged economy which will take every harbor, creek, road, and river, and the whole body of claims on your files, within its capacious folds. Then will the debt of forty millions of dollars, so strenuously contended for by the gentleman from New York, come into brilliant existence. But, as yet, we have the majority; and intend, whilst taking care that no more money shall be expended than an economical administration of the Government requires, at the same time to place ample means within the control of the succeeding Administration, to maintain the faith of the Government in every obligation imposed upon it by our appropriations. Our views of duty will not allow us to do more—it will not allow us to do less.

Seeing the repeated and resolute efforts, on the part of gentlemen, in spite of facts, to make out, by figures, the necessity of additional means for the use of Government, I was at a loss to understand the purpose. If an extra session of Congress was wanted, to keep up the chase whilst the blood was warm, there was the Independent Treasury bill to be repealed, and the establishment of a United States Bank, to justify the measure, at least to those who had placed them in power. But the mystery was solved, yesterday, in the Senate, by the frank declarations of a distinguished Senator, about to occupy, if rumor be true, the highest seat in the councils of the ensuing Administration. He declared that his purpose was to abstract from the Treasury the four millions annually accruing from the public lands by giving them to the States, and to supply the vacuum by taxation through the customs—chiefly on silks. The charge of indebtedness in the Government is thus virtually given up; and the proposed scheme of taxation on silk, and other productions of France, is distinctly united with the project of distribution. I understand this: it is sensible and manly; although, I think, unwarranted by the Constitution, and will be fatal, by its corrupting influences, to our whole frame of Government.

Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to a tax on luxuries. On the contrary, I shall be prepared, when the time arrives, if any discrimination is admitted in our duties, to go as far as any one in the policy of relieving the necessities of life from taxation, and raising all the revenue we may require by imposts on luxuries. But I am not prepared to tax any thing to replace money which may be taken from the Treasury to be given to the States. A giving Government is essentially a tyranny. Free Governments are fiduciary, not absolute, in their character, and have no right to expend money but for the purposes they were organized to fulfil. Largesses to the people have ever proved to be the price of their liberties, or the instrument by which they have been overthrown. Under no circumstances, therefore, will I aid a policy which all history proves to be so fatal to liberty. But if I were prepared to adopt it, I should not supply the vacuum in the Treasury it would occasion by a tax on particular luxuries, imported chiefly by the productions of the South, and leave those free of duty which are imported by the productions of other portions of the Union. Tax all luxuries or tax none. The trade between France and this country, which it is proposed to burden, is carried on almost exclusively by the cotton, rice, and tobacco of the South. I hold in my hand a table carefully compiled, showing the exports and imports between France and the United States, from the year 1835 to 1839, inclusive.

Exports to France.

	1835.	1836.	1837.	1838.	1839.
	Dollars.	Dollars.	Dollars.	Dollars.	Dollars.
Exports	20,075,066	21,411,200	19,750,253	15,822,405	18,356,554
Cotton	17,460,415	17,519,787	15,205,079	12,360,073	13,323,142
Tobacco	937,129	954,846	723,842	1,232,410	810,063
Rice	245,517	413,515	274,025	139,525	320,911

Thus the whole direct export trade is carried on almost entirely by our staples; and, undoubtedly, they contribute also largely to the indirect trade by which the importations from France are effected, consisting of an average of from three to ten millions of dollars.

Imports from France.

	1835.	1836.	1837.	1838.	1839.
	Dollars.	Dollars.	Dollars.	Dollars.	Dollars.
Imports	23,362,534	27,036,235	22,083,514	18,771,797	32,531,321
Silks	12,097,356	15,611,135	9,673,815	5,670,525	15,099,478
Wines	1,591,442	1,945,180	1,713,203	889,463	1,379,976

Of worsted and worsted-stuff goods, we also imported a million and a half average; of linen, about half a million; and of specie, about a million. Whilst of manufactured cotton goods, we imported scarcely one million a year. Thus showing that this lucrative trade, whilst it is beneficial to the South, does not come into competition with the cotton manufactures of the North. Its bearing on the navigation interests—that great interest, which, unless crippled or crushed by our unwise legislation, is destined to be the bulwark of our national independence—is also most remarkable. Nearly the whole trade is carried on by our own shipping, as will be seen by the following table:

Imports - Dollars.	23,362,584	37,036,235	22,038,514	18,771,797	32,531,321
In Amer. vessels.	22,391,111	31,155,822	20,265,909	16,374,708	30,411,037
Exports - Dollars.	20,075,066	21,441,200	19,750,253	15,824,406	18,336,854
In Amer. vessels.	17,545,865	18,361,370	15,260,391	13,246,198	13,724,034

This is the trade it is proposed to cut up by a duty, almost prohibitory, of 20 per cent. on silks, and the other productions of France in proportion. It would seem to be manifest that, if a heavy duty is laid on the imports of any commodity, it must affect the value of the production with which the imports are affected. If we do not take the productions of France, how can she take ours? And, if you burden them with taxes, must she not take less cotton and tobacco, or take them at a less price? This would seem too clear for argument. But my colleague (Mr. Thompson) has found an argument in advocating this scheme of taxation, which proves, to his entire satisfaction, that our staples cannot be affected by any duties we may impose. It is this: Taxation on luxuries does never diminish the consumption of them. Pat wine, he says, at six dollars a bottle, and it will sell as freely as at one. This is a bold assumption, and may be true sometimes with a profligate coxcomb; but certainly conflicts with all the preconceived notions of political economy. It can only be true upon the supposition that our means for purchasing and consuming are unlimited; a fact we would all be glad to know and feel. If they are limited—then, however diminished, whether by taxation, conflagration, or any other cause, our consumption must be diminished with them. The gentleman's doctrine, if true, will also lead to the comfortable conclusion that taxation can never affect consumption, and will be no burden at all. If it cannot diminish the consumption of superfluities and luxuries, how can it diminish that of necessities? Necessities, from the force of the term, imply things which must be consumed, because implicated with existence itself; and if luxuries will also be equally consumed, whether taxed or free—then the consumption of a people will always be the same, under any form of taxation. It has hitherto been supposed that taxation, being a deprivation of the means of consumption, would diminish consumption, especially on those articles which men could do without—the luxuries or superfluities of life.

But my colleague goes farther. He contends that the South will absolutely be benefited by cutting off our silk trade with France. It will induce, or rather compel, the women of America to wear cotton instead of silk gowns, and thus increase the demand for our raw cotton.

Throwing out of consideration the fact, that if we consume cotton fabrics instead of silk, the supply will not be from France, as her small exportation of cotton goods to this country clearly shows, the gentleman, to make his position good, would have to prove that the value of silk and cotton fabrics is the same. If silk lace or a silk gown is worth ten times more than similar commodities of cotton, it is clear that consuming the same quantities of each will not equalize the trade. To compensate the cotton planter for excluding a silk gown, purchased and imported by his cotton, the girls must wear out ten gowns in its stead. This would require an unusual activity of motion, and a wardrobe far outnumbering that of the Dutch girls, with their woollen petticoats, so ludicrously described by Washington Irving in his Knickerbocker. If British cotton goods, equal in quantity, are substituted in our markets for the silks of France, it will cut off the demand for our cotton exactly in the proportion that silk is more valuable than cotton.

Nor can we see any thing in excluding French silks from our markets which will increase the consumption of raw cotton in France. The twenty millions of raw cotton purchased by her silks and other manufactures is worked up into some eighty or a hundred millions of the manufactured article, which is consumed almost entirely in France. This is the consumption resulting from our cotton imported into France. Now, if the gentleman destroys our trade with France, and she is forced to supply herself with cotton elsewhere, in consequence of our refusing to receive her manufactures in return, it is obvious that, to repay the Southern planters for the diminished consumption of twenty millions of their raw cotton, he must produce a market for eight or a hundred millions for the manufactured material. Do gentlemen suppose their invention and prowess in legislation, equal to such a task?

Mr. Chairman, it does appear to me that it is only necessary for Southern enterprise and industry to find a profitable market for our staples, and it is immediately struck at by this Government. Your tariff, before 1833, burdened our commerce and depressed our staples in all the markets of the world. In 1833—not from a regard to our interests, but contrary to our interests, to subserve the purposes of our manufacturers, who did not manufacture silk or make wines—you left silks and wines free of duty. The treaty with France in 1831 reduced the duties on our long cottons, and left our cotton with a nominal duty* merely upon them, whilst it reduced the duty on wines. We accommodated ourselves to our situation. A lucrative and harmless trade has grown up between ourselves and our first great ally; and now, the first modification of the tariff proposed, is to cripple, and perhaps destroy this trade entirely. If the spirit of retaliation is awakened, do gentlemen suppose that they will have it all on one side?

If I heard with regret the advocacy of my colleague of this proposal, unnecessarily to burden a trade peculiarly beneficial to the South, it was with still greater regret I heard him introduce the subject of a general adjustment of the tariff. He stated, and stated truly, it is his position as to the indebtedness of the Government was correct, that a tax on silks and wines did not interfere with the provisions of the compromise act of 1833. Why, then, did he go further than the case required, and not only maintain the expediency of taxing within the limits of that act, but discuss the subject of a protective tariff generally, and broadly maintain that the act of 1833 was permanent and perpetual in its provisions, and the discriminations it contains in favor of the manufacturers ought to be continued after the year 1842? Honor and honesty, he contended, required this at our hands. If these positions be true, a protective tariff is fastened on the country forever.

I maintain, sir, that the act of 1833 is not perpetual in its terms, but expires on the 30th day of June, 1842; and that the principle guaranteed in that bill, so far from justifying the continuance of the protective policy in our system of taxation, is directly the reverse, and looks distinctly to its entire abandonment.

I recollect well when this act first passed, taking my opinions rather from what others said, than an inspection of the act, I had an impression that this act did not expire in 1842: but the duty of acting upon it, lately brought me to an examination of its provisions, and I saw immediately that my impressions were erroneous.

The third section of the act provides:

"That, until the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, the duties imposed by existing laws, as modified by this act, shall remain and continue to be collected. And from and after the day last aforesaid, all duties upon imports shall be collected in ready money, and all credits now allowed by law shall be, and hereby are, abolished; and such duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government."

Now here, sir, "the duties imposed by existing laws, as modified by this act," are to "remain and continue to be collected" only until the 30th June, 1842; "and from and after the day last aforesaid," "such duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government." Is it not plain that the duties continue only until 30th June, 1842? and is it not also plain that, after that period, the protective principle was to be abandoned? We should call to mind the point of contest. The South, or rather South Carolina, contended that Congress, in laying duties on imports, had no constitutional right to discriminate between any articles, excepting on the ground of revenue. It has no constitutional right to lay its taxes with the view of fostering the interests of the manufacturers, or in any manner promoting the interests of one class of producers rather than another; all being equally entitled to any immediate or incidental benefit which may arise from the duties belonging to all, and laid for all. This act continues the discriminations in favor of the manufacturers until 30th June, 1842, and says that then they shall be laid for revenue. What was the compromise effected by this act? It was this, or it was nothing: We submitted to discriminations in the duties for the benefit of the manufacturers for nine years, on condition that then, and forever, the protective principle was to be abandoned; and no discriminations were to be imposed, excepting those which a single eye to the revenue only would require. It was a great contest about constitutional principles, and it was settled by tolerating an unconstitutional rate of things for nine years, that the Constitution might then be restored.

"The duty on cottons imported into France, in American or French bottoms, is twenty francs on one hundred kilogrammes. The duty is the same on cottons coming from South America. A discrimination is made on cottons imported in French bottoms from Egypt, the duty being but fifteen francs. When imported in any other bottoms, it is twenty francs. The importation of cotton from the United States into France in 1815, was 7,659,400 kilogrammes; in 1833, it was 43,780,000 kilogrammes; whilst the importation from Egypt in 1825 was 7,655,000 kilogrammes; in 1833, it was only 2,363,178 kilogrammes. This shows the progress of the trade.

It, by the third section, the duties are laid only until the 30th June, 1842, the fifth section of this act shows distinctly what shall be done after that period: "and all imports on which the first section (containing the protected articles) of this act may operate, and all articles now admitted to entry free from duty, or paying a less rate of duty than twenty per centum ad valorem, before the said 30th day of June, 1842, from and after that day may be admitted to entry, subject to such duty, not exceeding twenty per centum ad valorem, as shall be provided for by law."

There is here a guarantee that the protected, as well as the unprotected articles—those which bore a discriminating duty for the benefit of manufacturers, and those free—should, all of them, be at least as low in the duty as twenty per cent. ad valorem; but not a word is said as to any discrimination between them. They are to be then such "as shall be provided for by law;" and an equal ad valorem duty is pointed to as the scale of their adjustment. I hesitate not to say, should you omit legislation on the subject, before the 30th June, 1842, not a dollar after that day can be collected through the customs. No tariff will be in existence.

Is it not, then, Mr. Chairman, an extraordinary construction of this act, that it is perpetual in its provisions; and that we are bound—although it will be dead by its own limitation in 1842, and contains, on its face, a renunciation of the protective principle—that, in honesty and honor, we are bound to give it life again, and perpetuate those unjust and unconstitutional discriminations, to disburden ourselves of which, we have borne their weight for nine years? The price is paid. We have endured excessive taxation, far beyond the wants of our Government, with all the disasters of a surplus revenue, in its influence upon the currency; and we have before us, under the baneful influence of the deposit act, flowing from its terms, the still greater disaster, if carried into effect, of a distribution of a portion of our revenue to the States of the Confederacy. All these evils, past and prospective, we have encountered, that the manufacturers might have the full benefit of the privileges this act conferred upon them. And now, when their portion of the compromise is to be performed, what do we hear? Any stirring appeals to the Northern States to stand to their engagements—to fulfil their faith by every consideration which individual or national honor can inspire, and abandon forever the principle of protection? No, sir! no; the appeal is made to us—to us, who, for thirty years, have borne discriminating duties for their benefit. We must bear more; and bear it forever—yield up the principle of protection, and once more lie at the mercy of a majority in Congress, the prosperity of whose constituents, in their opinion, rises exactly in proportion to our opposition. And all this we must do in the sacred name of honesty and honor. Why, even supposing my colleague's construction to be correct, and that there was a distinct clause in the act of 1833, declaring that the protected articles should have a discriminating duty in their favor of 20 per cent. forever—what moral principle would bind us to its observance? We have declared, that in our opinion, all discriminations made in our tariff, for the benefit of manufacturers, are unconstitutional. Admitting that former statesmen, filling the seats we now occupy, had made legislative arrangements with respect to this subject, which come in direct conflict with our views of the Constitution; could we dare observe them? The Constitution was over them, as it is over us; and we are sworn here "to maintain, protect, and defend" it. The oath is our own, and so must be its responsibilities. No plea of the abandonment of others of their constitutional duty, if they have done so, can absolve us from our oaths, or exempt us from performing ours. I assume no authority over the consciences of others, nor will I usurp the high prerogative of judging them; but, for myself, I say, if I ever vote for the imposition of discriminating duties for the benefit of manufacturers, under the present Constitution, I shall deem myself guilty of moral perjury.

Mr. Chairman, I am not singular in my construction of the act of 1833. Several of the States of the South have taken the approaching adjustment of the tariff into consideration, and have passed resolutions showing that, according to their construction of this act, the protective principle is to be abandoned after 1842. During this winter, Georgia and Alabama have passed resolutions, (I believe unanimously,) declaring a tariff recognizing the principle of protection, is unconstitutional. South Carolina has also spoken upon this subject; and, as one of her Representatives, I have attempted (although feebly) to give utterance here to her opinions. On the 18th of December last, she passed the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the power given to Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, and imposts, does not authorize Congress to collect money excepting for revenue; and that a tariff to protect the industry of one portion of the community, at the expense of the other, is a violation of the spirit and letter of the Constitution of the United States; and, when such a case occurs, the several States will decide for themselves the mode and measure of redress.

"Resolved, That the people of this State have cause to congratulate themselves that the party feuds which lately weakened the vigor of its councils, have happily ceased; and that South Carolina now presents to the enemies of her policy and peace an undivided front; and is prepared, as she is resolved, to repel by proper means every aggression upon her rights, as a sovereign Republic, the instant that aggression is attempted."

Sir, there is no misunderstanding these resolutions, although they may be disregarded; but be assured of one thing: word for word—in spirit and in form—will they be redeemed and enforced by that free and gallant people. It is not for me to anticipate their course, in an emergency which endangers their liberties, or appeals to their honor. They will be true to both; neither dismayed by the frowns of power, nor duped by the faithlessness of unprincipled cupidity.

SPEECH OF MR. YOUNG, OF ILLINOIS.

IN SENATE, Monday, February 1, 1841.

MR. YOUNG addressed the Senate as follows: I rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of proposing to amend the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] to recommend the bill of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN,] by striking out all after the word report, in the second line after the word resolved, and substituting the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] with two or three slight alterations, and an additional section, which were adopted with his concurrence, as a measure just and equitable to the old States, and by far more acceptable to the new than that of the Senator from Kentucky, and against which neither, in my judgment, can have any reasonable cause for complaint. I have waited, sir, in the hope that the Senator himself [Mr. CALHOUN] would, as on a former occasion, have brought it forward as the antagonist proposition to that of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] upon which the probability now is we shall soon be called to vote. I trust, however, that he will continue to regard himself as its legitimate author, and, in case of necessity, come forward to the rescue, and defend its principles, as he has heretofore done with such distinguished ability, against all assaults, from whatever quarter they may come.

I feel myself impelled, Mr. President, as matter of duty to the State which I in part represent, in consequence of resolutions of instruction adopted by the General Assembly on this subject some year or two ago, and which have not been repealed to my knowledge, to bring this measure forward as the one most desired by that State, and to urge its adoption in the best manner I can, in preference to any proposition whatever, which has for its object distribution simply; and which does not carry along with it a just regard for the future settlement, population, and advancing prosperity of the country embraced within the limits of the new States. Sir, in many respects, which I will endeavor to point out before I sit down, I regard the consequences involved in the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] as decidedly hostile to the best interests of Illinois, at least, and that her rateable proportion of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands would but poorly compensate for the injuries that would in the end be inflicted under the operation of such a system. But I will commence with the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina—and what, Mr. President, does it, when analyzed, propose?

1st. To dispose of the lands to the new States in which they are situated, reserving, in their future sales by those States, sixty-five per cent. of the gross proceeds to the United States, the States being thereafter chargeable with the expense of completing the surveys, extinguishing Indian titles, and for selling and otherwise managing the same.

2d. To secure to principle of graduation in the price, pre-emption to the settlers, and a final cession after a limited period, of the refuse or unsaleable lands to the States in which they are respectively situated.

3d. To provide for the transfer of the evidences of title from the seat of the Federal Government to the seats of government of the new States to which they properly belong.

4th. To provide for the settlement of the country without restriction, as well as the sale of the lands, as a source of revenue to the United States.

5th. To remove the prohibition which restricts the right of the purchaser to two quarter-quarter sections, or forty acre tracts only, and to permit the entry of such tracts, in future, in like manner as other legal subdivisions of the public lands.

6th. To annul the restriction imposed upon the new States by compact, by which they are prohibited from taxing the public lands for five years after the date of the purchase from the United States.

7th. To cede to the State of Tennessee all the unappropriated lands belonging to the United States within the limits thereof, for the reason that they are unsaleable, and of little or no value to the community at large.

And 8th and lastly. To set apart the sixty-five per cent. secured to be paid to the United States, for the exclusive purpose of increasing the navy, and erecting fortifications for the common defence of the country.

These, Mr. President, are the leading features of the measure originated by the Senator from South Carolina several years ago, and again presented by him for our consideration at the present session. Is it one with which the old States ought to be satisfied as a financial measure?

The proposition comprehends within its entire scope, the disposition of 154,497,765 acres of the public domain. Of this quantity, 1,776,210 acres are situated in Ohio; 4,396,494 acres in Indiana; 19,959,797 acres in Illinois; 31,811,840 acres in Missouri; 19,910,140 acres in Alabama; 11,543,826 acres in Mississippi; 16,983,408 acres in Louisiana; 29,988,734 acres in Michigan; and 28,027,304 acres in Arkansas. In all, nine States; and a grand total of 154,497,765 acres, as before stated, up to January 1st, 1840. This, sir, is the quantity, no more nor less, according to the last report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office on that subject. The lands in the Territories, and those in the wide expanse of the West, extending from the western borders of Missouri and Arkansas, across the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific ocean, and to latitude 49 deg. north of the Territories of Iowa and Wisconsin, encircling within their range by far the greater part of the public domain; and by the estimate of which, the billions of acres mentioned by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] are produced; still left subject to the existing arrangement—to the old, well tried, and well approved system of operation which has afforded the occasion for so much eulogium here of late, and from a departure from which so much mischief seems to be apprehended. Of every hundred thousand dollars arising from these sales, within the limits of any one State, sixty-five thousand dollars, free from all charge, is to be paid into the public Treasury, and the remaining thirty-five thousand, after paying for the completing of surveys, extinguishing Indian titles, salaries of officers, land office charges, and incidental expenses, is to be paid into the State Treasury. What these expenses would amount to I have not the means of ascertaining; they would of course differ according to the different condition of things in the several States; but I presume that no Senator will undertake to say that the residue, whatever it might be, would be an unreasonable compensation to the State for the service proposed to be performed. But it has been urged as an objection, that the States might, and would, perhaps, refuse, upon settlement, to pay over to the United States this sixty-five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales, as provided for; and the deposit act of 1836, by which about $28,000,000 was distributed among the States, although in form a deposit, has been cited in illustration of the argument.

To obviate all difficulty arising out of such a supposition, whether ill or well founded, it is proposed, instead of an annual adjustment of the account, as was provided in the original bill of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN] to make monthly payments as the sales progress, at the most convenient points, where the moneys of the United States may be receivable. There is no occasion, nor is it intended, that the sixty-five per cent. shall go into the State Treasury at all. The payments will continue to be made in all respects as at present, by the receivers of the land offices, and there will be the end of it, without further difficulty or adjustment. For example, suppose there is a land office in Quincy, Illinois, the town of my residence, and a Sub-Treasury, or a branch of a United States Bank in St. Louis, Missouri. Now, sir, all the receiver at Quincy has to do, is to make his deposits monthly, at St. Louis; take receipts for the amount paid to the Sub-Treasurer or Cashier, and the whole matter as to the Government interest is in this simple but prompt manner accomplished, without the necessity of any settlement whatever; except that it may be proper for the register and receiver of the land office, in addition to the reports which may be required by the State, to forward duplicates of the same, to the Treasury Department of the United States, or in such other manner as may be stipulated as most convenient and proper, by the parties concerned. So much, sir, as to the matter of revenue, and so much as to the security for its payment.

Now, Mr. President, for the advantages which are supposed to result to the new States, from the adoption of this amendment, as contrasted with the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] Besides the thirty-five per cent. on the gross amount of sales, the whole of the lands within the limits of the new States, would immediately become subject to their sole and exclusive jurisdiction, in regard to occupancy, settlement, and cultivation; the conflict of jurisdiction between the United States and the new States avoided; the principle of graduation in the price, and pre-emption to settlers secured; and a final cession of such lands as shall have been in the market, and remain unsold for thirty years to the States. It is true, sir, that the Senator's [Mr. CRITTENDEN'S] proposition embraces the principle of pre-emption, but with what limitation, and with what restrictions, we know not; except as inferences may be drawn from his own argument and the arguments of gentlemen who have followed his lead on this occasion. His honorable colleague [Mr. CLAY] said some days ago in reference to, and in opposition to pre-emption; and attempted to prove by documentary testimony, that much had been lost to the Treasury in consequence of a departure from the old system of selling all the lands in the first place at public auction, and that he had been informed that many of the pre-emptioners had, by rushing out and seizing upon the best lands, been permitted to purchase lands worth ten, twenty, and thirty dollars per acre, at the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre. Well, suppose this statement to be true; and, if so, it must have been in a very limited extent, in the original settlement of a new country, and what does it demonstrate? Nothing more than that the lands were, in a great degree, made thus valuable by the very settlement and cultivation of which the Senator [Mr. CLAY] complains. It is by the pre-emption policy that we secure these occupants, who have incorporated their labor with the soil, in their possessions, against the more wealthy who buy on speculation; and against whom they could not be expected successfully to compete, at public auction; and place the lands in the proper hands of those whose occupation is to cultivate them.

But the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] says, will you break up and destroy by such measures, this old, well tried, and well approved land system, hitherto unchanged; that the flourishing States of Ohio and Indiana have grown up under its benign influence; that Illinois has doubled her population in the last six years, and now has near half a million of inhabitants under its fostering care also; and concludes by asking emphatically, are you not satisfied with your prosperity? It is true, Mr. President, that these States have grown up, as well, in population, as in agricultural improvement, and morals, with an unexampled degree of rapidity and prosperity. It was in consequence of this prosperity, Mr. President, that Illinois, with her free white population, and liberal principles towards foreigners, gave more votes at the late election for President than either Virginia or Kentucky; not that she had more population, as was erroneously stated in the sketch of the debates, published a few days ago. But, sir, her march is onward; and if her legislative guardians at home shall promptly discharge their duty in the preservation of her credit and her honor at home and abroad, who cannot foretell that her destiny is no less than that of an empire State.

But has the Senator [Mr. CLAY] forgotten that this system of pre-emption for which we contend commenced as far back as 1813; and that it has been continued with but slight interruption ever since, until it has almost become a part of the system of which he speaks with so much commendation? and does he not know, that another important change was made in this old and well approved system, by the act of the 24th April, 1820, from a credit to a cash system; and by a reduction in the price of the land from two dollars to one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre? And is it not a fact, that this unexampled prosperity to which he alludes is in a great degree attributable to these very changes, the pre-emption feature of which he now, at this late day, so much deprecates? Sir, what said the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] in reply to the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY] in the debate of 1838 on this same subject of pre-emption? Mr. WEBSTER said:

"The difference between the member from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] and myself on this occasion is plain and distinct. It is precisely this;

"He is altogether against the pre-emptive right. He is for carrying into operation the law, as it stands, and for giving it effect over the lands on which these settlers live, in the same way as over other public lands. He is for putting all these lands up to open auction, and selling them to the highest bidder, letting the settler take the consequence. He says there should be an auction, and a free auction; and he argues, with that consistency and cohesion of ideas which belongs to him, that if there is to be a public auction, as he insists there ought to be, then there must be, and ought to be, a perfectly free competition. That it should be as open to one man to bid as another; that no man, or men, ought to be privileged or favored; that it is ridiculous to talk of an auction, at which one man may bid, and another may not; or an auction, at which some bidders are told that others must have preference. He, therefore, is for a free sale, open to every body, and to be conducted in that manner which shall ensure the receipt of the greatest sum of money into the Treasury. Now I say at once, plainly and distinctly, that this is not my object. I have other views. I wish, in the first place, to preserve the peace of the frontier; and I wish, also, to preserve and protect the reasonable rights of the settlers; because I think they have rights which deserve to be protected. These are my objects. Sir, if we could order an auction here, in this city, or elsewhere, out of all possible control of the settlers, and far from all fear of any influence of theirs, and could there sell the lands they live on, and their improvements, for their utmost value, and put the proceeds of the whole into the Treasury, it would be the very last thing I should ever do. God forbid that I should make gain and profit out of the labors of these settlers, and carry that gain into the Treasury. I did not suppose any man would desire that. I did not suppose there was any one who would consent that the increased value of these lands, caused by the labor, the toil, and the sweat of the settlers, should be turned to the advantage of the National Treasury. Certainly, certainly, sir, I shall oppose all proceedings leading to such a result. Yet, the member from Kentucky has nothing to propose, but to sell the lands at auction for the most they will bring, at a sale which he says ought to be perfectly free and open to every body, and to carry the proceeds into the Treasury. Let the sales go on: that is his doctrine. Let the laws take their course, he says, since we live under a Government of laws. Have a sale, make it free and open, and make the most of it. Let the Government take care that every body, who wishes to bid, be as free to do so as any other; and that no combination, no privilege, no pre-emption, be suffered to exist.

"Now, sir, in my opinion, all this is what we cannot do, if we would; and what we ought not to do, if we could. I do not believe we can have an auction, under existing circumstances, such as the gentleman insists upon. The known condition of things renders it impossible. The honorable member thinks otherwise. He will not agree, he says, that the President, with the militia and the army, cannot protect the authorities in maintaining a fair and open sale. Sir, is it discreet, is it prudent, to refer to such a recourse as that? Is it not greatly wiser, and greatly better, to remove the occasion, which may be done without injury to the Government, and in perfect consistency with the rights of others, rather than to think of such measures as have been suggested? For one, I disclaim all such policy."

But the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] proposes to grant pre-emption exclusively to those worth less than $1,000, for the sole purpose of accommodating the needy honest settlers and cultivators of the soil. Well, sir, what is to become of the poor and needy (to say nothing about honesty) speculator under this arrangement? Mr. President, if the Senator had known the situation of many of these poor, needy, and I may add, miserable speculators, I feel satisfied, from his goodness of feeling, that he could not have found it in his heart to have proposed their exclusion from the benefits of his system; of which charity would seem to have been the moving consideration. Why, sir, of all the unfortunate beings in the community, none commend themselves more to our sympathy and charity as a class, under existing circumstances, than these same proscribed speculators in the public lands. I believe, however, on reflection, that they will most likely find their relief under another proposition submitted by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] (the bankrupt bill) which is pressing hard upon the bill under consideration, rather than under any system of pre-emption which could be devised by the ingenuity of gentlemen, and especially if the cash principle should be retained, as I assure the Senator that most of them are very tender footed on this subject of cash payments just at the present time.

But, Mr. President, is there no reason to fear that the Senator, in the fulness of his sympathy for these poor needy tillers of the soil, will, if his proposition succeeds, do more mischief to that class of individuals, than to any other, by his thousand dollar restriction? Suppose, for instance, a man of fifty years, with a large family of children, and an unhealthy wife, should emigrate from Kentucky to Illinois, for the purpose of making some provision for his children, in a new country, which, from his scanty means, he could not do in Kentucky, and he should unfortunately happen to be worth $1,050; would you exclude him from the benefits of your system? Yes, sir, he is worth fifty dollars too much; and if he desires to procure good land, must buy second hand, at five, ten, and fifteen dollars per acre, and yet there are among the emigrants to the West thousands of just such persons and families. I never will, Mr. President, give my consent to any such pre-emption law. I desire that all such laws may be free and equal; that the rich and the poor, and those of middle degree, may all fare alike, provided they will settle down upon the land, and cultivate it.

Sir, I have lived through a period, although not yet as gray as my old friend from Missouri [Mr. LINN] and in reference to whom I use the word friend as no common-place term, in which we have had many ups and downs, in the way of hard times and measures of relief; and my experience has been, with but few exceptions, that the "poor people," as they are called, and for whose benefit these measures of relief are ostensibly proposed to be enacted, are, for the most part, the very persons who suffer most by them, and have the least occasion for their enactment. And such is the case with your border people, who are represented here as being "poor squatters," or rather "poor intruders," upon the public lands. Sir, all they desire by your legislation here is, that you shall do equal justice to the rich and to the poor—by selling your land at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre to all who are willing to go upon and cultivate them. At this price, the poor can compete with those who are really rich, when they could not at the sales by auction, and only desire that those who go first upon the land shall have the preference in the purchase of it. Mr. President, these squatters are the men who are semper parati, always ready, at the day, to pay their $200 for their 160 acres of land; while the land dealer, or speculator, in most cases, can purchase, or not purchase, as the banks, for the time being, happen to extend their accommodations in that way or not. How is it with the bankrupt bill, which is pressing so closely upon our heels, as a great measure of relief? Is this intended for the unfortunate poor man, or is it for a more favored class of individuals? In this I believe, Mr. President, the thousand dollar principle works the other way.

But, Mr. President, if this scheme for distribution succeeds, are we not in danger in the new States, from the cupidity that may be excited in the old States, to make it exclusively a money measure, with an eye single to the dividends, of having the price raised upon us? But more than this: have we not just cause to fear that an attempt will be made to limit the settlements to such lands only as shall be subject to private entry, and that our borderers are hereafter to be considered, watched, and dealt with, as a band of lawless depredators and trespassers? What, sir, said the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] on this subject but a few short days ago? He said, if I remember, "that he had been informed that great depredations had been committed upon the public lands in the West; that these trespasses were considered not only excusable, but honorable, by those who committed them, and concluded by warning the old States to watch this interest with increased vigilance, and to adopt measures to prevent such spoliations in future."

Thus, Mr. President, I suppose we are to have, under this new guardianship, a cordon of spies, or common informers, upon our frontier—perhaps one from each of the old States—the settlers are to be driven off, volens volens, by a military force, if necessary—their cabins burnt down—their crops cut up and destroyed, and themselves subjected to fine and imprisonment, or other pains and penalties, if they should happen to cross over the border, and cut a few logs for a cabin, make a few rails to fence a truck patch, or even cut down a board or a bee tree, although it may be considered "honorable" among backwoodsmen, in accordance with the public sentiment generally, and in conformity with the immemorial usage of the country. Sir, let me tell that Senator that such a system of espionage upon the citizens of the new States, hitherto unprecedented, or any other system of that character, will never be submitted to.

Mr. President, as the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] seems to think but little of the morals of our pioneer population, on account of their honorable trespasses upon the public lands, as he is pleased to term them, I beg leave to set him right, and to quiet his apprehensions on that subject, by referring to the honorable testimony of the Senator from Massachusetts, voluntarily accorded, in behalf of the settlers in the West, shortly after he had made a visit to that country, and when their character, on a like occasion to the present, had been called in question here. Mr. WEBSTER said:

"Much has been said of the general character of the settlers. I have no extensive information, sir, on that point, and had not intended to say any thing upon it. But it has so happened that I have recently been in the Northwest, and have met, for a short time, with many of these settlers; and, since they have been spoken of here with so much harshness, I feel bound to say that, so far as my knowledge of them goes, they do not deserve it. Undoubtedly, sir, they are trespassers in the contemplation of law. They know that very well. They are on the public lands without title; but then they say that the course of the Government heretofore has been such as to induce and encourage them to go where they are; and that they are ready and willing to do all that Government has required from others in similar circumstances; that is, to pay for the lands at the common price. They have the general character of frontiersmen: they are hardy, adventurous, and enterprising. They have come from far, to establish themselves and families in new abodes in the West. They appeared to me to be industrious and laborious; and I saw nothing in their character or conduct that should justly draw upon them expressions of contumely and reproach."

But, Mr. President, this plan of restricting the sales, and of consequence the settlements, to such lands only as shall, for the time being, be subject to private entry, is no new doctrine. As far back as December, 1829, now eleven years ago, Mr. Foot, of Connecticut, then a Senator on this floor, introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of limiting the sales of the public lands for a certain period to such only as had been before that time offered for sale, and subject to private entry at the minimum price; and also whether the office of Surveyor General might not be abolished without detriment to the public interest. This, sir, was a distinct proposition, coming from a distinguished Senator from an old State, not only to restrict the sales to the lands subject to private entry, but to stop the surveys, and even to abolish the office of Surveyor General, so that no more could be made in future. Here, then, we have an exemplification of the record of what we of the new States may expect, if the old should once fairly get their clutches upon these public lands. Yes, Mr. President, here was a proposition which, if it had been adopted, would have put an end to all the inducements to emigration. The operatives (as they are called) would have remained in the manufactories, or as tenants and dependants in some form to their more wealthy neighbors, in the old States, and all the facilities for the extension of our settlements and improvement of the country broken up and utterly destroyed. And not only so; for we shall soon have claims set up, under a variety of pretences, to certain rateable proportions of this great trust fund, (as it has been called,) in the way of back rations, with a just view, doubtless, of equalization, in respect to the lands which have been granted to the new States for internal improvements and the purposes of education; and for this, also, we are not without precedent. As far back as January, 1831, Mr. Lloyd, of Massachusetts, then a member of this body, submitted for consideration a resolution instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of granting land for the purpose of education within the limits of the old States, corresponding with the appropriations which had been made for the same object within the limits of the new States. Had that Senator forgotten that these lands for school purposes were granted by virtue of compacts, and in consequence of a valuable consideration, on the part of the new States, and were not mere donations? And what was that consideration? Take the State of Illinois for example. Congress agrees, on the part of the United States, that section No. 16, in every township, shall be reserved for the use of schools; to grant to the State all salt springs, and the lands reserved for the use of the same; five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands within the State; two-fifths to be disbursed by Congress in making roads to the State, and three-fifths by the State Legislature for the encouragement of learning; and an entire township of land for a university. For which favors, Illinois agrees, on her part, that she will exempt from taxation all lands sold after the 1st of January, 1819, for five years; all lands granted for military bounties for three years from the date of the patents; and that she would not tax the lands of non-residents higher than those of residents. This was the consideration, and what does it amount to? According to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the amount of money received on account of sales of the public lands, in that State, into the national Treasury, is stated at $14,207,046; the number of acres sold at $1.25 per acre, would be 11,365,636.

These lands, if subject to taxation from the day of sale, at two cents per acre per annum, which corresponds with the rate of taxation in that State, including the road tax, would, in five years produce to the State the sum of $1,136,560. The quantity of land appropriated for military bounties is stated at about 3,500,000 acres. This, at the same rate of taxation for three years, would amount to $210,000; making together the sum of $1,346,560; and this system of exemption from taxes is still going on pari passu with the sale of the lands, and is applicable to the nineteen millions of acres still unsold in that State. And what amount of lands has been granted to Illinois, for various purposes, internal improvement, education and all, in consideration of this exemption? Why, sir, according to the Commissioner's report, from which I have quoted, 1,537,317 acres up to January 1st, 1840; and I believe, if we may judge from the "signs of the times" here, that we have received but precious little since, with a very gloomy prospect for the hereafter. These facts, I trust, Mr. President, will put to rest this question of equalization, at least as it regards the State of Illinois, as I think that all unprejudiced men will agree, to use a Wall street expression, that we have granted a pretty broad margin to Uncle Sam for all the favors and privileges he has conferred; to say nothing of our refraining to tax all the lands for an indefinite period of time, during the continuance of their ownership by the United States.

The operation of the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] will be, to avoid all occasion for conflict of jurisdiction between the United States authorities and those of the new States. And this, Mr. President, is, in theory if not in practice, and a theory which may be practised upon, a most important consideration. The act of Congress of March 3d, 1807, authorizing the President to cause the settlers on the public lands to be removed, is still unrepealed. That act provides, "that the President of the United States may direct the marshal, and employ the military force to remove persons (squatters of course) unlawfully taking possession of the public lands until thereunto authorized by law," &c. And the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] insists that it should be enforced at least as to the unsurveyed lands, if not as it regards all lands until they are first brought into market, and offered at public auction, in such manner as to secure a fair competition at the sales. And he predicts in such an event, that many of them, which are now sold to the squatters under our pre-emption laws, at $1.25 per acre, would sell for 10, 20, and even as high as $30 per acre. Now, Mr. President, there are in the State of Illinois 4,322,171 acres of land as yet unsurveyed—a very considerable amount of that which is surveyed has not as yet been brought into market. These lands are situated in the Northern part of the State—embracing much, if not the whole, of what is called the Rock river country—and most of them that are desirable are settled upon by these same "squatters." Well, sir, the State proceeds in virtue of her sovereignty, as she has done, to district the entire State into counties; to establish seats of justice for these counties; directs courts of justice to be held in them; provides for the appointment of sheriffs and constables; and for the organization of the militia; and whatever else is necessary to put the machinery of the body politic in motion. Now, sir, take one of these counties in which the public lands are unsurveyed, or, if surveyed, have not been brought into market, but which, nevertheless, is settled and giving its thousand votes at our elections; and suppose that, under this law of 1807, to which I have alluded, or any other law that Congress, in its wisdom, may see fit to pass upon the subject of preventing trespasses, the President should direct the marshal of the State to remove these persons as trespassers, and to use a military force, if necessary, in their expulsion; and suppose still further, that the circuit court of the county should happen to be in session when the marshal, with his military posse, went to execute the mandate, and the marshal should, in obedience to his orders, say to the sheriff, or to the judge upon the bench, Gentlemen squatters, in the name of the United States, I arrest you as trespassers upon the public lands!! Sir, the thing is impracticable. You cannot, and you ought not to be permitted, if you had the power, to execute any such law. I know that I have put a strong case, but it is, nevertheless, one which might arise, if Congress should, at any time, attempt to enforce such laws within the jurisdictional limits of an organized sovereign State of this Union. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] proposes to avoid any such conflict of jurisdiction, by placing the lands at once under the superintendency of the States, to which they respectively appertain, where of right it should belong. With the right of pre-emption, the Senator from South Carolina proposes graduation and reduction in the price, and a final cession of the refuse lands to the States. His proposition is:

"That the minimum price, as now fixed by law, shall remain unchanged until the thirtieth day of June aforesaid; but, after that period, the price may be reduced by the States respectively, according to the following scale; all lands theretofore offered at public sale, and then remaining unsold ten years or upward, preceding the thirtieth day of June aforesaid, may be reduced by said States to a price not less than one dollar per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold fifteen years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, may thereafter be reduced by said States to a price not less than seventy-five cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold twenty years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, may then be reduced by said States to a price not less than fifty cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold twenty-five years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, may thereafter be reduced by said States to a price not less than twenty-five cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold thirty years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, shall be ceded immediately to the States in which said lands are situated: Provided, That all lands which shall remain unsold after having been offered at public sale for ten years, and which do not come under the above provisions, shall be subject to the provisions of pre-emption, graduation, and disposition aforesaid, at the respective periods of ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, and thirty years, after said sale, commencing from the expiration of ten years after the same had been offered at public sale."

In reference to this subject he [Mr. CALHOUN] says:

"That the occupants of the public lands partake of the feeling that the same price ought not to be exacted for the inferior as for the good lands. They are unwilling to give for the inferior lands, which for the most part they occupy, $1.25, when a small part only of the best lands offered for sale would command that price; and feel that they have something like justice on their side in not giving so high a price for their possessions."

"This feeling must be met; and it is proposed to meet it by the provisions for graduation and pre-emption which I have just stated; a policy so liberal towards a large, though a poor class, not less honest and patriotic than the rest of the community, could not fail to have a happy effect, not only in reference to them, but in a more enlarged point of view. One of the most important would be the great increase of the number of small freeholders, which, in the hour of danger, would prove of vast importance, especially in the weaker portion of the Union—in the Southwestern States—where the provision would have the greatest effect. It would be the class that would furnish the hardest and best soldiers, with the advantage of being inured to the climate. Combined and modified as they would be, they cannot but have a powerful weight in inducing the occupant to purchase. It will work a revolution in his character. He will regard himself, on his little domain, more a freeholder than a squatter, and as the price in the descending scale of graduation approaches the price that lands, such as he occupies would sell for, his industry and economy will be exerted to be prepared with the requisite means to make the purchase. The liberal character of the policy would impress him with deep feelings of respect for the justice and care of the Government; and the security it would afford would put an end to the esprit de corps, which otherwise would be so strong, and all, combined with the influence of the States on the side of the Government, would, I feel confident, guard effectually against the danger of losing the lands, as far as the occupants are concerned, in the only way that would be practicable."

I understand, Mr. President, that the lands in your State (Kentucky) belonging to the State, south of the Tennessee river, have been gradually reduced from fifty cents down to twelve and a half cents, or as they call it in that State, nine pence, to the acre. Now, will the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] require more from us of the new States than is exacted from the people of his own State. And will not the same rule which will apply to the inferior lands in Kentucky, apply with equal force to lands of the same quality in Illinois, separated as they are by the Ohio river only, and inhabited by the same kind of people? Sir, it is a bad rule which will not work both ways.

It is also proper as a financial measure. The desirable lands, in the course of a few years, are sold at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre—after which the sales become limited, and will not much more than pay expenses; the price is then reduced to one dollar per acre. This stimulates the settlers and others to make a further examination, and the next best portion is culled and purchased, and considerable addition is made to the revenue. The sales again relax, and a further reduction is made in the price with similar results; except, that less and less quantities are purchased at each subsequent reduction, until the sales of those which are left will not pay for selling. This period is limited, by the Senator from South Carolina, at thirty years; as the time when the quantity remaining unsold, after being culled and reculled, again and again, should be ceded as refuse lands to the States. Take the State of Ohio for example. According to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the sales in that State for the first three quarters of the past year (1840) amount to $27,146 only, and the expenses of selling, &c. are stated at $7,596—leaving a balance of $19,550. Yes, sir, less than twenty thousand dollars. During the same period, the sales at the land office at Zanesville amounted to $1,099, and the expense of selling $811—leaving a balance from that land district of $288. In the Cincinnati land district the sales are stated at $803, and the expenses of selling at $759—exhibiting a balance of $44; in the Wooster district the sales amounted to only $50, there having been within all that time but a single forty acre tract sold, for $50, while the expenses of selling it amounted within the same period to $720; and in the Steubenville district there were no sales at all, where the amount of incidental expenses is stated at $774. I will not refer to any of the other States, although I believe that the account from the State of my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] if looked into, would be found to be in a very lean condition. Now, sir, does not this statement of facts, about which there can be no dispute, demonstrate, beyond controversy, to all who are unprejudiced, that the time has arrived when these lands, no longer profitable as a source of revenue to the United States, should be ceded to Ohio? And for what, sir? That the State may apply such portions to the purpose of internal improvement and education as can be made available, and donate the residue in small quantities to the poor, who may not have the means of purchasing even at the most reduced prices. In the consummation of this plan, also, the entire country will become settled; the lands will all become taxable, and contribute their due proportion of revenue to the State, instead of being held up by the United States for an interminable period, tax free, and not subject to settlement and improvement. How long are these unsaleable refuse lands to be held up under the present system for a market? Connected with this subject, is the proposition to sell hereafter in quarter-section sections, or forty acre tracts, without restriction—the sales at present in forty acre tracts being limited to two entries only, to the same individual—for what reason I never knew, or could understand. This privilege is to be continued with the graduation of the price, so that the poorest man in the country may, if he chooses, become a freeholder, and possessed of a home which he can call his own. The lands belonging to the United States, in the State of Tennessee, having long since ceased to be regarded as a source of revenue, should, in like manner, as in the case of Ohio, but for still stronger reasons, be ceded to that State without further delay.

The Senator from South Carolina also proposes to provide for the transfer of the evidences of title from the seat of the Federal Government to the seat of Government of the new States, to which they properly appertain. This, sir, is also an important provision; for nothing can be more desirable than to have the titles to real estate—that property which, above all other, constitutes the permanent wealth of a State, from its immovable character and natural tendency to advance in value—within the reach of every man, who may be interested in them, so that he can refer to them with convenience, and procure duplicates in case of loss or accident, at a comparatively small expense.

It is also proposed by the amendment which I have offered, to annul the restriction imposed upon the new States by compact, by which they are prohibited from taxing the lands for five years after the date of the purchase from the United States. I have shown, sir, in the progress of my remarks, that the State of Illinois has already lost, in the way of revenue upon the lands sold within her limits, $1,136,560 by this restriction, and without any advantage whatever to the United States, and what she will lose by its continuance, upon those that are unsold, which are stated at more than nineteen millions of acres.

Suffice it to say, Mr. President, that in our present indebted condition, a repeal of this restriction upon the taxing power of the States, is imperiously demanded, and ought not longer to be withheld. I believe, sir, that I have stated and gone through with the leading features of the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina, and have endeavored, in my plain way, to illustrate, by facts and argument, the advantages which will, in my judgment, result from its adoption to the community at large, the old States as well as the new.

But, sir, I have said that if the distribution scheme succeeds, are we not also in danger of having the price of the lands raised upon us? Was not such a proposition made by an honorable Senator here, [Mr. PRENTISS,] who never moves except upon due consideration, at the session of 1837 '38? And what said the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] who stood nobly by us on that occasion, as he has done on many other occasions, when it was made? Mr. WEBSTER said:

"It has been proposed also so to amend the bill, (the pre-emption bill of 1835) as to require that the settler, in addition to the dollar and a quarter per acre, should pay one-half of the actual value of the land above that sum; this value to be ascertained by appraisers appointed by the register of the land office. I could not agree to this amendment; because, in the first place, we have never adopted the principle of selling lands on appraisement. But secondly, and mainly because if these settlers have had any ground or reason to expect a pre-emption right from Congress, (which is the substantial foundation of the bill,) they have had, and now have, reason to expect it, on the same terms on which it has been granted to others."

What more, sir, could have been said upon the subject, except to ask the Senator who moved the proposition, if they were more valuable than $1.25 per acre, who made them so? I have introduced it to show that fears in this respect are not entirely without foundation.

But again, sir, if Congress should pass a law to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the lands among the States; is it not virtually the same thing as parceling out the land itself among the States? It ceases to be regarded as a source of revenue, and the States alone are interested in making the most of it. Would not such an arrangement in fact, abrogate the compacts by which the new States have agreed not to tax the lands during their ownership by the United States, and for five years after they shall have been sold? Has it not been contended here, not by one, two, or three; but many Senators on the opposite side of the chamber, that the object for which these lands were originally granted by Virginia and other States, having been fulfilled, they revert to the grantors or to the States at large, and are now held by the United States in their aggregate capacity as a trust estate, and to be disposed of accordingly? Sir, the whole matter of ownership, according to their arguments, has become radically and entirely changed. The lands have become a trust estate, Congress the trustee, and the States, old and new inclusive, the cestui que trust. They are no longer the property of the United States. Now, sir, if this be the case, I contend, that from the moment such a bill passes, these compacts will cease to operate, and that the new States will have the right to impose a tax upon all the lands within their respective limits. Suppose, Mr. President, instead of distributing the proceeds of the sales; the lands themselves, (which is the same thing in principle,) should be parcelled out among the States; and we should have a North Carolina reserve, a Connecticut reserve, a Vermont reserve, a Kentucky reserve; and since my friend from Pennsylvania, who sits near me on the right [Mr. STRAZON] has received his distribution instructions, which were introduced this morning, I suppose we must also have a Pennsylvania reserve; and so on with reserves for each of the twenty-six States composing the entire Union; what, sir, would be the effect of such a partition? Would not the whole of these lands become immediately subject to taxation by the new States respectively in which they are situated? And where is the difference in principle, whether you distribute the land or the money arising from the sale of the land? Is this semblance of ownership by the United States to be kept up as a pretext to avoid such taxation? And are the new States to be frightened by this shadow of ownership when the substance has departed? I hold, therefore, Mr. President, that if a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands should be made as proposed by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN] that no arrangement will be just and equitable to the new States, which does not make a proper allowance for the amount of taxes which would accrue from time to time on all the lands thereafter sold within their limits, for the purpose of distribution; and which, independent of the restrictions I have mentioned, would be subject to taxation as other lands.

It is nevertheless true, sir, that the pre-emption principle is engrafted on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN] and I have no doubt of his sincerity and willingness to grant pre-emptions in some form, provided they go hand in hand with distribution; but not otherwise, if we may judge from his former opinions as expressed upon that subject. Although there is a restriction imposed upon the right of the pre-emptor, by limiting the privilege to a particular class, not worth exceeding a thousand dollars, and the quantity of land stated at three hundred and twenty acres; still it has not assumed the form and features of a bill, and may not be all it would seem to be, when it comes to be run out into the details. For instance, are aliens and foreigners, not naturalized, to be included within its scope or not? Will it be prospective in its operation, and will the settlers be permitted, as heretofore, to settle upon the unsurveyed lands, and such as have been surveyed and not brought into market, or not? And if so, will they thereby become entitled to the right of pre-emption or not? These, sir, and many other such considerations, ought not to be overlooked in a measure of such consequence to the people of the new States and the Territories who reside there, and to all such as desire to go there for the purpose of procuring homes for themselves and families. They have not been overlooked in the bill introduced by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] which is fair in features and full in all its proportions. Will the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] consent to such a pre-emption law as this?

But, Mr. President, I desire to say something on the subject of aliens—of such foreigners as have emigrated to and become inhabitants of the new States, and who are so unfortunate as not to be naturalized according to the laws of the United States. Are these aliens to be admitted or not to the benefits intended to be conferred by your [Mr. CRITTENDEN's] proposition? It would seem not, if the vote taken a few days ago on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM,] is to be regarded as an indication of what may be expected from the advocates of distribution. Mr. MANGUM moved to amend the bill, [Mr. BENTON's,] by excepting aliens from its provisions, when the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Huntingdon, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, and Ruggles—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—30.

Sir, what did the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] say on this subject, when a similar proposition was made to exclude foreigners, in 1838, by the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. MERRICK] if my memory serves me. And here I beg leave again to read from the speech of the honorable Senator on that occasion. Mr. WEBSTER said:

"It has been proposed to amend this bill, [the pre-emption bill of 1838,] so as to limit its benefits to native or naturalized citizens of the United States. Although I have been heretofore disposed to favor such a proposition, yet, on the whole, I think it ought not to pass, because such a limitation has been altogether unknown in our general system of land sales; and to introduce it here, where we are acting on rights already acquired, would be both invidious and unjust."

And in reply to his honorable colleague, [Mr. DAVIS], he further remarked:

"My colleague complains, also, that the bill holds out great inducements to foreigners to come among us and settle on the public lands. He says it is an invitation to the nations of Europe to open their work-houses, and send hither all their paupers. Now, sir, in all candor, is this the just character of the bill? Does it propose any change in our law in respect to foreigners? Certainly it does not. Always a foreigner could come here; always he could buy land at the minimum price; always he stood on an exact footing of equality, in this particular, with our own citizens. And would my worthy colleague now make a difference by this bill? If two settlers are found on the frontier, each on his own quarter section, each with a family, and each living under a roof erected by his own hands, and on the produce of fields tilled by his own labor, the one a citizen, and the other a foreigner not yet naturalized, would my colleague make a difference, and confirm the settlement of one, and break up that of the other? No, I am sure, sir, he would do no such thing. His sense of justice and his good feeling would revolt from such a course of action as quick as those of any living human being."

And what better reasons could be given than that it would be a limitation altogether unknown in our general system of land sales, and that such a distinction would be invidious and unjust—and especially in the State of Illinois, where they are expressly permitted by statute to purchase, hold, and transmit real estate in all respects as citizens.

But, Mr. President, my principal object in again introducing foreigners not naturalized, at this late period in the debate, is to reply more fully to the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. GRAHAM] in respect to the constitutional power of a State, and particularly of the State of Illinois, to prescribe the qualifications of such persons as shall be admitted to the right of suffrage in the election of members to the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, and consequently in the elections to be held for members of the House of Representatives in Congress; who, by the Constitution of the United States, (article 1, section 2,) are required to possess the same qualifications. I understood both Senators to say, that a State had no power to admit an alien to vote, unless he had been previously naturalized according to the Constitution and laws of the United States; and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] went farther, and said, that he had been informed that the foreign vote in Illinois, that is, of persons not naturalized, which he declared to be illegal, had given the preponderance to Mr. Van Buren in the late election for President in that State. Now, sir, if the result of the election in Illinois is to be attributed to this foreign vote, all I have to say is, that the Senator's informant knows much more about the matter than I do. In the county in which I reside, there are many Germans, emigrants from foreign lands, who, I am informed, are not naturalized. Their vote was divided at the late election, but in what proportions I am unable to say. I also understood that there were many foreigners, not naturalized, among the Mormons, who voted, and who voted as they had a right to do, almost without exception, for General Harrison. A large majority of the foreigners on the line of the canal, I suppose, (but of this I am entirely uninformed,) voted the Democratic ticket. How they voted in other parts of the State, I know not. With such a state of things, where, from their nature, it must be exceedingly difficult, if not impracticable, for any one to know who was naturalized, and who not; what number voted, and what not; on what side the vote of this one and that one, individually, was cast, how can any one undertake to say, with any degree of certainty, that the result was produced by that or other causes? Sir, there are certain men in this world who always have a cause when defeat overtakes them, (as I will presently undertake to prove in regard to the defeat of Mr. Van Buren, and with him, the Democratic party,) who would assign very different reasons if the victory had declared in their own favor, and against the enemy.

But I come back to the question as to the right of a State to qualify aliens to vote, without previous naturalization according to the acts of Congress.

The Constitution of the United States, art. 1, sec. 2, provides "that the House of Representatives (in Congress) shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States; and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures."

That "no person shall be a representative (in Congress, who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-one years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen."

It is provided by the same article, section 4: "That the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives (to Congress) shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators."

In section 5, of the same article, it is further provided that "each House shall be the judge of elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." And in section 8, of the same article, it is provided that "the Congress shall have power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization throughout the United States."

These, Mr. President, are all the provisions in that instrument which have any relation to this subject. Thus it will be seen that the qualification of persons who may be elected to the House of Representatives in Congress, is prescribed, fixed, and limited by the Constitution of the United States, while the power is reserved to the States to prescribe the qualifications of the electors, by whom they are to be chosen; under the 10th article of the amendments to the Constitution, if there be a doubt, which declares that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people." And this has been uniformly the practice since the commencement of the Government, under its present form of Administration.

Mr. President, I have, in reference to this question of State right, examined all the Constitutions of the States, Rhode Island excepted, which seems to be still working under the old charter granted by his Royal Majesty King Charles the Second, of England; and I find that, in every instance, the qualification of electors for members to the State Legislatures, has been prescribed exclusively by the States; and that many of them do not require citizenship as essential, or at all necessary in constituting the elective franchise. In fifteen of the States, to wit: Maine, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, Alabama, and Arkansas, the word "citizen" is employed as a necessary qualification. In four of the States, to wit: Massachusetts, Vermont, Maryland, and North Carolina, the word "free-men" is used, and "citizen" omitted. In New Jersey, "all inhabitants" of full age, worth £50, proclamation money, with twelve months' residence, are entitled to vote—under which description of all inhabitants, I understand the ladies in that State formerly claimed and exercised the privilege of voting; and had great influence in controlling the result of the elections. In Connecticut, all "free-men," at the adoption of their Constitution, and such as become "citizens" afterwards. In Tennessee, every free white man, being a "citizen" of the United States, with six months' residence, with a proviso that no person shall be disqualified from voting on account of color, who is by the laws of the State a competent witness in a court of justice against a white man. Under this proviso, I understand that certain persons of color are permitted to vote in that State. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. ANDERSON] says, that persons of color are excluded by the new Constitution of that State. They were permitted by the old, and it was to that I had reference, not having seen the new one. In New Hampshire, the expression made "inhabitants," excepting paupers, is employed.

In the State of Michigan it is provided that—

"In all elections every white male citizen above twenty-one years of age, having resided in the State six months next preceding any election, shall be entitled to vote at such election; and every white male inhabitant of the age aforesaid, who may be a resident of the State at the time of the signing of this Constitution, shall have the right of voting as aforesaid."

And in the State of Illinois, it is provided that—

"In all elections, all white male inhabitants above the age of twenty-one years, having resided in the State six months next preceding the election, shall enjoy the right of an elector; but no person shall be permitted to vote, except in the county or district in which he shall actually reside at the time of the election."

And in the schedule of the Constitution of that State, it is further provided that—

"All white male inhabitants above the age of twenty-one years, who shall be actual residents of this State at the signing of this Constitution, shall have a right to vote at the election to be held on the third Thursday, and the two following days of September next."

Which corresponds with a similar provision in the Constitution of the State of Michigan. Besides the State of Tennessee formerly; New York, Maine, and perhaps several other of the States, have, in like manner, conferred the right of suffrage on persons of color, with certain property qualifications; and I saw, in a recent publication by one of the Northern members of the other House, that he attributed his defeat in the last election to this same colored vote. The States also differ in many other respects; some requiring property qualification, some more or less time as to residence, and others that they should have paid taxes, etc. In regard to Michigan, it is evident beyond controversy, that the words "citizen" and "inhabitant," were intended to be used in a very different sense, and to apply to a very different description of persons. It is certain that the word "inhabitant" was intended to include all persons, natives, aliens, and all, whether naturalized, or not, who were residents of the State at the signing of the Constitution; while it is equally certain that a limitation was implied in the word citizen upon those to come afterwards. And this Constitution was ratified by Congress as being in conformity with the requirements of the Constitution of the United States. But I understood the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. GRAHAM] to say that there might be a sort of special naturalization in this constitutional way, while the general power was withheld from the States. Sir, the language of the Constitution of the United States is, that "Congress shall have the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization" only; so that a special naturalization, as supposed, would be without authority. And I hold further, that if this power of prescribing qualifications of electors belongs not to the States, and that naturalization is a necessary prerequisite, that it can no more be conferred by the adoption of a State Constitution containing such an exception, from the uniform rule, than in any other way. It follows of course, from the practice of Congress, and universal usage in all the States, that the construction always has been that the power resided in the States. This, sir, has been the construction of the Constitution of Illinois; and foreigners, although not naturalized, but who have become inhabitants of the State for six months previous to an election, have always been allowed to vote. The question with us has been, not as to the right of the State to prescribe the qualifications of her electors, but whether, in the employment of the word "inhabitants," in our Constitution, it was intended that foreigners, not naturalized, should be entitled to vote. But, sir, we went farther than this, as I mentioned in the course of a few remarks I made on this subject some days ago. In respect to the qualification of Governor, it was provided in the body of the Constitution, that he should be at least thirty years of age, have been a citizen of the United States thirty years, and two years a resident in the State; and the Lieutenant Governor was required to possess the same qualifications. Now, sir, in order to qualify a particular individual for this second office, who stood prominent as a man of integrity and benevolence, but who was a native of Canada, (Col. Pierre Menard of Kaskaskia,) it was provided in the schedule of the Constitution, that any person of thirty years of age, who is a citizen of the United States, and has resided two years within the limits of the State next preceding the election, shall be eligible to the office of Lieutenant Governor, any thing in this Constitution contained notwithstanding. Well, sir, he was put upon the ticket with Col. Bond, who was nominated for Governor, although they were of opposite politics, and continued to be so, as long as Gov. Bond lived, and both were elected by the unanimous vote of the people, without opposition, and both made excellent officers. To give you an instance of his plain but honest bluntness, I will mention an occurrence which happened during a time when he was, by virtue of his office of Lieutenant Governor, presiding as Speaker of the Senate. In 1820, we made a State bank upon a capital of credit and confidence, (specie being rather a scarce article at the time,) as a measure of relief to the people, it being a time of great pecuniary embarrassment; and to make its issues the more acceptable as a circulating medium, a resolution was offered requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to make it land office money. Colonel Menard had been very much opposed to the creation of this bank without a specie capital. So, when the resolution came up for adoption in the Senate, he rose, evidently out of humor, and said, in his broken English—'Gentlemen, as it your wish, and it is my duty, I will put de question—but I bet any man fifty dollar he no made land office money.' And the Colonel was right; it was not made land office money, and depreciated as low at one time as four for one.

But the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. GRAHAM] objects to the right of a State to permit aliens to vote, for the reason that it will give an undue proportion of representation in the general apportionment of political power among the States, and especially in the States where they are not admitted to the right of suffrage. This, sir, is an objection easily answered, by reference to article 1, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides, that "representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included in this Union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons."

It is the number of persons of all descriptions, then, according to the enumeration which shall be made at stated periods, and not the number of voters, which is to regulate the relative distribution of power among the States.

Mr. President, this word "citizen" seems after all to have a very indefinite meaning. In its original acceptation, according to the French Dictionaries, it signified an "an inhabitant or freeman of a city." The natives of a city as contradistinguished from foreigners. According to Mr. Webster's large quarto, it means technically in the United States, "a person native or naturalized, who has the privilege of exercising the elective franchise;" or the qualifications which enable him to vote for rulers, and to purchase and hold real estate. To "citizenize," is to make a "citizen," to admit to the rights and privileges of a citizen, and he gives as an example, that "Talleyrand was citizenized in Pennsylvania, when there in the form of an emigrant."

So that it seems that the State of Pennsylvania, at least in this instance, if it be correct, undertook for herself, and did citizenize, but for what purpose is not stated, a foreign emigrant, without the concurrent authority of the United States.

From this circumstance, it appears, that there may be citizens of a State, who are not citizens of the United States.

I come now, Mr. President, to consider of the causes which, in my judgment, more than any other, led to the late defeat of Mr. Van Buren, and with him the overthrow, for a time, of the Democratic party. Our troubles, sir, commenced with the celebrated year of 1836; a year long to be remembered by those who have been attentive to the political events of the times, as being fraught with more mischief, and bringing in its train more evils, moral and pecuniary, than any which had preceded it, and it is to be hoped, any which has, or may come after it. It was during this year more than any other, that States, corporations and individuals, alike heedless of the future, rushed headlong and madly into the broad vortex of speculation, and many have been swamped and left miring in the quicksands. Yes, sir, wide spread, desolating ruin has been the consequence. It was during this year, that the imports of merchandise from foreign countries ran up to the extraordinary sum of 189,980,035 dollars; 40 millions of dollars more than any preceding year, and nearly 28 millions of dollars more than any year succeeding. While the exports from the United States to foreign countries, for that year, were only 127,663,040 dollars—showing a balance of trade against us, for that year alone, of the enormous amount of 62,316,995 of dollars. The sales of the public lands, also, suddenly run up during that year to the sum of 25,167,833 dollars—being 9,168,029 dollars more than any year preceding, and 18,160,310 dollars more than the sales of any subsequent year.

The sales, Mr. President, for this memorable year of 1836, exceeded four millions of dollars in the State of Illinois alone. And so it was with every thing. The delusive phantom of speculation seemed to have taken complete possession of the human mind, and our extravagance and folly not only astonished and alarmed the sober minded and reflecting of our own country, but all Europe for a time stood still, and looked upon our rapid movements towards wealth and fortune with wonder and amazement. Why, sir, during this period, the speculators in the public lands, in many instances, in their haste to become rich, looked only to the maps in the land offices to see what was vacant, and swept it all, good, bad, and indifferent, (or I would be more correct if I should say, the bad, worse, and still more indifferent, as the good had, for the most part, been taken before) that was subject to private entry, far and wide; swamp, sand ridges and all, and where are they now? No wonder, then, that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] can show by figures and by facts, that many of the lands which were some years before that time reported by the land officers as being of little value, have since been sold at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. To give you an example of this system of speculation, and of its ruinous consequences, I need only to refer to the case of the New York and Boston Illinois Land Company. This, sir, is perhaps the most wealthy company of the kind in the United States. It is composed, for the most part, of gentlemen of fortune, who are still wealthy, notwithstanding their losses upon their investments in this stock. Their purchases, I believe, exceeded a million of acres, and their lands are of average good quality; many of them are considered as among the very best lands in the State; and what has been the result of their operations? Why, sir, with most of their lands on hand, still unsold, with a large amount of taxes annually to pay upon them, their stock is down to thirty cents in the dollar, notwithstanding it is backed by some of the most substantial wealth in the country. Such being the facts in regard to this wealthy land company, what must they be with that inferior class of individuals who speculated exclusively on money borrowed from the banks, and whose purchases were in the general limited to lands of inferior quality? Sir, comment is unnecessary.

And now, Mr. President, for the application. Universal pecuniary embarrassment had seized upon many parts of the country; broken speculators and debtors of every class and degree, and belonging to every party, had in many instances become desperate, and cried out for a change! Yes, sir, this magic word change! change!! was rung from the mountain tops, and echoed through the valleys, and this it was that, in my judgment, led to our defeat, and not the machinations of the bankers in Threadneedle or Lombard streets in London, or in Wall street, in New York. No, sir, many were in debt, and hopelessly in debt, without some great and extraordinary change, which could not be anticipated in ordinary good times, when men are expected not only to support their families, but also to pay their debts, by a prudent and economical arrangement of their business, and an industrious application to their occupation, whether it be that of merchant, lawyer, doctor, farmer, or mechanic. To all such—I speak in the general—this change became desirable, as a measure of relief, for the reason, as was stated, that they could not be worsted; and that peradventure something might, in the course of coming events, turn up for the better. Sir, I will give you an instance of this feeling in a case which, I am informed, occurred in my own county. An individual who, on many accounts, had been regarded as a prominent member of the Democratic party, and who still professed to belong to it, said to one of his neighbors that he had not voted for either of the candidates for the Presidency. Upon his neighbor expressing some astonishment, and asking the reason why he had not voted, he replied by way of excuse, "that in common with many of his neighbors, he had been imprudent and was in debt; and, although it was still in accordance with his principles that Mr. Van Buren should be elected, that he believed it would be to his interest that General Harrison should be elected; and that between principle and interest he had stood still, and had not voted." And thus it was with thousands and tens of thousands, who not only "stood still," but voted for the enemy. I use the word enemy with no invidious or reproachful meaning. Well, Mr. President, our opponents have succeeded in bringing this change about as a great relief measure, and by unprecedented majorities, as is generally the case with such measures; and let them take heed that it does not, like most other measures of relief, be found upon experiment not to answer the public expectation, and like them doomed, in case of disappointment, to very short duration. Who, Mr. President, of the West, has forgotten the history of my native State, of your own State, (Kentucky) and in your own times, in regard to these same measures of relief; and who does not recollect the rapidity with which they successively passed away. In 1816 or 1817, the Legislature of that State chartered the celebrated lifter of banks, forty-two in number, as a measure of relief, and what became of them? Gore, sir, to the tomb of the Capulets. They exploded one by one; and in the space of a few short years, not one of all was left to tell the story of their misfortunes. And yet, sir, this measure was popular in its day. Then followed the stay and replevy laws; the old and new court questions; and the disasters which befel them, had, for a time, well nigh demolished the entire judiciary system of the State. How was it, sir, in Illinois, the State of my adoption? In 1820, our old State bank (long since exploded and now almost forgotten) was established as a measure of relief; it had no other capital than credit and confidence, for we had no money, and its notes were payable in ten years. It was, nevertheless, a measure called for by the popular voice. Mr. President, its story is soon told: its notes very soon depreciated as low as four for one—the Supreme Court of the State declared it unconstitutional, and the State lost one hundred thousand dollars by the experiment; and had, in the end, to borrow that amount to make good the deficit. In my judgment, Mr. President, all relief laws which interfere between debtor and creditor, in respect to their contracts, are productive of mischief. They destroy punctuality in dealing, corrupt the morals, and make men seek for advantages which they would not think of, and of which they would be ashamed, under other circumstances, by affording this sort of legal encouragement, under the seductive form of measures of relief. Whether this change of rulers, and with it a change in the administration of the Government, as a great measure of relief to the country, will or will not prove to be an exception to the rule, remains yet to be tried. But I can tell the gentlemen who are opposed to us, in the language of the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEVIER,] with whom I perfectly agree on this subject, that much will be expected; that money must be made so plentiful as scarcely to be worth the asking for it; that every man must have his pockets filled and to give away if he chooses; that the banks are to throw open their vaults, that each may borrow what he pleases, without having to work for it, and without being under any particular obligation to repay it. Let all these things, and many more in the way of relief, be not done, and who can tell what may come of disappointment?

But it has been said that Gen. Jackson was the author of much of this distress, by advising the banks, several years ago, to discount liberally. Sir, this is no excuse for the banks having extended their accommodations, if they did so, beyond the limits of reason and propriety. It was the duty of presidents and directors, in respect to the trust confided to them by the stockholders; it was their duty as officers and as men, whoever may have advised, not to have exceeded the bounds of prudence and the reasonable wants of the country. Sir, this almost universal disposition, when calamity overtakes us, to impute the cause to any thing rather than our own mismanagement, reminds me forcibly of the propriety of our attending more closely than we are in the habit of doing, to the moral of a text from which our worthy and talented chaplain [Mr. Cookman] preached sometime ago, which is as well applicable in politics as in matters of religion. The text was, "Take heed unto thyself." Yes, sir, if any man will but take the trouble to examine himself in these matters of running in debt, of overtrading and overliving, and the consequent embarrassment and pecuniary distress, he will very seldom have to travel beyond his own door to ascertain the cause. Sir, I blame no man for any of my improvident acts. I act upon my own judgment, as all men who have arrived at years of maturity should do, and if I am deceived, I endeavor to repair the loss, and profit by the experience. But, Mr. President, this change of fortune in money matters, which has come upon us, did not come unexpected. The old farmers of the country frequently spoke of it, and said it was inevitable. They said that property was too high, that the people had become extravagant, and that the price of produce and of labor had run up to fictitious rates, which could not be sustained, and which were not, in fact, desirable for the general welfare of the country; that uniform reasonable prices would be much better. All predicted it; the prudent prepared for it, and those that were overtaken in their difficulties, excused themselves by saying that it had come sooner than they expected, or, as was most frequently the case with the Whigs, put all the blame upon the Government.

I have now only a word to say, Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from New York, [Mr. Wright], on the subject of State stocks and State indebtedness, and will bring my remarks, already spun out much longer than I intended, to a close. I understood the Senator to say that the present indebtedness of the States, according to the information he had received, was about two hundred millions of dollars; and that about half that amount, or one hundred millions, in stocks, had been hypothecated upon an average of about fifty cents to the dollar; that the time had arrived for the payment of the advances; that these pledged stocks, in consequence of a failure by the States to comply with the terms upon which they were hypothecated, were in a condition to be forfeited, and might now be sold in the market at a sacrifice, for the benefit of the bankers with whom they had been pledged; and to argue from these premises, that any measure which might be adopted here, by which the value of these stocks would be enhanced in the hands of the bankers, would ensure a benefit to their benefit, and not to the States by whom they had been pledged. Now, sir, I cannot say to what extent the Senator's [Mr. Wright's] information may or may not be correct, but I know that in relation to the stocks of Illinois, the facts are far otherwise. When I was in London as an agent of that State, something more than a year ago, I understood the practice to be with most of the States, when there was not an absolute sale, simply to establish an agency for the sale of their bonds upon such terms as might be agreed upon; say, for instance, at £91 to the £100, as in my own case, allowing to the banker the excess above that sum by way of commission for selling, &c. upon which contract he agreed to make certain advances to the State by instalments, to be reimbursed out of the first sales of bonds, but with the express provision in the agreement, that the bonds shall not at any time be sold for less than £91 to the £100. There is also, in the general, a provision that the dividends accruing upon the stock sold, shall be payable at the house where sold, for which it is usual to charge one per cent. commission. This, sir, is my limited experience on the subject. As long, therefore, Mr. President, as these stocks continue the property of the States; whether subject to forfeiture or not, any increase in the price would surely tend to their benefit, and not to the bankers by whom they are held—who can only rightfully claim to the extent of their advances with such additional interest as may have been agreed upon.

But, sir, I care not whether these bonds are in the hands of bankers or not; whether, if bankers, they reside in Threadneedle or Lombard streets, abroad, or in Wall or Chestnut streets, at home; or whether disposed of providently or improvidently, that it is our duty as States to pay them.

And here permit me to read an extract from the late message of my excellent friend, Governor Carlin, to the Legislature of Illinois, now in session, on this important subject:

"These embarrassments (says the Governor, alluding to the debt of that State) have grown out of our system of internal improvements, adopted by improvident legislation, at a time when the delusive phantom of speculation seemed to have taken possession of the human mind, and led the world into extravagance and error; and however deeply we may regret the evil which this system has entailed upon us, it would be unwise and unpatriotic to shrink from the responsibility of applying your best efforts to the pecuniary redemption of the State, and the preservation of her honor. The vast debt she has already incurred must be paid; and this can only be done by a strict and rigid maintenance of her credit abroad, and the wisdom with which her measures are directed at home."

These sentiments, Mr. President, do credit to the head and the heart of the man who uttered them; and I trust will meet with a response from every member of our Legislature, whatever may be his politics, as well as from every man in the State, who has the feelings of a patriot, and a proper respect for the credit and honor of the country which he has selected for the home of himself, and his children who are to succeed him. Sir, we have struggled thus far successfully. I hope that we shall continue to struggle as with the united efforts of one man, and that under the influence of a benign Providence, our efforts may, in the end, be crowned with complete success.

What! Illinois, the fairest portion of this Union, dishonored? No, sir, her patriotic yeomanry, I trust, will never submit to so humiliating a condition, as that their beautiful State shall become a bye-word of reproach for having been the first to violate her most solemn engagements.

At the conclusion of the debate, and just before the vote was taken on his proposition to dispose of the public lands to the new States in which they are situated, upon certain conditions, Mr. CALHOUN rose in his place, and read from Gales and Seaton's Register of Debates, in support of his position, the following extract from the speech of Mr. John Randolph of Virginia, in the Senate of the United States, in March, 1826, in reply to General Harrison, of Ohio; the subject of the Cumberland Road being under consideration:

"Mr. Randolph again rose, and said, the gentleman is mistaken if he supposes that I begrudge the people from Ohio the lands within the body of Ohio. I wish that every new State had all the lands within the State, that in the shape of receiverships and other ways, these States might not be brought under the influence of this terrible square. In other words, I wish that all the patronage of the land office was in the hands of the individual States, and not in the hands of the General Government. I am the friend of State rights, and will cut down the patronage of this General Government, which has increased, is increasing, and must be diminished, or we the States shall be not only 'shorn of our beams,' sir, but 'abolished quite.'"

Mr. BENTON then rose, and read the following extract from a speech of Mr. Van Buren on the same subject, delivered in the Senate on the 18th of May, 1826

Mr. Van Buren said:

"The subject of the public lands was becoming daily more and more interesting, and would occupy much time in legislation. It extended the patronage of the Government over these States to a great extent; it subjected the States in which those lands were situated, to an unwise and unprofitable dependence on the Federal Government. Mr. V. B. said he should vote for every call on that subject, to enable them at some future day to act understandingly on it. No man could render the country a greater service than he who should devise some plan by which the United States might be relieved from the ownership of this property, by some equitable mode. He would vote for a proposition to vest the lands in the States in which they stood, on some just and equitable terms, as related to the other States of the Confederacy. He hoped that, after having full information on the subject, they would be able to effect that great object. He believed that if those lands were disposed of at once to the several States, it would be satisfactory to all."

Mr. BENTON also read from the Senate journal of May 20, 1826, the following motion, as having been submitted by Mr. TAZEWELL of Virginia, to the effect as stated:

"Mr. TAZEWELL submitted the following motion: 'Resolved, That it is expedient for the United States to cede and surrender to the several States, within whose limits the same may be situated, all the right, title, and interest of the United States, to any lands lying and being within the boundaries of such States, respectively, upon such terms and conditions as may be consistent with the due observance of the public faith, and with the general interest of the United States.'"

On the subject of graduating the price of the public lands, Mr. TAZEWELL said, in 1828, in his place in the Senate:

"That he was pleased with the plan of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Benton], but he thought it ought to extend farther. He would wish to have the arrangement something like this: while the lands are at the highest minimum, one dollar, allow the actual settlers to have the pre-emption right at seventy-five cents; when they are at seventy-five cents, allow actual settlers to enter them at fifty cents; and so on down to the lowest. This, he thought, would be productive of a good effect, as it would be a continued encouragement to actual settlers, and give them an advantage over other purchasers."

Mr. MACON of North Carolina said:

"That he wished to make a motion in relation to the bill. It was one of great importance. He was in favor of the first section, as he thought the graduation experiment ought to be tried and would, if it was in order, move to strike out all but that section."

After the reading of these extracts, the vote was taken on Mr. CALHOUN's proposition as submitted by Mr. YOUNG, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen and Tappan of Ohio, Anderson and Nicholson of Tennessee, Benton and Linn of Missouri, Calhoun of South Carolina, Clay and King of Alabama, Fulton and Sevier of Arkansas, Lumpkin of Georgia, Mouten and Nicholas of Louisiana, Norvell of Michigan, Pierce of New Hampshire, Roane of Virginia, Robinson and Young of Illinois, and Walker of Mississippi—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bates and Webster of Massachusetts, Bayard and Clayton of Delaware, Buchanan and Sturgeon of Pennsylvania, Clay and Crittenden of Kentucky, Dixon and Knight of Rhode Island, Graham and Mangum of North Carolina, Henderson of Mississippi, Hubbard of New Hampshire, Huntington and Smith of Connecticut, Ker and Merrick of Maryland, Phelps and Prentiss of Vermont, Porter of Michigan, Preston of South Carolina, Rives of Virginia, Rugles and Williams of Maine, Smith and White of Indiana, Souhard and Wall of New Jersey, and Tallmadge and Wright of New York—31.

Of the 18 Senators from the nine new States, 14 voted for the amendment; and 4, Messrs. SMITH and WHITE of Indiana, Mr. HENDERSON of Mississippi, and Mr. PORTER of Michigan, voted against it.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

26th CONGRESS AND 2d SESSION, JANUARY 30, 1841.

Submitted by Mr. YOUNG, of Illinois, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALHOUN's Land Bill, to dispose of the public lands to the new States in which they are situated.

Proposed by Mr. YOUNG as an amendment submitted by Mr. CRITTENDEN, to recommit, with certain instructions, the bill (S. 28) "to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system in favor of settlers on the public lands who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon," viz: Strike out all after the word "report," in the second line, and insert the following as an amendment to the original bill:

A provision to dispose of the public lands within the limits of the new States, to the following effect:

That all the public lands within the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Michigan, with the exceptions of the sites of fortifications, navy and dock yards, arsenals, magazines, and all other public buildings, shall, after the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, be disposed of to the States within the limits of which they are respectively situated, they having previously complied with the following conditions:

First. That the said States shall severally pass acts, to be irrevocable, that they will monthly, as the sales of the said lands shall progress, pay into the Treasury of the United States, at the most convenient places of deposit, and to such officer as may be appointed to receive the same, sixty-five per cent. on the gross amount of the sales of such lands, including, under sales, grants, and donations by the States, estimating the lands at the selling price at the time of the grant or donation, on or before the first day of February of each succeeding year.

Secondly. That the minimum price, as now fixed by law, shall remain unchanged until the thirtieth day of June aforesaid; but, after that period, the price may be reduced by the States respectively, according to the following scale: all lands theretofore offered at public sale, and then remaining unsold ten years or upward, preceding the thirtieth day of June aforesaid, may be reduced by said States to a price not less than one dollar per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold fifteen years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, may thereafter be reduced by said States to a price not less than seventy-five cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold twenty years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, may then be reduced by said States to a price not less than fifty cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold twenty-five years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, may thereafter be reduced by said States to a price not less than twenty-five cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold thirty years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, shall be ceded immediately to the States in which said lands are situated: Provided, That all lands which shall remain unsold after having been offered at public sale for ten years, and which do not come under the above provisions, shall be subject to the provisions of pre-emption, graduation, and disposition aforesaid, at the respective periods of ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, and thirty years, after said sale, commencing from the expiration of ten years after the same had been offered at public sale.

Thirdly. That the lands shall be subject to the same legal subdivisions in the sale and surveys as is now provided by law, reserving for each township and fractional township the sixteenth section, or the substitute, for the use of schools, as heretofore provided by law; and the land not yet offered for sale, shall be first offered by the State at public auction, except in cases of pre-emption, and be sold for cash only, in the manner now provided by law. And any land now or hereafter remaining unsold after the same shall have been offered at sale at public auction, shall be subject to entry for cash only, according to the graduation which may be fixed by the States respectively, under the provisions of this act; and that the acts of Congress which may be in force at the time of assenting to this act shall remain unchanged, except as modified by this act, unless with the assent of Congress: Provided, That any of said lands may, after they shall have become subject to private entry, be sold at the option of the purchaser, in quarter quarter sections, without any limitation whatever.

Fourth. This disposition of the public lands, together with the portion of the sales to be retained by the States respectively, under the provisions of this act, shall be in full of the five per cent. fund, or any part thereof, not already accrued to any State; and the said State shall be exclusively liable for all charges that may hereafter arise from the surveys, sales, and management of the public lands, and extinguishment of Indian title within the limits of said States, respectively.

Fifth. That, on a failure to comply with any of the above conditions, or a violation of the same, on the part of any of the said States, the cession herein made to the State failing to comply with or violating said conditions, shall be thereby rendered null and void; and all grants or titles thereafter made by said State, for any portion of the public lands within the limits of the same, ceded by this act, shall be, and are hereby declared to be, null and void, and of no effect whatever.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, upon every reduction in the prices of said lands, which shall take place by the graduating process of this bill, the Legislatures of the several States in which the lands are situated shall, at their discretion, have power to grant to the respective occupants or settlers upon any of said lands, rights of pre-emption at such graduated or reduced prices: which rights shall extend to a period of ninety days from and after the date at which the respective graduations shall take place; and any lands not taken up by the respective occupants or settlers within that period, shall be liable to be entered or purchased by any other person, until the next graduation or reduction in price shall take place, when it shall, if not previously purchased, be again subject to the right of pre-emption for ninety days, as before; and so on, from time to time, as said reductions shall take place.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the President of the United States shall be officially notified that any of the States aforesaid has passed an act in compliance with the above conditions, it shall be his duty, after the thirtieth day of June aforesaid, or forthwith after the passage of said act, if passed subsequent to that period, to adopt such measures as he shall think proper to close the land offices, including the surveying department, within the limits of said State; and that the commissions of all officers connected therewith shall expire on a day to be fixed by him, but which day shall not be beyond six months after the thirtieth day of June aforesaid, or, if subsequent thereto, from the day he received the official notification of the passage of said act.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That on such notification being made, the said State shall be relieved from all compacts, acts, or ordinances, imposing restrictions on the right of said State to tax any lands by her authority subsequent to the sale thereof, ceded by this act; and all maps, titles, records, books, documents, and papers, in the General Land Office at Washington, relative to said lands, or duplicates thereof, where the originals cannot properly be transferred, shall be subject to the order and disposition of the Executive of said State, in such manner as the Legislature of said States may respectively appoint.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all lands of the United States within the limits of the State of Tennessee, with the exceptions enumerated in the first section of this act, shall be, and the same are hereby, ceded to said State.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the sixty-five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales, hereby secured to be paid to the United States, shall be set apart and exclusively applied to the gradual increase of the navy, and the erection of such fortifications for the general defence of the country, as Congress may by law hereafter order and direct.

REMARKS OF MR. LINN,

OF MISSOURI.

In Senate, January 8, 1841—On asking leave, in pursuance to previous notice, to introduce a bill to authorize the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, and for extending certain portions of the laws of the United States over the same.

Mr. LINN said, that when this bill was before the Senate for discussion during the last and preceding session of Congress, his political friends, as well as opposers, earnestly pressed him to forbear urging the subject to a final vote, as it might prove embarrassing at that time in the settlement of the long pending and important question of the Northeast boundary. This was not at the time satisfactory, nor was he convinced of the necessity of delay, but he had reluctantly yielded to the advice and opinions of gentlemen of undoubted patriotism, and of great experience in public affairs. His own opinion then was, and is now, that it is better for the people of this country to have all the causes of dispute between us and Great Britain brought into a small compass, present them for settlement at one and the same time, and have them promptly decided, one way or the other. Past experience, he thought, had most conclusively proved that the United States could gain nothing by delay. Our opponents will strengthen their claims by indecision and apathy on our part. But he never expected to see these boundary questions amicably arranged. The past history of the English Government afforded to him conclusive evidence on this subject. He believed sincerely that every member of the Senate then present would be numbered with the dead before Great Britain would consent to let go her hold upon a portion of the State of Maine by an amicable arrangement, unless she finally decided upon surrendering her Canadian possessions. If his memory served him correctly, England, pending the negotiations at Ghent, was willing and anxious to purchase the country now in dispute. He did not mean to say there had been a formal offer made, but finding that such an offer would have been indignantly repelled, they had, step by step, made territorial encroachments until she now presented to the world a claim of great importance, much strengthened by time, where at first she had nothing more than the mere shadow of a claim. Yes, sir, less than a shadow. The history of the past in this matter will be the history of the future. Under cover of the incorporated Hudson Bay Company, the English had extended their possessions, step by step, from the confines of their Canadian provinces, to the borders of Upper California. Under pretext of any early discovery of the Northwest coast by Sir Francis Drake in the years 1578 and '80, and of the discovery of the extreme northern branch of the Colombia river in 1806, and many other pretended discoveries, not necessary now to mention, they laid claim to the Territory of Oregon.

He said he recently received a letter from that quarter, in which it was stated that the Hudson Bay Company was introducing emigrants from England, by the way of Cape Horn, and establishing them on farms; that they had erected saw mills, and carried on a brisk trade in lumber with the Sandwich and other islands; that they had erected seven forts under the name of "trading posts," and were rapidly extending their trade and influence over the Indians, almost to the exclusion of the American citizens and traders on both sides of the Rocky Mountains.

By the treaties of 1818 and 1827, the title to the Territory of Oregon was to be considered in abeyance, and joint occupations agreed upon. This delay has been like the Maine boundary. They have profited by our supineness, and they will continue to do so unless we arouse from the lethargy into which we have sunk. By an act of Parliament, passed in the year 1820 or '21, a portion of the criminal law of England had been extended over the Territory of Oregon, and over the vast regions east of the Rocky Mountains, up to the very confines of the States of Missouri and Arkansas. Now, Mr. President, if we have a just title to the country in dispute, it should not be abandoned to any power upon earth, nor ought we to sleep any longer upon our claims. He thought we should at least move pari passu with our adversaries. He said he was prepared to go into the discussion of the whole question involved, at the proper time. He had been censured in letters received from gentlemen residing in all part of the Union, for not having pressed his bill to a final decision, which delay was caused by the opinion of others that it might be considered as a new element of discord pending the settlement of the Northeastern boundary. He said that justice to the country at large, and to his own constituents, would not permit him any longer to postpone some definitive action in regard to this subject. He would not occupy the time further of the Senate at present, but should the Senate grant leave for the introduction of the bill, he would embrace the opportunity when it came up for consideration to submit his views at large.

Leave being granted, the bill was introduced, read a first and second time, and referred to a select committee of Messrs. LINN, WALKER, PIERCE, PRESTON, and SEVIER.

The following is the bill reported by them:

A BILL to authorize the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, and for extending certain portions of the laws of the United States over the same.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the title of the United States to the Territory of Oregon is certain, and will not be abandoned.

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to take immediate measures to have the boundaries of the United States on the Pacific frontier ascertained and fixed, and in the meantime he take such measures as may be necessary to protect the persons and property of our citizens residing or trading in the Territory of Oregon.

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and required to cause to be erected at suitable places and distances, a line of military posts from Fort Leavenworth to the Rocky Mountains, for the better protection and encouragement of the Indian trade, and for the preservation of peace between the whites and Indians.

That as soon as the boundaries of the Oregon Territory are indisputably determined, one thousand acres of land shall be granted to every white male inhabitant of said Territory, of the age of eighteen years and upwards, who shall cultivate and use the same for five consecutive years, or to his heirs or heirs at law, if such there be.

That the President is hereby authorized and required to appoint an additional Indian agent, with a salary of fifteen hundred dollars, whose duty it shall be (under his direction and control) to superintend the interests of the United States with any or every Indian tribe west of any agency now established by law.

That the sum of _____ dollars be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any citizen of the United States shall, within the territory or district of country lying west of the Rocky mountains, south of fifty-four degrees and forty minutes of north latitude, and north of the forty-second degree of north latitude, commit any crime, offence or misdemeanor, which, if committed elsewhere, would be punished by the laws of the United States, or if any person shall, within such part of the territory or district of country as belongs to the United States, west of the Rocky Mountains, commit any such crime, offence or misdemeanor, upon the property or person of any citizen of the United States, every offender, on being thereof convicted, shall suffer the like punishment as is provided by the laws of the United States for the like offences, if committed within any place or district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. The trial of all offences against this act shall be in the district where the offender is apprehended, or into which he may first be brought; and the supreme courts in each of the Territorial districts, and the circuit courts, and other courts of the United States, of similar jurisdiction in criminal causes, in each district of the United States, in which any offender against this act shall be first apprehended, or brought for trial, shall have, and hereby are invested with, full power and authority to hear, try, and punish, all crimes, offences, and misdemeanors, against this act; such courts proceeding in the same manner as if such crimes, offences, and misdemeanors had been committed within the bounds of their respective districts.

SPEECH OF MR. BUCHANAN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

In Senate, Friday, January 22, 1841—In defence of the administration of Mr. Van Buren against the charge of extravagance in expending the public money.

Mr. BUCHANAN rose to answer each of the four specific charges of extravagance which had been made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] against the present Administration. That Senator had called upon him personally to make this answer; and he undertook the task with pleasure, not believing it to be one of much difficulty. Before, however, he should apply himself directly to this work, he would take the liberty of making some preliminary observations.

And in the first place, said Mr. B. permit me to observe, that I, at least, have never introduced into this Senate, as topics of debate, "log cabins, hard cider, and coon skins;" nor have I ever made an observation here which could be tortured into a reflection upon either the integrity or intelligence of the people of the United States for having elected General Harrison their President. The Senator from Kentucky has promptly and frankly disclaimed any intention of imputing to me such a charge; and with this I am entirely satisfied. The people are the only legitimate sovereigns of this country, and however much I may regret their recent decision of the Presidential question, I shall never, either here or elsewhere, indulge myself in the use of reproachful language against them for this or any other cause.

If I know myself, said Mr. B. I came to Congress in December last with the desire and with the expectation that this would prove to be a business session. It was my sincere wish that the political excitement which has recently agitated the people and has extended to every portion of the land, might, for the present, be suffered to subside, and that we might bring up the arrears of business with which we are now encumbered. I had not the most distant idea that this chamber would again so soon be converted into a mere political arena. Acting under a sense of duty, I have abstained from political conflicts since the commencement of the present session, except when compelled to enter the lists in the necessary defence of myself or of my party. I have made no assaults, and have generally been a mere listener.

I had another reason for refraining from any participation in the debate now before the Senate. I knew that the question of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands was before the Legislature of my own State, and that I might be instructed on the subject; and, as I shall ever entertain and express the utmost deference and respect for that Legislature, whatever political party may be in the majority, I thought that a proper sense of delicacy required me to abstain from discussing this question. I have not, therefore, said, nor do I now intend to say, a single word upon that subject; and I shall either give my vote according to these instructions, should they pass, or resign my seat. I am not the man who, after having enjoyed the sunshine of political favor, will shrink from the storm. I long since, from the deepest conviction, adopted the principle that the representative was bound by the instructions of his constituents. I consider it essential to the wholesome action of a free, Democratic Republican form of Government; and having publicly avowed this doctrine at a period when there appeared to be but little probability that it could ever reach myself, I shall not disavow it in the day of apparent gloom and adversity. I am willing to abide the fate of war.

For a similar reason, I might even have refrained from advocating the passage of the pre-emption bill, dear as it now is, and ever has been to me, had I then known that the instructions before the Legislature of Pennsylvania embraced this subject, as well as that of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. I am glad, however, now to find, that even the Senator from Kentucky himself [Mr. CRITTENDEN] is in favor of the principle of pre-emption, and has actually incorporated it with that of distribution in his motion now before the Senate. This renders it certain, that if ever a distribution bill should pass—and from the signs of the times I consider such a result probable—the poor man, who has expended his toil in erecting an humble dwelling, and cultivating the soil, shall not be driven from his home on the public lands of the far West; provided he is willing to pay the Government price for the quarter section which he has selected and improved.

For one, it was both my design and my desire, so far as I was concerned, to devote this session to the necessary business of the country, and to wait patiently until General Harrison should get into power. I shall then judge the tree by its fruits, without any predetermination to oppose his measures. I am bound, notwithstanding, in candor, to declare, that if he entertains the opinion of his friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN], in regard to a National Bank, he [General Harrison] believes that to be a great good, which I consider one of the greatest evils which can befall the country. Without, at present, alluding to its fatal political consequences, I believe that in a mere financial point of view, it would prove destructive to our prosperity. In order to obtain a specie capital for such an institution, you must either ruin or essentially cripple our State banks; or you must adopt the alternative of borrowing specie abroad, and creating a national debt for this purpose. One or other of these alternatives is inevitable; and the country is not in a condition to resort to either, without great injury to the people. But enough of this for the present. I return to the subject with which I commenced.

I shall now proceed to show that the charge of extravagance which has been so often made and reiterated against the present Administration by both the Senators from Kentucky, [Messrs. CRITTENDEN and CLAY,] is without foundation. It will be for the Senate and the country to decide whether I shall have succeeded.

It will be recollected that in the month of May last, a report was made by the Secretary of the Treasury in obedience to a resolution of the Senate on the subject of the annual expenditures of the Federal Government during the fifteen preceding years. From that report it appears, that the ordinary expenses of this Government, which in 1824 amounted to a little more than seven millions one hundred thousand dollars, had been gradually increasing until the year 1839, when they a little exceeded thirteen millions and a quarter. I mean by "ordinary expenses," the money annually disbursed in maintaining the permanent civil, military, and naval establishments of the country, and embracing every expenditure necessary to conduct the Government prosperously in time of peace. Now, in regard to this class of expenditures, I have never heard any Senator on either side of the House complain of their amount, or that they had risen from seven to thirteen millions of dollars between 1824 and 1839. During this period, a number of new States have been admitted into the Union, and several new Territories created—the army and navy have both been considerably increased, and the expenses of Congress have of late years become enormous, requiring reform more than any other branch of the Government. Our expenditures must necessarily increase with the growth of the country; but it ought to be our care that this increase shall be as slow as possible, and never proceed beyond what is absolutely necessary for the public service. We might with as much reason expect that the little garment which was sufficient to cover the child of eight or ten years of age, would prove sufficient to protect him from the wind and the storm after he had grown to be a giant, as argue that the "ordinary expenses" of the Government should not have increased with the rapid, nay the unexampled growth of the nation during the last fifteen years. Nothing has been said against these expenses, either in the aggregate or in detail, since they were brought to the attention of gentlemen by the Secretary's report. It is, then, fair to presume that nothing can be urged against a single item of them. On this triumphant result, I am most happy to have it in my power to congratulate the friends of the present Administration.

The Secretary of the Treasury in the same report to which I have referred, also, presented an annual statement of the expenses "of an extraordinary or temporary character," from 1824 to 1839, both years inclusive, arranged under different heads. When this report came into the Senate in the month of May last, both the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] and myself called upon the gentlemen on the opposite side to point out a single item of extravagance amongst all these expenditures of the Government, whether ordinary or extraordinary. Not one of them was then bold enough even to make the attempt. Our challenge was not met. And now I would ask the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] on whom ought the burden of the proof of extravagance to rest? Would he require the friends of the Administration to go over, item by item, all the ten thousand items of expenditure which have been submitted in a distinct form to Congress, and show that in each particular instance there was no extravagance? This would, as that honorable Senator well knows, be reversing all the rules of common law, as well as of common sense. We present to the Senators in opposition a clear and distinct account in detail of the expenses of the Government; and it is manifestly their duty, if they believe there has been extravagance in any item, to lay their hand upon it and show wherein the extravagance consists. This they cannot do, or they would long since have accepted our challenge. They are, therefore, driven to condemn in the aggregate, although they can find no fault with any of the details of which this aggregate is composed. They exclaim that the Administration has been extravagant, because it has expended one hundred and thirty millions of dollars in four years, whilst they do not point out in what manner it would have been possible to have reduced this expenditure. It is true that at this late day the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] has denounced four particular items of the account as extravagant; but I think I shall prove, before I sit down, that he has been less wise and wary than his colleague, [Mr. CLAY,] in descending from generals to particulars.

I do not deny but that the "extraordinary expenses" of the Government have been very large during the last four years. But whether these expenditures were great or small, is not the question. Were they inevitable? Could they have been avoided by any human prudence or foresight on the part of the Executive or his friends in Congress? Was not each of the treaties and acts of Congress under which these expenditures were necessarily incurred, sanctioned and sustained by the very Senators who now condemn them in the aggregate? These are the true questions.

These "extraordinary expenses" must, from the nature of things, vary with the ever varying condition of the country. Our circumstances are changing with every changing year. Some years ago, the nation was gliding along on the smooth current of prosperity, and requiring but little above the ordinary expenditure necessary to keep the Government in regular motion. Not so, since the present President came into power. It has been his misfortune, that, during the period of his administration, heavy expenses, of an extraordinary character, which he could not have avoided, were rendered absolutely necessary, whilst the revenue of the Government has been greatly reduced, by causes equally beyond his control. Is it not, then, the most crying injustice—is it not the strangest accusation in the world, to charge the man who happened to take the helm of State when the country was involved in such difficulties, with extravagance, merely because he was compelled to execute treaties and laws which had received the sanction of all political parties in Congress?

Under such circumstances, ought he to be denounced because the necessary expenses of Government happened to exceed, under his Administration, those which were incurred under his predecessors? True economy in a Government does not consist in hoarding money like the miser, and doing no good with it; but in applying it, with a provident hand, to the accomplishment of such objects as are necessary to the defence and prosperity of the country. After these objects of expenditure have been designated by Congress, Executive economy consists in accomplishing them at the cheapest rate possible. This is the only economy which can be practised by the President; and if he has neglected this duty in any particular instance he would be liable to censure; but not otherwise.

In order to swell the expenditures of the last four years to one hundred and thirty millions, Senators have included items not only of the most unjust, but of the most ridiculous character. I shall enumerate a few of them.

One large item in this amount was for money expended upon the public buildings. Is there a single member of the Senate who either raised his voice, or gave his vote against the appropriations for this purpose? The money expended on these buildings alone during the period of the present Administration, amounts to between four and five millions. I have not added up the sum; but it is certainly not less than four millions. And yet these appropriations made by Congress, without distinction of party, are converted into an item of extravagance against Mr. Van Buren!

Then there was the money expended in the payment of pensions, amounting to upwards of ten millions of dollars. Had the Administration any control over this expenditure? These pensions were granted by a grateful country to those who had defended it in the perilous times which tried men's souls, and who are now the feeble and broken relics of a past age, dependent on the public bounty for their support. Congress has also granted pensions to such widows of old soldiers, as in the days of the Revolution remained at home, and attended to their families whilst their husbands went forth to the battle field. Be this right, or be it wrong, had the present Administration any agency in granting these pensions? Did not Congress pass these laws; and did not the Senator from Kentucky vote for them? I do not know the fact, because it is not my practice to examine the journals for the purpose of ascertaining how individual members may have voted; but I do know, from the nature of the man, that he [Mr. CRITTENDEN] is one of the last members of the Senate who would vote against such pensions. And yet, strange to say, the payment of these very pensions to old soldiers and their widows, by the Treasury, is one of the items of extravagant expenditure charged against Mr. Van Buren's administration; and the aggregate of $130,000,000 composed of such items as these has been spread over the whole country, in order to alarm the fears of the people.

Again. There was the expense of extinguishing the Indian title within the States and Territories of the Union, and of removing the Indians west of the Mississippi, which amounted to more than ten millions of dollars. Are the present Administration to blame for this expenditure? Could the President have avoided it, after the Senate had ratified the treaties under which it was incurred? No Senator on this floor will say that he could. He had no discretion whatever on the subject; but was obliged to execute these treaties and the laws made in pursuance of them. How unjust is it, then, to put down this item in the aggregate of one hundred and thirty millions of dollars expended by the present Administration!

I might, if I pleased, pass in review all the other heads of extraordinary expenditure detailed by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report, and show that it was impossible for the President to avoid any one of them. He can exercise no dispensing power. He must obey the acts of Congress and treaties; and these laws and treaties were of such pressing necessity as even to have disarmed opposition, and to have received the votes of the political enemies, as well as of the friends of the Administration. I may well spare myself this trouble; as not one of these items of expenditure has ever been questioned by any Senator upon this floor. It is true, they exclaim, you have spent one hundred and thirty millions of dollars, and this is enormous; but they make no attempt to show how it was possible for the President to have reduced this amount.

There are two or three items embraced within this aggregate, of a character so extraordinary as to deserve more than a mere passing notice. In the Secretary's report, the indemnities amount to between six and seven millions of dollars. What are these indemnities? General Jackson, during his prosperous Administration, succeeded in obtaining satisfaction for all the old claims which our citizens had against foreign Governments. He got nearly five millions from France; and I do not recollect precisely how much from Denmark, and other nations. At all events, he left us a clear score, and the enjoyment of peace with all foreign nations. Now, according to the terms of the treaties, these indemnities, obtained from foreign Governments for our own citizens, were paid into the Treasury for their use, and were of course paid out of the Treasury to them, as soon as it was ascertained how much each one was entitled to receive; and yet, strange as it may seem, these very payments from the Treasury constitute a large item of the aggregate of one hundred and thirty millions, about which we have heard so much. This sacred trust fund, which was acquired for our citizens by the most efficient and persevering exertions—this very fund, which was fairly distributed amongst those entitled to receive it, has thus been converted into a charge of extravagance to its full amount against Mr. Van Buren, simply because it was paid out of the Treasury during his administration. This item shows conclusively why the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] goes for footings, and not for particulars. Is this fair towards the present Administration? If it were, then had General Jackson succeeded in obtaining twenty millions more from foreign nations, Mr. Van Buren, who disbursed the money, would have been twenty millions more extravagant; and the gentleman might have exclaimed, "you have expended one hundred and fifty millions of dollars, instead of one hundred and thirty." In making out these debtor and creditor accounts of extravagance, will any man say that it was either just or proper to charge such an item as this against the retiring Administration?

I should have been rejoiced if the subject of the expenditures of the present Administration had not again been introduced until after the accession of General Harrison, because then, as the Senator [Mr. CLAY] says, the books and papers will be in the possession of his friends. They will then be enabled to search these books and papers to their hearts' content; and, for one, I now give them fair notice, that should I be permitted to remain in the Senate, I shall call upon them, when they have all the official documents in their power, to make good the charge of wasteful extravagance against Mr. Van Buren's administration. This is due to themselves, as well as to that portion of the American people who have been deluded into the belief that the present Administration has been guilty of a prodigal and wasteful expenditure of the public money.

Another most extraordinary charge against Mr. Van Buren, embraced within the aggregate of one hundred and thirty millions, is that of more than twenty millions paid out of the Treasury in discharge of the national debt. Now, sir, observe the gross injustice of this charge. The Administration are first charged with all the expenditures which rendered it necessary to create a debt by the issue of Treasury notes, and afterwards, as this debt was discharged, they are again charged the second time with the amount paid to the public creditors. According to this mode of stating the account, an Administration is first charged with, I shall say, twenty millions of dollars for public expenditures. Their necessities require them to borrow these twenty millions. They then pay the borrowed money, and this discharge of the debt is twenty millions more expended, and swells the total to forty millions instead of twenty, although this last sum is palpably the whole amount expended. As a further illustration, let me suppose a case. The Senator from Kentucky employs an agent to build him a house which shall cost ten thousand dollars, and directs him to borrow the money on his (the Senator's) credit. The agent borrows the money and builds the house, and afterwards discharges the debt from the proceeds of the Senator's estate. What would be thought of his justice, if the Senator were to brand this agent with extravagance, and say, you have expended twenty thousand dollars of my money when I authorized you to expend but ten? You have first paid out ten thousand dollars in the erection of my house; and, shameful extravagance! you have squandered ten thousand dollars more in discharging the debt which I authorized you to contract. And yet this is the measure of justice which the Senator would apply to the present President of the United States as the agent of the people.

Now, fortunately for this country, neither the present nor any future President of the United States can be justly charged with extravagant expenditures, except in few cases, should Congress do their duty. Under the Constitution, not one dollar of public money can ever be drawn from the Treasury, "but in consequence of appropriations made by law." In most instances, Congress appropriates the precise sum which, under existing laws, is required for each special purpose; and the Secretary of the Treasury merely pays out these sums as their agent. Neither he nor the President can make these payments either greater or less. Since the origin of the Government, the public Treasury has been protected by this constitutional guard.

But the present Administration have done more than all their predecessors to secure the public money in the hands of our receiving and disbursing agents. Hitherto, whilst the poor wretch, who stole five dollars to gratify the cravings of hunger, was doomed to the penitentiary; the public officer who squandered the public money entrusted to his care, or fled with it to a foreign country, was held to have committed a mere breach of trust, and escaped without any punishment whatever. The much-abused Independent Treasury law, which is now about to be repealed, was the first act of legislation which ever inflicted any punishment upon public officers for plundering the public money. Under its provisions, such a crime is made felony; and the culprit is consigned to the four walls of the penitentiary, instead of being sent on a mission to London or Paris, to revel in luxury there on the spoils of the public, and to enjoy the pleasures of "good society." But the decree has gone forth, and this law is to be repealed by the new Administration.

The President of the United States can only be guilty of extravagance by recommending and by influencing his friends in Congress to adopt useless and extravagant projects not necessary for the public good; or where, from the nature of the case, a general appropriation must be made to accomplish a particular purpose, by not applying this money, necessarily subjected to his discretion, with a wise and proper economy.

Gentlemen may test the expenditures of the present Administration by any reasonable rule which they please, and ascertain whether any of them could have been avoided. There they are, spread upon the record of the American Senate in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and there they have been ever since May last, subject to the inspection and scrutiny of each American Senator; and what has been the result? At this late period, after the Presidential election has been decided, the Senator from Kentucky now, for the first time, makes four specific charges of extravagance. If we were even to admit that these specifications are all well founded, happy indeed would be the country where, in the expenditure of so many millions, the research and ingenuity of gentlemen could discover but four small and comparatively inconsiderable items to which they can object. There is no other nation on the face of the earth which could present such a spectacle in the administration of its finances, and even with these blemishes, if they existed, it would be the glory of our country to be able to present such an account. It would be conclusive evidence of the regard for law and the morality which prevails amongst us.

After this report had been thus subjected to the ordeal of these gentlemen for the greater part of a year, the Senator now confines himself to a specification of only four particulars, in which he alleges the Government have been guilty of extravagance. If I can demonstrate, as I believe I can, that he has been mistaken in each of these particulars, then the friends of the present Administration will indeed have cause for congratulation and triumph.

The Senator's first specification is, that the Administration had brought mounted volunteers all the way from Missouri to the Florida war, when men in abundance might have been obtained from the neighboring States at a much less expense; and that instead of transporting these volunteers from Missouri to Florida by water, a useless expense was incurred in sending them over land. Three hundred was the whole number of these Missouri volunteers, as I have been informed by the highest official authority at the proper Department. And to what, then, does this whole charge of extravagance against the Administration amount? To the excess of what it would cost to transport three hundred men from Missouri to Florida above the cost of transporting the same number of men from Georgia, Alabama, or Kentucky. This difference of price is the whole sum and substance of the Senator's first charge of extravagance. I have been also informed from the same authority, that these men did not march over land through Kentucky, as the Senator supposes; but were unfortunately transported by water from St. Louis to Florida. The consequence was, that they encountered a storm in the Gulf of Mexico, and many of their horses were lost. Happy, indeed, therefore, would it have been for them if this portion of the Senator's charge had been well founded, and if they had marched over land.

But why did the Secretary of War resort to Missouri for these volunteers? Was it because he had not entire confidence in the patriotism and courage of the men of Georgia, Alabama, and Kentucky? No, sir, not at all. But it was suggested to the Secretary, that the frontier men of Missouri—the hunters and trappers of the far West, who had been accustomed to Indian war, were better acquainted with the character and habits of our savage foe, and would, for this reason, be more efficient than equally brave soldiers who had not the same experience. It was believed that these frontier men would be skilful in penetrating the Everglades of Florida, and discovering the Indians in their hiding places.

In the days of the Indian wars of Kentucky, the Kentuckians were probably the best Indian fighters in the world. But these days have fortunately long since passed away; and you must now go further West for men of experience in this peculiar mode of warfare. Considering how our army had been baffled by the Florida Indians, it might have been wise, and I believe it was wise, to accept the services of these Missourians; and the conduct of this brave band, with the lamented Colonel Gentry at their head, proved that the Secretary was not mistaken either in their skill or courage. Some forty or fifty of them lost their lives in battle; and yet the charge is, that their transportation from St. Louis to Florida had cost the Government more than it would have done to transport the same number of men from Lexington or Nashville. This is truly a grave and serious accusation!

I can inform the Senator in what manner I presume his mistake originated in regard to the marching of the Missouri volunteers through Kentucky. Although they did not march through Kentucky, yet the second regiment of dragoons did; and he must have mistaken the one for the other. And why was this regiment marched to Florida over land, and not transported by water? It was not done to expend, but to save money. They thus transported themselves, and therefore, the Government saved the cost of their transportation. Besides, in addition to all this, they were trained and disciplined every day upon the road as cavalry ought to be trained and disciplined. The consequence was, that the moment they arrived in Florida, they were prepared for active and efficient service. On the other hand, had they been transported by water, their horses might probably have been lost, as were those of the Missouri volunteers, and they could not have improved in discipline on the way. In regard to the expenditure, I have been informed at the Department that it was a clear saving to the Government to march this regiment to Florida by land, instead of transporting it by water. So much for the Senator's first charge.

The second charge made by the Senator consists in this; that the Administration had collected five hundred thousand dollars' worth of provisions in the Cherokee country, for the use of the army; and that these provisions, not being wanted, were afterwards sold at auction for a sum but little exceeding fifty thousand dollars. To this and to all the other charges of the Senator, I felt myself prepared to reply last evening; but concluded that it was best to wait an re-assure myself of the precise character of the facts. I can now assure the Senator that there is great exaggeration in this statement. The whole supply of provisions was not sold at auction; but the comparatively small surplus only, which remained after subsisting the troops, and this because the articles were perishable, and would not bear the cost of transportation. I admit that there was a considerable loss on the sale of this surplus, chiefly in the articles of bacon and hard bread; and I shall tell the gentleman how it occurred, and then ask him to say whether the Administration is fairly chargeable with it.

We all know that the Cherokees, at the first, refused to execute their treaty and remove to the West of the Mississippi. Indeed, an incipient war already existed. From the representations of their chief, and from other causes which I need not detail, they were induced to believe that the Government would never remove them by force. They were upon the soil of Georgia, Tennessee and North Carolina, who insisted upon their removal; and it thus became the imperative duty of the Government to enforce the execution of the treaty. Policy, humanity, economy, and the example of the Florida war, all required that a sufficient force should be sent into the Cherokee country to overawe the Indians, and thus effect their removal without bloodshed. One of the most eminent men of our country, the hero of Lundy's Lane, (General Scott) was selected to command these forces, and ample discretionary power was conferred upon him to carry the treaty into effect. This hero may, in future time, become a still more distinguished character, for the race of military chieftains is, probably, not yet extinct. Under these circumstances, it became necessary for the subsistence department to collect within the Cherokee country a sufficient quantity of provisions for the supply of the army. That this was their imperative duty no one can deny.

General Scott executed the high trust confided to him with distinguished fidelity and ability. With the example of the Florida war before him, he deemed it necessary to act with the utmost energy and vigor, and to concentrate such a force as would overawe all opposition. I ask, then, would not the Administration have been greatly to blame, had they not collected sufficient provisions for the whole force which General Scott deemed it expedient to call into service?

In this crisis, John Ross, the head chief of the Cherokees, concluded an arrangement with General Scott, under the sanction of the Secretary of War, and engaged himself to remove his people. It was thus rendered unnecessary to employ our troops in removing them by force; and a large portion of these troops was immediately discharged. A sufficient number, therefore, did not continue in the service to consume all the remainder of the provisions which had been collected.

Were these provisions improperly collected? Was it not necessary that the Department should have them at the point where the army assembled? But a large portion of this army was soon disbanded, and in this unforeseen contingency what was to be done with the remainder of the provisions? There they were in the midst of the Indian country, where no demand existed for them; and necessity compelled the officer in command to direct them to be sold at auction, whatever price they might bring. It is true the bacon and hard bread were sold at a sacrifice; but what else could be done? The expense of transporting them to any place where they might have sold for their value, would have been greater than the difference between that value and what the Government actually received.

But whether the loss were great or small, the Administration had nothing directly to do with the sale, and are not, therefore, liable to censure for this cause. The provisions were collected by the proper department for the subsistence of the army under the Commanding General, and he acted in strict conformity with his duty in directing the sale of such of them as he could not use. The Administration knew nothing of the matter until after they had been sold, and the accounts of the sale were rendered. Thus ends the second item of extravagance alleged by the Senator against the Administration.

The third specification of extravagance mainly rests upon the strange order of Brigadier General Read of the Florida militia. Of all the persons I have ever known, the Senator from Kentucky can the most effectually turn into ridicule, even that which is not ridiculous in itself. What a rare occasion, then, does this order present for his powers of satire! He must esteem it as a precious relic, and therefore I shall most certainly comply with his request, and return it to him as soon as I shall have read it to the Senate.

Here Mr. BUCHANAN read the order as follows:

HEADQUARTERS, FLORIDA BRIGADE,
Newnansville, December 4, 1840.

"The troops of the Sedentary infantry service, of which Captain Broer's company is an integral portion, shall not at any time be ordered on active duty; nor will it ever occur during their term of service, that they shall be ordered to march a greater distance than twenty miles beyond the headquarters of their respective companies. They will be directed to remain at their usual places of abode, and expected to engage sedulously in the pursuit of their usual occupations."

(Signed,) LEIGH READ,
Brigadier General, Florida Brigade.

Captain BROER, Mandarin.

If the Administration could be held responsible for the bad taste in which this order was conceived, I should pronounce them guilty at once. But this is a question not of taste, but of extravagant expenditure, and regarded in that view, the Senator would find that it did not at all establish his proposition.

I shall then first explain to the honorable gentleman why Brigadier General Read, who by the by is an excellent officer, told these men to remain at home, and attend to their own business. Although it might have been in better taste not to have embraced such a command in a general military order, at least without further explanation, yet the Senator would himself soon perceive the propriety of this injunction.

It will be recollected that at the last session, the Secretary of War had called upon Congress to raise a thousand mounted men for the Florida war, to remain in service during its continuance, and to receive a bounty in land, with the same pay and emoluments as the cavalry of the United States. The Senate passed a bill for that purpose, increasing the force to fifteen hundred men. This bill went to the House of Representatives, where the Committee on Military Affairs, approving of the policy, recommended a still further increase from 1,500 to 2,000 men; but the House never reached the measure, and no troops were raised for the prosecution of the Florida war. But did Congress, by this neglect, intend that Florida should not be defended? Was it the design of Congress that the Florida militia should not be called into service for this purpose? Certainly not. If any thing could be inferred from the neglect of Congress to pass the bill, it was that Florida should be defended by the militia under the existing militia laws; for no Senator can suppose that we intended to give up the wives and the children of its inhabitants to the scalping knife of the savage.

Whilst this bill was pending before Congress, the Governor of Florida, in pursuance of an act of the Territorial Legislature, called out into actual service a number of mounted men for the defence of that Territory, nominally at its own expense, but which we all know, from past experience, must eventually be paid by the United States. After the adjournment of Congress without having passed the bill to which I have referred, the Secretary of War interposed, and ordered out twelve hundred mounted men, embracing those thus already in service from Florida, to serve in every part of the Territory, and to pursue the Indians wherever they might be found, and five hundred infantry militia. And for what purpose were these five hundred militia to be employed? They were intended for mere neighborhood defence, and, like the minute-men of the Revolution, were to be ready to repel invasion at a moment's warning. They are divided into companies of seventy men; and these men cultivate the soil, and are spread over the border which divides the savages from the peaceful inhabitants. They are neither required nor permitted to pursue the enemy more than twenty miles from the headquarters of their respective companies; because, if they were, it would destroy the very purpose of neighborhood defence for which they were called into service, and leave the settlements unprotected. It is their duty to resist sudden incursions of the savages into these settlements; and I understand that the most happy consequences have followed the creation of this force.

Now, in regard to the expense, which is the main point of this argument, let me assure the Senator that these men cost the Government but one-sixth of the cost of the same number of cavalry. They merely receive the pay of infantry, without bounty, rations, or clothing. They are bound to raise corn and provisions on the public lands on which they are settled, and at the same time be ever ready to repel the incursions of the Indians. When this duty has been performed, they return to their peaceful agricultural pursuits. What have been the consequences of this policy? Since this system was first adopted by the Secretary of War, the Government has been able to purchase provisions at a greatly reduced price. These men raise not only what is sufficient to supply their own wants, but a considerable surplus for sale. They are settled in the very heart of Florida, where provisions are most wanted for the use of the army; and the Government thus saves much in the cost of transportation. This whole arrangement, instead of affording any foundation for a charge of extravagance against the Government, is one eminently economical.

I am sorry to inform the Senator that the Secretary has not yet been able to raise more than one-third of these five hundred militia infantry.

I trust he will now be able to perceive why Gen. Read directed these "sedentary infantry" to remain at home, and not to pursue the enemy a greater distance than twenty miles from their head quarters. They were never intended for general service, but were destined to be a rampart against the stealthy attacks of the Indians—to be a body-guard on the frontier for the women and children behind them, and to be a barrier for their protection, over which the savages could not pass. If these men could be withdrawn from the positions which they occupy, and sent all over Florida, the result might be disastrous.

The fourth and last charge of extravagance against Mr. Van Buren was, the establishment of the branch mints; and yet these mints were established by act of Congress in 1835, two years before he came into power. Now I myself happen to be one of those Senators who was decidedly opposed to the establishment of these mints. With the exception of the one at New Orleans, they have never done much good, nor do I expect that they ever will hereafter. There is one of them in Georgia, at a place called Dahlonega, and another at Charlotte, in North Carolina. At these places I believe the gold has given out. Now, as these two mints were established, not by Mr. Van Buren, but by an act of Congress, passed without distinction of party, is it not most extraordinary to charge him with the expense which has been thus incurred? He is not to blame if the gold has given out and cannot be found in such quantities as to keep them in employment. The only mode of getting clear of them is, that suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANUMGUS] and I pledge myself to support any reasonable bill for that purpose which he may introduce. In the event of its passage, for one, I should feel myself indebted to the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, if they shall be able to find a purchaser for them.

[Mr. LUMPKIN of Georgia here said he wished to state that the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania was mistaken in saying that the gold had given out in Georgia. On the contrary, new discoveries are constantly being made.]

Mr. BUCHANAN resumed. I am glad to learn that the gold has not given out in Georgia, and that there is still some prospect that the Mint at Dahlonega may yet be employed. In one thing, however, I cannot be mistaken, and that is, that if gold has been found, very little of it has been brought to the mint to be coined, within the last few years. I have no right to doubt the statement of the gentleman, and I should rejoice if gold would descend in showers from above upon Georgia, as it formerly did upon Danau. It makes no difference, however, for my present purpose, whether this mint be necessary or not. It is certain, at least, that Mr. Van Buren was not even President when it was established, nor is his administration responsible for what appears to me to be the useless expense which has been thus incurred.

If this were the proper occasion, I might adduce many arguments to prove that not more than one mint ought to exist in this country; although I acknowledge that strong reasons may be urged in favor of a branch at New Orleans. Whatever gold may be found in the vicinity of Dahlonega and Charlotte, might be disposed of as profitably to the finders as if they carried it to these mints for coinage. The other Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] will bear me witness that I steadily followed the lead of himself and my friend Governor HILL of New Hampshire, from first to last, in opposition to the establishment of these branch mints.

I have thus gone over the four specifications of my friend from Kentucky, and happy indeed am I to find that these are the only specific charges of extravagance which have been made against the present Administration. This very fact is, in itself, their most triumphant vindication. Indeed, I am almost sorry, for the sake of the gentleman, that he could not have discovered some charges a little more plausible than any of these, on which he might have rested an argument.

If Congress, then, have determined that the exigencies of the country absolutely demanded the expenditure of one hundred and thirty millions within the last four years, and if the Senator and his friends have concurred in this necessity, and have united with us in making appropriations to that amount, with what justice can they now blame the President for this expenditure? It cannot be pretended either that he created this necessity for a large expenditure, or that he squandered the public money in accomplishing any of the objects designated by Congress. Away, then, with such charges of extravagance! If any debt has been created, in consequence of these large expenditures directed by Congress, whose fault is it? Certainly not his. He had no control over the matter.

I undertake to predict, that should the Secretary of the Treasury prove to be as correct in all other respects as he is in his estimate of revenue to be derived from customs during the present year, we shall, at the end of it, be entirely clear of debt. I have no doubt but that the revenue from this source will, at the very least, amount to from eighteen to twenty millions of dollars. Should this be the case, then the Secretary is of opinion that the revenue of the country, during the year, will be sufficient to meet its expenditures, provided Congress shall not exceed his estimates in their appropriations; and will, in addition, discharge the amount of the outstanding Treasury notes. But we are willing, nevertheless, to provide five millions more to meet any unforeseen contingencies which may arise at the commencement of a new Administration.

I have now answered the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky. The facts which I have stated in regard to his four specifications of extravagance, have of course been communicated to me by the proper Department. None of them are within my own knowledge; but I have no doubt they are all substantially correct.

Mr. CRITTENDEN replied at some length to Mr. BUCHANAN. His remarks will be given hereafter.

Mr. BUCHANAN again rose, in reply to Mr. CRITTENDEN, and said that he considered this a proud day for the retiring Administration. It presented a moral spectacle on which the world might gaze with wonder. In an expenditure of one hundred and thirty millions of dollars, during the period of four years, the Senator from Kentucky had only been able to enumerate four items of extravagance, and each one of these had been fully explained. Had the world ever beheld a nation in which such a spectacle could be presented? Look over the kingdoms of Europe; look over the vast continent of America; examine the abuses under every other form of Government; and where, except in this Republic of ours, can you find such an example? One hundred and thirty millions had been expended, and the only complaints of extravagance were, that three hundred troops from Missouri had been employed in the Florida war; that five hundred thousand dollars' worth of provisions had been collected to subsist our army in the Cherokee country, all of which was fortunately not required for that purpose; that two hundred Florida militia had been called into service on a kind of duty which did not meet the approbation of the Senator; and that three branch mints had been unnecessarily established, two years before the present Administration came into power! And this was the sum total—these were the entire charges—which the honorable Senator could urge against the Administration. This was, then, the only foundation for the statements which had been made in every portion of the country, swelling the extravagance of this Administration to hundreds of millions. The vindication of the old Administration was now triumphant against the charges which had every where been urged and reiterated by the friends of the new Administration. He and his friend from Missouri [Mr. BENSON] had challenged the gentlemen of the Opposition in May last, to point out the items of that extravagance of which they complained in the aggregate. This challenge had not then been accepted. They remained silent. The Senator from Kentucky had now come forth with his specifications, and what was their character? They afforded ample testimony that the working of our Republican Administration had been admirable. Indeed, no Administration in this country could squander the people's money without detection, because the people always keep a vigilant eye over their public servants. A Republican Administration would not if it could, as it could not if it would, be guilty of extravagance. Their own high principles would condemn and forbid the act. There was no possibility, under the Constitution of our Republic, that any Administration could be guilty of expending money on useless and extravagant objects, without the previous authority of Congress. And here he was about to say, that the honorable Senator had treated a portion of his argument unfairly; but he would not apply such a term, as he had never met with unfairness from that source. The Senator had stated that he (Mr. B.) had maintained that the President could not be held responsible for the extravagance of officers acting under his authority. Heaven forbid! that he (Mr. B.) should ever have entertained such an idea. Far, very far from it. The President's task was an arduous one. Whilst it was the most honorable, it was also the most responsible station on earth. He had the selection of his own agents, and their improper acts must always attach odium to him. If his station were high, his responsibility was and ought to be great.

Now, for what had he (Mr. B.) contended? He had taken up the triumphant report of the Secretary of the Treasury—a report which could not be met—and had presented from it the expenditures of the Administration under their appropriate heads, and demanded whether any man could complain of them as furnishing evidence of Executive extravagance. What was the nature of Executive estimates? Did the Executive ever send estimates of expenditures to Congress which were not demanded by pre-existing laws? It was his duty to go through the statute book and furnish estimates of the amount required to execute existing acts of Congress; and whilst he confined himself to the performance of this duty, he was under no responsibility whatever. Congress, and not the President, were then responsible. That was the point. The President stood upon the laws of the land, and had confined his estimates strictly to what they enjoined. He could not repeal any law. On the contrary, he was bound to carry every law into execution.

There was, he had expressly admitted, a class of cases in which a President ought to be held responsible for extravagance; and this was when he recommended unwise and unnecessary objects of expense to Congress. He would also be responsible, in a great degree, for the expenditures voted by his party in Congress even without his express recommendation, because it was fair to presume that he and they acted in harmony on all great public measures.

Again: He had declared that the Executive might be justly held responsible for the economical expenditure of public money whenever gross sums were appropriated towards the accomplishment of particular objects, and the employment of the money was thus necessarily subjected to his discretion. In such a case, it was his duty to see that the object should be accomplished in the cheapest and best manner; and if he failed to do so, he was justly censurable. Responsibility! Yes, the Executive was, and, on principle, ought ever to be, held responsible for the economical expenditure of the public money, in obedience to the laws of Congress.

Under all these admissions, said Mr. B. I ask the Senator to take up the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and point out a single head of expenditure with which the country could have dispensed. He [Mr. CRITTENDEN] said, yesterday, that he did not complain of any of those objects of expenditure. No, he did not—he could not; for, from the first to the last, there was nothing in that list which could have been avoided, with a proper regard to the interests of the country. He might add, that he believed there was nothing in that list which had not received the support of the Opposition, as well as the Administration party on this floor.

He had but a few words more to say in reference to the four items to which the Senator had specially referred. He deemed it unnecessary to follow him at length, because he had already furnished what he believed to be the facts; and they constituted the best refutation of his [Mr. CRITTENDEN's] arguments.

In regard to the three hundred men taken from Missouri, the Secretary of War might have judged unwisely. He might possibly, with equal advantage to the service, have taken a like number of men from Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, or Kentucky. The people of these States were all equally brave with those of Missouri. There was no question about that. But if the Secretary had thought proper to employ three hundred Western hunters and trappers from Missouri, who were believed to possess more experience in the mode of attacking Indians, and driving them out of their Everglades, could the difference of expense in transporting these men from Missouri to Florida, above that of transporting a like number from Kentucky, be made a matter of grave accusation against the Executive? The Secretary may have judged unwisely, and the President may be responsible; but it was as light a responsibility as ever President bore. Unfortunately, a number of the horses belonging to these men were lost, and the Government had to pay for them; but this could not have been foreseen. All this might have been an error in judgment, though he (Mr. B.) believed it was not; still it could never be converted into a subject of serious charge against the President, or prove that he had been guilty of extravagance. In attempting to magnify into importance so small a matter, the Senator from Kentucky had unconsciously bestowed one of the highest compliments which he could pay to the economy of the Administration.

In regard to the provisions conveyed to the Cherokee country:—we know there was not only danger of a war with this powerful tribe of Indians, but that an incipient war then already existed. Blood had then been shed, according to his best recollection. The whole neighboring country was in commotion, and the people of the surrounding States were terrified and alarmed. Under such circumstances, was it not the duty of the Administration to collect troops for the defence of the country and the removal of the Indians? And he asked the honorable Senator if these troubles had not ended in peace; if war had been the result, and an army had been collected there without provisions, might not the Administration, with great justice, have been attacked for their improvidence? In such an event, they would have been guilty of a criminal dereliction of duty, not only against the army and the people of the States where the Indians were located, but against the whole people of the United States. And yet the burden of the Senator's charge against the Administration, is for doing an act, which, if they had not done, might have resulted in disastrous consequences to the whole country, in case the threatened war had not been avoided. It became, therefore, absolutely indispensable to collect these provisions for the subsistence of the army; and it was only because, through the mercy of a wise and over-ruling Providence, another Indian war had been averted from the people of Georgia and the surrounding States, that this transaction could possibly have been converted into a charge of extravagance against the Administration. Who then can be justly blamed? There were the provisions and we ought to be thankful that they were not all rendered necessary. We had peace instead of war; and by the early dismissal of the troops, all of these provisions could not be consumed. Now he, Mr. B. shrunk from no responsibility on this occasion. He admitted that the Administration were responsible for the conduct of General Scott, a gentleman for whom he entertained the highest regard and esteem. That General had done but his duty as commander of the forces, in ordering these provisions, which he could not use, to be sold. Indeed he could not have acted otherwise.

But the Senator had intimated that this sale was not fairly made; and that gold and silver being required in payment, the purchasers were Government agents, who bought in the provisions at a low rate, with Government money, for their own private emolument. If this were true, every one of these officers ought to be instantly dismissed. It was a heavy charge, and the Senator did not pretend to know any thing about it, except from newspaper rumors, which were certainly not the most authentic source of information. He, Mr. B. had heard that some of these provisions were damaged, and he had learned from the most authentic source that Ross would not purchase provisions from the contractors at any price, though he might have used them advantageously in removing the Indians. It is much more probable that the distance of these provisions from any point where they could have been sold for their value, and the consequent cost of transportation to such a place, together with the perishable nature of some of them, were the reasons why they did not command a greater price, than that the disbursing officers of the Government had been guilty of any fraudulent conduct. This, then, was among the sins of extravagance charged against Mr. Van Buren, although he knew nothing about it until long after it took place. Happy, indeed, would be the fate of the succeeding Administration, if no heavier charge could be made against them at the end of their term of service.

A few words more in regard to the Florida war. When Congress omitted to provide regular troops for the defence of Florida, what was the only alternative left? Did not this omission necessarily devolve upon the President the duty of calling out the militia for that purpose, under the Constitution and existing laws? The neglect of Congress to raise the force required by the Secretary of War, did not prohibit him from availing himself of the militia; but, on the contrary, rendered a resort to them imperatively necessary. The militia law still remained in full force; and to that, and that alone, could he recur for the defence of Florida.

[Mr. CRITTENDEN here inquired whether Brigadier General Read was not an officer of the United States Army.]

Mr. BUCHANAN said certainly not. In his famous order, to which the Senator had himself referred, he had styled himself Brigadier General of the Florida Brigade. He was not an officer of the United States Army; but of the Florida militia; and he (Mr. B.) understood they had been called into service under the authority of our existing militia laws. And what else could the Secretary have done under the circumstances? What else would the Senator from Kentucky himself have done had he been Secretary of War? Would he have abandoned Florida whilst Florida was bleeding at every pore? Would he have said, "I demanded a mounted regiment of regular troops and Congress refused to grant it, and because they refused, I shall not order the militia into service, notwithstanding the existing law renders this my duty. Let the blood shed in Florida be upon the head of Congress, I am innocent!" No, there was not a man in America who would not have recoiled from such reasoning, and none sooner or more repulsively than the honorable Senator himself.

And yet, with all his eloquence and ingenuity, to what had he finally been driven? To read an extract from some newspaper, the name of which he had not thought proper to give us, for the purpose of exciting a laugh and a sneer in the Senate of the United States. All this was "at the expense of Uncle Sam;" but, from information derived from the Department itself, he could assure the gentleman that these militia infantry did not, as the paper alleged, receive $18, but merely $7 per month—the pay of United States infantry soldiers; and that, too, without either bounty, clothing, or rations. Now, Heaven forbid that the time may ever arrive, in this country, when Senators should seriously attempt to criminate any Administration on this floor by bringing here the title-tattle of a newspaper, whilst they could obtain the information desired in an authentic and official form from the proper Department. How unnecessary as well as unjust, was it to attempt to prove a high officer of the Government guilty of misconduct by newspaper statements, when, upon the motion of any member, the power of the Senate would at any time be exerted to prove him guilty, if guilty he were, by official documents authenticated under his own hand? And yet this was the course which the honorable Senator had thought proper to pursue.

But, says the Senator, how could these two hundred militia infantry have raised a crop of corn between the last adjournment of Congress in July and the present time? But had he not informed the Senator that while the question was depending before Congress, whether mounted men should be raised for the defence of Florida, the Governor of that Territory, knowing that the expense would eventually fall upon the Government of the United States, had called these men into service before our adjournment, and under the Secretary's advice he had adopted the policy previously pursued to encourage the raising of provisions for the army? If the gentleman thought proper, at any time, to call for authentic information on this subject, it would be furnished him most cheerfully by the Department.

These, then, are the items of extravagance with which the retiring Administration were charged, and this was the indictment preferred against them. The branch mints are still continued; and the President is condemned because, forsooth, he does not abolish them! Now could the President repeal the law which created them? Could he undertake to say he would not execute the will of Congress declared by an act of Congress? If he had closed these mints by his own authority, he would have been guilty of the highest crime against the Constitution of his country. He would, by usurping the prerogative of annulling acts of Congress, have placed himself above the Legislative power. He might then, with justice, have been denounced and condemned as a tyrant. And yet it has been made a grave accusation against the President, that he had not shut up these branch mints, because they were too expensive—that he had not done an act, for doing which he ought to have been impeached and deprived of his high office. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANCUM] took a more correct view of this subject. He thought, with him (Mr. B.) that Congress was the proper source of power in such cases. Let us move on in the ancient constitutional manner; and although there might be some "prospects" of gold around Dahlonega and Charlotte, he would vote at any moment for the repeal of the law which had established these branch mints. He believed them to be unnecessary; but how the present Administration could be held responsible for their expenses, he was utterly at a loss to determine. Nothing but the ingenuity of the honorable Senator could ever have led to the suggestion. He could draw upon the abundant fountain of his wit, and turn the most serious subjects into ridicule, when it suited his purpose; but he would never succeed in blotting out from the minds of the people of this country the gratitude which they would yet feel towards an Administration against which no charges of extravagance could be made, except such as he had enumerated.

THE BANKRUPT BILL.

REMARKS OF MR. NORVELL,

OF MICHIGAN,

In Senate, Thursday, February 4, 1841—On the Bankrupt bill.

Mr. NORVELL said: The amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENSON] to the bankrupt bill, now under consideration, required the consent of two-thirds of the creditors, in value and number, before the debtor could receive a certificate securing him the benefit of the act. He hoped that the amendment would not be adopted by the Senate. Its effect would be to subject debtors to the tender mercy of their creditors. It was a remnant of the old spirit, the pound of flesh spirit, which prevailed in the age of Shylock. He would rather see no bill pass, than one with such a provision in it. It would only harass and annoy the unfortunate, and expose him to an ordeal at once grating and cruel. The Senator said that his amendment was sanctioned by that provision in the Constitution, which prohibited us from impairing the obligation of contracts. No such provision was to be found in the Constitution. A clause in that instrument, forbidding the States from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts. The power, given to Congress exclusively, to enact uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies, in his judgment, implied and comprehended the necessary authority to change the character of contracts, so far as to release the debtor upon the surrender of all the property, and to protect the future acquisitions which he might make. On this point he entertained no doubt. No bankrupt law would be of much service, unless it embraced such a principle. But if Congress could pass no law impairing the obligation of contracts, how could they pass an act, with the consent of two-thirds of the creditors, impairing the obligation of the contract of a debtor with the other third of his creditors? If the argument of the honorable Senator amounted to any thing, a debtor could not receive a certificate of release as long as a single creditor refused his consent to the granting of the certificate. But there was nothing in the argument. The power of Congress was ample on the subject. And if they would not perform their duty—if they still refused to exercise a power beneficent in its tendency towards a large portion of the American people—let them return it to the States, from which they had received it. He was sorry to say, that the course of Senators lagged behind the spirit of the age. They did not keep up with the sentiments and feelings of the people. The great mass of the people were in favor of the passage of such a bill as was now before the Senate, whether memorials had been presented from this or that State on the subject. A disregard of the advances made by the great body of the people, in principles of this kind, might well account for some of the great political changes which we had all witnessed within the last year or two. He trusted that a bill, demanded by all the considerations of humanity, mercy, and the public good, would pass, without any such amendments as was now proposed to it.

SPEECH OF MR. SHEPARD,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, February 4, 1841—

In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the Treasury Note bill.

Mr. BARNARD of New York proposed to make a loan of $10,000,000.

Mr. STANLY of North Carolina offered an amendment to lay a duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem on silks, 20 per cent. on wines, and 20 per cent. on linens.

Mr. SHEPARD addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I am reluctant to continue this discussion, but honorable gentlemen have advanced doctrines which I consider of a dangerous tendency, and I cannot forbear to express my own opinions. Since the commercial revulsion of 1837, the income of this Government has not been equal to its expenditure. In the years of plenty, the surplus revenue was divided among the States, and now, in the day of comparative famine, no willingness is manifested to curtail expenses, but a proposition is made to increase the burdens of the people. The member from Maine [Mr. EVANS] has asked, "in what branch of the public service can reduction be made?" I shall not set up for a political puritan, but I point to the unnecessary length of our sessions, to the disgraceful amount of contingencies, the enormous increase in the cost of collecting the revenue, and I believe that a faithful examination would unfold much more, that requires the knife and the caustic. Economy, however, should not approach stinginess, for this would ultimately prove the grossest extravagance; let worth and talent be well rewarded, and if sinecures be abolished, salaries reduced in proportion to the service rendered, and no expenses incurred for the special benefit of individuals or sections, I indulge the hope that, after the revival of trade, the revenue will be amply sufficient for all the wants of Government. Gentlemen have poured forth cataracts of eloquence on the subject of corruption, but they err in laying the whole blame on either of the great parties: it is immaterial who is the President, or what faction has the ascendancy; if much money be placed under the control of politicians, there is reason to fear that it will be used to advance the schemes of party, and to promote the interest of cunning leaders. It is wise, therefore, to save our rulers from temptation; it is just to let the people hold their own property, and to take the smallest portion of their earnings, that the public service will admit.

I am opposed to the levy of new taxes, until an honest effort be made to economize, and I will not consent that three articles shall be selected at the present time for the partial legislation of Congress. A new President will shortly be in office; those, who have assumed all the wisdom and virtue of the land, will have the reins of Government, and they should bear its responsibilities. At the next session the whole system of taxation must be revised, and there is no necessity for anticipating the deliberations of our successors: let timely warning be given to all the great interests of the country; let the public mind be drawn to this important subject in all its relations, and I hope that the question will be settled on a basis, satisfactory to all, and oppressive to none.

A tax on imports is easy of collection, and borne without murmur by the mass, because its subtle operation is not perceived, though it is not the less powerful in its effect, or less liable to abuse, and should be watched with jealousy. The consumer pays the duty, and, if the article be limited in quantity or of indispensable necessity, this would be the end of the matter, and one man would not have more right to complain than another. But where the consumption depends on the price, the impost has a much wider bearing. If cloth and molasses be cheap, more of these comforts will be used than when dear; a duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem on the former, and of 5 cents on the latter, must diminish importation, or keep out of the country much that would otherwise enter. The foreigner is not the only person who would be injured by this result. His merchandise comes here in exchange for our productions—the trader of the city is a mere agent of the industrious classes, he buys the corn, cotton, the tobacco, the naval stores, the manufactures of domestic labor, and gives them for the products of other climes and other people. All commerce is resolvable into the great principle of exchange; if the country sells nothing, it can buy nothing; if it exports nothing it can import nothing; and that which comes here in the shape of foreign goods, is only another form of our own property, and is as much American industry, as the grass of our fields, or the cloth of our factories. Any distinction between them is fallacious and unjust.

If a tax, therefore, on foreign merchandise diminish its consumption, domestic produce, which is exchanged for that merchandise, is indirectly affected. If we buy less of the foreigner, he is compelled to buy less of us; if we cease to take that which he can give, the market for the products of our own labor is lessened in like proportion. The exact degree to which the produce is injured by the customs, cannot be estimated with certainty, for trade, when driven from one path, will generally find another; but as the natural course of things is the most profitable, any law, which obstructs the free interchange of commodities, and aims at the establishment of an artificial system, must be burdensome to those classes, on whose industry the experiment is made.

But, sir, let us leave theory, and take a more practical view of the subject. In 1839 the exports of the United States were valued at $103,533,891—of which $63,430,845 went to England, and $16,553,667 to France; in that year cotton was shipped to the amount of $61,238,982, of which $46,137,365 went to Great Britain, and $13,323,142 to France—$9,832,943 of tobacco was exported, of which $5,362,331 went to England, and $901,950 to France—$2,460,198 of rice was shipped—$688,800 of naval stores, of which $501,584 went to England. It thus appears that cotton, tobacco, rice, and naval stores, constitute more than two-thirds of the exports of the country, ($74,220,923,) and that England and France are the great markets, to which these productions are carried. Indian corn and timber would swell this sum considerably; they are left out of the calculation, because they are not exclusively the product of the six or seven States, which raise the great amount above mentioned. The imports of the same year amounted to $162,092,132, of which $71,600,351 came from England, and $33,284,119 from France, consisting principally of the manufactures of wool, cotton, iron, linen, silk, &c. These facts prove that an immense trade exists between the countries, founded on the mutual wants of the people, and the variety of their industry—a trade that would keep pace with the increase of population, and the growing demands of civilized life, if not disturbed by political quackery. England requires the raw material, but her climate forbids the culture. America needs the produce of British workmanship, but she cannot struggle with matured skill, vast capital, and low wages. Such ties bind together the nations of the earth. The gifts of Providence are widely distributed, perhaps, to show man that his real interest and substantial comfort are promoted by peace and harmony.

If, for any purpose, a tax is laid on iron and woollen, so that the foreign manufacture is driven out of the market, or its consumption diminished, the foreigner will take less of cotton, tobacco, naval stores, or other domestic articles, which were exchanged for his own. The revenue of this country is principally derived from duties on the manufactures of Great Britain: her cotton goods, her woollen cloth, her iron, her glass, and her sugar, have been the great objects of attack—they have sustained the burden of the Federal Government, though this very England consumes nearly two-thirds of our domestic productions. In aiming a blow at the foreigner, you strike one of your own citizens; the tax collected is paid by the consumer, but the effect reaches the producer, and all interested in his prosperity. This producer is the agriculturist of the Southern States—the cotton grower, the tobacco planter, and the getter of naval stores: the raiser of Indian corn is also concerned, for his market is among the planters, devoted to other products, and every citizen of those States, whatever may be his occupation, is benefited by maintaining the value of the staples, which give strength and wealth to the Southern community.

If this reasoning be sound, the Federal Government indirectly taxes the industry of a few States. This will bring to complaint from me, whilst the burden is reasonable, and the money is used for wise and constitutional purposes. But taxation should be equal. All receive protection from the Government, and all enjoy its inestimable blessings; a tax is levied on the agriculturist, though his property requires no more vigilance than that of other citizens, and why should the domestic manufacturer escape? Is he a better man, or a braver soldier? Does he contribute more to the wealth of the country? Is he more liberal in his means or policy? And yet he is the favorite of the Government, living without taxation, possessing the home market by warring against foreign articles, and, as I will proceed to show, having the advantage of free trade with foreign States.

By the "Compromise act" of 1833, silks and linens were admitted free of duty. This was done, contrary to the wishes of the planter, for the benefit of the manufacturer: he did not produce silk and linen goods, and insisted that the whole tax should be laid on iron, cotton, woollens, and other necessities of life, because, in these things, he was a rival to the foreigner. The consequence is, that the trade between France and the United States has greatly increased; in 1830 the silks imported were valued at $5,774,010; in 1835 they went up to $16,247,782; in 1839 to $21,350,669. The whole exportation of cotton to France has also increased, amounting in 1832 to little more than $7,500,000, and now to $13,323,142. Here is a powerful argument in favor of free trade; restriction is the malaria of commerce, its fetid breath deadens enterprise, and when it passes away, every thing springs into life and activity. What was intended to be a gratuity to the manufacturer, has become useful to the cotton planter. France consumes nearly a fourth of the crop; she is steadily improving in skill and means, and may become a rival market to England for the great staple. But if a duty be imposed on linens and silks, this fair prospect may be seriously darkened; wise rulers will hesitate before they take a step of such importance without urgent necessity.

Glance your eye, sir, over the list of importations. You will find that heavy duties are imposed on nearly all the articles which come here in exchange for cotton, tobacco, &c. except worsteds, wines, and these two, which are now selected for taxation. This is the only redeeming feature in the system of injustice; and yet gentlemen seem anxious to complete their work, and make it utterly hideous. If more revenue be absolutely necessary, it is at least decent that Southern agriculture should not bear the whole burden; and I will direct the attention of honorable members to a few objects that have escaped notice.

Shoes and leather are taxed, for the special comfort of the tanners and boot-makers of Lynn, in Massachusetts; but raw hides and skins come in free, to the amount of $3,158,027: they are imported from Mexico and South America, in exchange for those manufactures, which the Government has so bountifully protected from European competition. Dyes to the amount of $586,450, mahogany $504,826, barilla $150,637, also are admitted free of duty: they are used by the manufacturer; they come principally from South America, in exchange for the work of the favorite. Coffee, valued at $9,744,103, is free: it comes from Brazil and Cuba; the former is a great market for the products of Northern labor, and the only productions of the latter which are taxed heavily in this country are sugar, which the creole of Louisiana wishes to furnish at a high price, and spirits, which our rulers fear might entice the people from a delicious beverage called "Yankee rum." Teas, amounting to $2,424,594, are also free: they come from China, in exchange for specie, and cotton manufactures. In 1839, there was exported $850,533 of fish to Cuba, Hayti, and South America; $600,455 of oil to the same and the Hanse towns; $2,975,301 of cotton goods to South America, principally; $178,142 of spermaceti candles to the same region; $361,840 of furniture to Cuba, &c.; $453,471 of soap and candles to South America; $134,588 of iron and nails to Cuba, &c.; $748,862 of manufactures of iron to South America and Cuba, &c. &c.; and $197,162 of gunpowder to Mexico and South America. Nutmegs, pepper, cocoa, to a considerable amount, come in free from Holland and South America. Without going farther into detail, it will be seen that many other articles, besides wine, silk, and linens, are admitted free of duty; but they are essential to the factories, or come in return for the products of manufacturing labor, and this may be a good reason to continue the bounty. More than two-thirds of the imports from England are taxed, and one-third of those from France, whilst the merchandise from other countries is admitted on more favorable terms or entirely free; the commerce, in which the agricultural States of the South are most deeply interested, is shackled and embarrassed, whilst that which is carried on by the industry of other sections, is placed on the most liberal footing. And this is done by a Government established for the whole Union. Sir, I will not ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRECKENRIDGE] to tell his constituents that good policy and fair dealing forbid such legislation; it might be considered rude, as they doubtless think it just to tax the whole world for their own benefit. But I was grieved and astounded to hear the honorable member from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] he has volunteered to lay a burden on those whom he represents, and he will be spattered with praise for his magnanimity—but, sir, it is a virtue that he has no right to practise, until he is prepared to defray the whole cost.

The excuse for taxing wines, silks, and linens, is that they are luxuries. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. NISBET] talked of the rich man, riding in his carriage and flaunting in silk. Such language gave me pain; it may blind the people of Georgia, but it cannot exalt the reputation of the gentleman. A tax on the rich will not benefit the poor; the fine lady will use silk, though its price be increased, but a heavy duty will debar the less wealthy from such apparel. But this cry proceeds from a source, that honest men will distrust—it comes from those who established and fastened on the country the restrictive system. Mr. CLAY was the author of the act of 1824, and Mr. WEBSTER was the champion of the law of 1828; by the former a tax of 33½ per cent. ad valorem was placed on woollens, 34 cents per square yard on cotton bagging, 3 cents per pound on cables and other iron, 5 cents per pound on nails, 30 per cent. ad valorem on scythes, spades, knives, shovels—by the latter the duty on woollens was increased to 45 per cent. ad valorem, an additional tax of 10 per cent. ad valorem was put on axes, drawing knives, adzes, 10 cents per gallon on molasses, and by this or the act of 1832, 10 cents per bushel on salt, and 2½ cents on brown sugar. These things were done to benefit the manufacturers of Lowell, the iron monger of Pittsburgh, the grower of hemp in Kentucky, and the sugar planter of Louisiana: the poor were taxed for their blankets, for the ordinary comforts of life, for the utensils which gain their livelihood, and the rights of all were trampled under foot to gratify ambition and cupidity. The bare memory of such acts must fill every sound heart with indignation; the authors will find it difficult to assume the guardianship of the poor, for professions will not save them from suspicion. But, sir, I am willing to lay the greatest burden on luxuries, and, to test the sincerity of gentlemen, I ask them to lower the tax on necessaries; let the rich pay well for silks, linens, and wines, and permit coarse woollens, salt, molasses, and iron to come in without any duty. Will our opponents agree to this proposition? Will they do any thing that is really beneficial to the poorer classes? No, sir, no; the cry about luxuries is a mere plea for getting money, to squander on electioneering projects. If, however, gentlemen prefer another principle, let an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent. be laid on all importations, whether necessities or luxuries; a common feature should pervade our system of taxation; we ought not to legislate against a luxury to-day, and make war to-morrow on the common necessities of life, or the Government should recognise no distinction, and put all on the same footing. If I am not mistaken, the northern capitalist is beginning to manufacture silk goods; the day is past when he can boldly ask for protection, but if a duty could be laid, under any pretence whatever, the infant factories would swell into great establishments, and the whole people would contribute to his wealth. This may be one of the secret springs of the hypocritical movement for the relief of the poor.

Mr. Chairman, an attempt has been made to divide the friends of free trade, by appealing to the selfishness of the tobacco planter. We are told that a duty of 75 cents per pound is levied on tobacco in England, and that France prohibits the article, except a certain quantity for the King, who derives a large revenue from its sale; these facts are considered sound reasons for taxing wines, silks, and linens, in order to force England and France to admit tobacco on more liberal terms. If there was the slightest probability of opening the market, I should not hesitate to impose countervailing duties; but I ask the gentleman from Maryland to mention a single instance where they have succeeded. These nations themselves have been waging a commercial warfare for centuries; their statute books are full of the most absurd regulations, injurious to both parties, and now, when the error is seen, they cannot be touched, because great interests are dependent on the permanency of the laws. England and France are enormously indebted, and they must impose heavy taxes to pay the interest. Does the member from Maryland expect tobacco to be favored, when almost every thing that is eaten, drunken, or used in those countries, is grievously burdened? Perhaps England considers tobacco a "luxury," and thinks it right that her aristocracy should pay for the enjoyment; or she views it as a poison, whose use is destructive to health and cleanliness, and should be discouraged. The climate of Great Britain is good for tobacco, but its culture was forbidden more than one hundred years ago. This circumstance may throw light on her policy, and warn gentlemen of the danger of converting a consumer into a rival producer. Now, sir, is there much hope of driving France and England from their ancient policy? Negotiation may ultimately succeed, but the pride of those firm and gallant nations will be kindled at any measure, which bears the aspect of constraint, and the trade may be still farther shackled. Suppose, however, that retaliatory duties should not be successful, and then the tax on wines, silks, and linens will become a real injury to the planter; these are some of the articles which come in exchange for tobacco, and, if their consumption be diminished, the foreigner will be less able to purchase the domestic product. So that in striving to get more, we may lose the advantages already possessed.

But in quarreling about tobacco, we may bring down the value of another great staple. France and England will take cotton in exchange for their productions, and is it wise or just to embarrass a trade, that is mutually beneficial, because the rulers of Europe will not also receive tobacco? Sir, this would not be dissimilar to the opium war on China. The universal demand for the great export, may be a blessing conferred, in recompense for the deadly climate where it grows, and I feel sure that the tobacco planter will not grumble at the preference, or wish to pursue a dangerous policy at the risk of injuring another citizen. It cannot be that Maryland, Virginia, and the fairest portion of my own State, will desert the principles for which they have long struggled; the gilded bait now presented is a deception of the enemy, to lure them from the safe ground heretofore occupied. The outside is fair, but within is concealed the instrument that will drag them to destruction. If our ranks be broken, and the Government once more begin to regulate industry, the stronger interests will rule according to their passions and their appetite: the history of the past is an index to the future, and the tariffs of 1824 and 1828 show what may be expected from those who are hungry and thirsty after plunder.

The principal object of these taxing schemes, is to prepare the way for dividing the proceeds of the public lands among the States. When Virginia ceded the Northwestern Territory in 1784, she declared that "the lands shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States, as have become or shall become members of the Confederation or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other purpose whatsoever." At that time, before the existence of the present Constitution, the Treasury of the United States was supplied by assessment on the States, in proportion to the land tax of each, and it is not surprising that the idea of a general fund should be connected with the manner in which it was usually raised. This explains the language in the latter part of the paragraph above quoted, "according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure," which has been seized on as an authority for giving to the States the proceeds of the land. A mind anxious for truth, and not in search of an excuse for bad policy, will be satisfied that the expression "common fund," evinces the intention of Virginia to grant this Territory to the States a nation, not as separate communities. From the time of the cession, down to a very late period, this opinion was universally entertained, and its contrary is not heard of, till politicians began to think it a good instrument for delusion and bribery. The grant of Virginia extended only to the sovereignty of the country; the land itself belonged to the aborigines, it was purchased from them by this Government, paid for by taxes levied at the custom-house, and in every view must be considered a national property. But that portion of the Northwestern Territory which remains unsold, is very small in comparison to the immense domain which was acquired from France; and yet honorable members who use the cession of Virginia as an argument, do not distinguish, and intend to apply the same principle of distribution to the whole of that vast region. Whatever pretence, therefore, may be set forth, and however laborious gentlemen may be to disguise the real character of this measure, it conceals a doctrine of great magnitude and of momentous consequences. Sir, is it constitutional, or is it proper, that Congress should collect money for the State Legislatures? These are the questions involved in this discussion, and it is unworthy of a statesman to evade them, for the decision must deeply affect the destiny of our institutions.

The Federal Government was established for the purposes declared in the Constitution; it was authorized to "regulate commerce," "to declare war," "to raise armies," "to maintain a navy," "to provide for the common defence," &c.; all powers not delegated are reserved to the States, and it was designed that all the duties of Government, not imposed on Congress, should be performed by the local Legislature. The excellence of the system depends on keeping each of these agents in its prescribed orbit. If the central body draw to itself what specially belongs to the smaller creations, or if these grasp at the means which give vigor and efficiency to the great head, the whole Government will be thrown into confusion. The Constitution does not empower Congress to become a tax gatherer for the State Legislatures, and it is not necessary that we should assume this respectable position, for the same authority is given to both, though the forms may be different; and if money be needed for sectional objects, it ought to be levied by the local Government. But a great arguer [Mr. WEBSTER] has said that Congress has power to "dispose of the territory of the United States," without any limitation, and therefore we can act on this subject according to our own discretion. If this be sound reasoning, it is constitutional for us to borrow money, and give it to the kingdom of France, for the power to borrow is also unlimited. The true method of construing the sacred compact of our fathers, is to take an enlarged view of the whole instrument; the subordinate grants are ancillary to the great object; the power of taxation was conferred to effect the main purposes of the Federal Government, and in "disposing" of national property, we are bound to think of national duties, and to refrain from interfering with local affairs, however expedient it may seem to be. In their zeal to appropriate the public domain, and achieve a party triumph, gentlemen should remember that the proceedings of to-day will be an example for to-morrow; a false construction of our great charter may be the basis of future schemes, repugnant to the spirit of the contract, and hostile to the interests and feelings of large minorities of the people.

That portion of the opposite party, which boldly avows its principles, and is not ashamed of its true name, I sincerely respect; from the remainder, that is Federal in doctrine and Republican in profession, that is endeavoring to cheat the country by tricks and devices, we have not much to hope. The former seeks to strengthen this Government, by making the States dependent on its bounty; formerly the plan was to encroach on the jurisdiction of the States, but now they are invited to assault the central Government, and seize its property. When the Legislatures taste of the public land, do gentlemen suppose that the appetite for spoil will be satiated? May not other demagogues outstrip their teachers, and require a still greater share of the National Treasury? The Danaides were condemned to the endless task of pouring water into a leaky vessel, and a similar fate will attend us, if thirsty patriots increase in number with the usual rapidity. Is it wise, then, for the honest friends of a safe and efficient Government to throw away its means, and impair its necessary strength? Perhaps they suppose that depletion will render indispensable their favorite measure—a protective tariff. And is this the way to make the Government strong, to fix it deep in the hearts of the people, to create in us love and reverence for the work of our fathers? No, sir, Congress only becomes a tool of the dominant majority; it is used for vicious designs; and though one section may receive the shower of gold, another is burdened and oppressed.

But is this an auspicious period for the policy of distribution? In order to cast odium on Mr. Van Buren, gentlemen have drawn a sombre picture of our condition; according to them, the Treasury is in perfect chaos, the army disorganized, the navy rotting, the Government heavily indebted, and yet they wish to dissipate the public revenue. Look abroad, sir, at the events which are transpiring in other quarters of the globe; France, armed to the teeth, increasing her marine, and indulging in dreams of gigantic ambition—Great Britain, dictating to Europe, plundering Asia, and arrogantly searching our own ships on the high seas. At a moment England could pounce on Cuba, and annoy the whole Southern coast, or a fleet of her steamships might anchor in the harbor of New York, before the blow was even suspected. Are we prepared to repel aggression? Have we availed ourselves of the great improvements in naval science? No, sir, American statesmen are too busy with the petty schemes of personal aggrandizement—they hunt after popularity as if it were the philosopher's stone—and they are now striving to bribe the country with that money, which should be devoted to its protection. Shame, shame on such agrarian projects!

The annual income from the public lands may be $3,000,000, and if it be given to the Legislature, the whole result is, that one agent is exchanged for another, and the people themselves do not receive the benefit. Pennsylvania might get $300,000, and some would call this a gratuity, for which honor and glory should be awarded to the man, who has discovered a new process of acquiring money. But if this fund be taken from the Treasury, its place must be supplied by new taxes, or old burdens will remain, from which the country ought to be relieved. Pennsylvania will pay back to the United States as much as she receives; her people will be taxed to return money which we gave to the Legislature, and no one but a demagogue can see the wisdom of this operation. The share of North Carolina might be $100,000, and the honest people of that ancient Commonwealth are made to believe, that this comes from the abundant generosity of somebody unknown; whilst, in reality, their salt, iron, sugar, molasses, cloth, &c. are highly taxed at the custom-house, to enable this Government to transfer a portion of its revenue to the rulers of the States. The deception thus practised is a great objection to this scheme: if the tax payers, knew whence the money was derived, or directly felt the hand that was rummaging their pockets, they would be more watchful of the politicians who control the local powers, and would hold them to the strictest accountability. But if Federal policy prevails, we shall behold a universal scene of fraud and imposition; the facility of getting the people's money, without being caught, will open the door to the wildest schemes of expenditure, and the poor creatures, who hang about the legislative hall, seeking pay for dirty services, will receive an ample share of the public property. Why do we hear the groans that come up from every portion of the land, on account of debt? Credit has been too easy, and the people, not feeling any immediate burden, did not perceive the weight that every day's misconduct was accumulating. Such will be the issue of any contrivance to blind the country; the honest, and manly way is to tell the truth, and to scorn the political legerdemain which has become a favorite substitute for virtue and intelligence.

Mr. Chairman, I did hope that this session would be devoted to business. For years, the bitter conflict of party spirit has consumed the time of this House, and made us overlook the serious duties of legislation. The country needs repose, and if the promises of the late canvass were remembered, there would be a union of spirit and feeling to promote the welfare of the whole nation. But, sir, economy is never mentioned, extravagance has ceased to be frightful, reform is the subject of ridicule, and the majority of this House are taunted with parsimony, because we are sincerely anxious to curtail expenses, and avoid the necessity of new taxation. The member from Maine [Mr. EVANS] boldly contends that the expenditure has not been too large; the gentleman from New York sketches a magnificent picture of improvements to be made; whilst their friend from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] gently chides them for being so open-mouthed, but does not commit himself in favor of economy, and complains of all things which his opponents are endeavoring to do. These are ominous signs—they exhibit a sordid hankering after patronage, and shadow forth the career which honorable gentlemen intend to pursue. The tumult of one election has scarcely subsided, when preparations are made for another conflict of a yet more vindictive character. The coming Administration is considered but the herald of one that is mightier and prouder than his representative: its influence will be used, its offices will be distributed, and its measures will be directed to elevate the man, who brought it into existence. Sir, is the country nothing, are the people nothing, that politicians have the audacity to make these selfish arrangements, without reference to the glory and well-being of the Republic? Such daring innovations, and reckless tampering with great interests, are worse than the humbug, the imbecility, and pompous parade, that now disgrace the land. But, if these forebodings prove unfounded, and the new President shall think and act for the whole nation, and not for a clique or a particular section, no member of this House will give him a more cheerful support than myself.

SPEECH OF MR. BENTON,

OF MISSURI.

IN SENATE, Tuesday, January 26, 1841.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers of the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, was taken up, and having been read through, the question being on the motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN to recommit the bill, with instructions to report a bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States.

Mr. MANGUM addressed the Senate at much length in opposition to the bill, and in favor of the recommitment.

Mr. BENTON rose in reply, not to the Senator who had just taken his seat, [Mr. MANGUM,] but in reply to a Senator who had spoken on Saturday, [Mr. WEBSTER,] and who on that day had amended an argument in favor of the land distribution bill, which he had used on Thursday. On that day he [Mr. W.] rested the whole argument in favor of the constitutional power of Congress to pass the bill, on the terms and conditions of the cession acts and deeds from the different States. He relied on nothing else. He (Mr. B.) had replied to him on the spot, showing the utter inadequacy of this argument—showing that it did not cover the bill, or hardly touch it—that the bill applied to all the lands of the United States—those purchased from Spain and France, as well as those acquired from the States. The answer was conclusive; it was mathematical; it was the logic of the exact sciences; and every one saw its effect. It put an end to the debate; and, to all appearance, it had put an end to the question. Thus the debate of Thursday terminated.

On Saturday the Senator from Massachusetts renewed the discussion, and amended his argument. He brought forward new matter, which had escaped his view on Thursday. He took a new position, establishing himself on that clause in the Constitution which authorizes Congress to dispose of the territory of the United States. Upon this clause he took position, and deduced from it a new argument in favor of the distribution bill, broad enough to cover all the lands, come from where they might, but not valid enough to stand examination. He deduced from it an unlimited authority in Congress to dispose not merely of the lands, but of the land revenue itself, according to its will and pleasure, without either guide or restraint from the Constitution. He made Congress absolute over that branch of the revenue, discriminating it from custom-house and internal revenue, and making it a fund for the unlimited exercise of legislative discretion. The argument was a startling one, wholly foreign to the nature of our powers, and vesting Congress with the same power over the whole property of the United States, which was claimed for the lands. This was immediately shown by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] who pointed to the words of the Constitution, and showed that the word territory was coupled with that of other property, so that, if Congress had unlimited authority over the lands, it also had it over all the other property of the Union. This was a startling view of the new argument, both for the immensity of the property it would cover—the whole, in fact, which the Government owns, or may own—and the arbitrary, despotic nature of the power which it claimed for Congress. I undertake to add nothing to the view which that Senator presented in his luminous reply, but proceed to expose the fallacy of the new argument under a different aspect.

And, first, Mr. President, I wish to remark upon the fallacy of the sense in which a term, vital to the argument, is constantly used here, and elsewhere. It is the term cession, as applied to the acts and deeds by which Virginia, Georgia, and some other States, conveyed their rights in these lands to the General Government. That term is constantly used in the sense of gift, gratuity, donation; and that not in relation to jurisdiction, or a right of purchase from the Indians, but in relation to the soil itself—in relation to the land itself—which is supposed thus to have been gratuitously bestowed. This is a mistake—an error—a fallacy—an illusion. The ceding States ceded no land—gave no land—conveyed no land, to the General Government. They ceded nothing but that which they had; and they had nothing in these lands but the right of purchasing them from the Indians, or the right of conquest in the event of hostilities. From the time of William Penn, this is all that the grantees of the crown, the colonies, or the States, have claimed in the Indian land covered by their grants or charters. Each for itself claimed the right of acquisition of that which was within its limits; and this right of acquisition is all that the ceding States could convey, or did convey, to the United States. They conveyed nothing but the right of purchase; and this has been the understanding of all the parties—the States, the Indians, and the Federal Government—from the first day of the cessions to the present hour. Never, in a single instance, has the Federal Government occupied one foot of this ground until after it was purchased from the Indian tribe which claimed it. Never has she sold an acre until she had first bought it of the Indians; and where they have refused to sell, she has refused to disturb their possession, and either waited their time, and their price, as in the case of the Cherokee lands in the Southern States; or became their agent to sell the whole for their benefit, as in the case of the Chickasaw lands in the State of Mississippi. This is the exact state of all these cessions; so that it is indubitably true that, so far as land is concerned, and that is the only thing which the present question touches, the United States is a purchaser from the Indians, and not a donee from the States. She holds under Indian treaties, and not under State cessions. The same with the Florida and Louisiana acquisitions. We acquired from France and Spain precisely what we had acquired from the States—the same, and nothing more nor less. We obtained jurisdiction over the ceded territory, and acquired the right of purchase from the Indians. We have taken possession of no ground, not an acre, in Florida or Louisiana, until purchased from the Indians who claimed it. We have acted by the lands ceded by France and Spain precisely as we have acted by those ceded by the States. We have bought them from their Indian owners, or claimants, before we touched them. They all come to us, so far as we have acquired them, in the same manner—by Indian treaties, and not by foreign treaties—by purchases from the Indians, and not by cessions from the crowns of France and Spain. Thus, sir, all the lands of the United States are held by the same tenure, and acquired in the same mode. All our proprietary rights are the same; they are all held by purchase, and all paid for by money taken out of the treasury of the Union.

All our acquisitions are purchases, and large is the amount which has been paid for them: to France, fifteen millions of dollars; to Spain, five millions; to the Indians, eighty-five millions; to some of the States large sums, as to Georgia, to which State the Federal Government paid a great sum, besides extinguishing, for her benefit, at a great cost, the Cherokee title within her limits. Eighty-five millions is the purchase money paid to the Indians alone, besides annuities yet to run, and other indemnities, amounting now to about $775,000 per annum. Four hundred and forty-two millions of acres is the quantity thus purchased from the Indians; eighty-five millions the amount paid to them, besides the running annuities; twenty millions paid to France and Spain, and several millions to Georgia for the right of purchase: in all, above one hundred and ten millions paid for these lands. Now, where did all this money come from? Sir, it came from the Treasury of the United States, and has not yet been reimbursed to it; for the sales of the lands have not been equal to the cost of their acquisition and management.

Can we distribute custom-house or direct tax revenue? It is admitted that we cannot. The whole argument that we hear, and the bill in question, all admit it. All agree that we cannot. But, behold the wonders of the juggling art! We cannot take the money out of the Treasury and divide it, but we may take the money out of that same Treasury and convert it into land, and then reconvert the land into money, and then make the division! This is what the new argument of the Senator from Massachusetts amounts to! It is a mere circumvention of the Constitution. It makes mockery and derision of that instrument. It is a lesson in legislative alchemy, by which, not base metals are transmuted into gold, but unconstitutional acts are metamorphosed into constitutional ones.

This is the character and effect of the new argument, and where is the limit to its application—where the limit to the division of money which Congress may make under it? Our public lands are already estimated by the distribution party at one billion two hundred millions of dollars. All that may be sold and divided out. We have, besides, some hundred millions of other property—forts—ships—foundries—arsenals—navy yards—public buildings of all kinds—this Capitol: all these may be divided out; for they are other property; and all the other property of the United States is subject to the same power of disposition which applies to the territory. In addition to this we may go on to convert and reconvert, to the end of the chapter. We may buy, and sell, and divide, as long as money, or land, or property of any kind can be found. Such is the end of the Senator's new and amended argument.

We have heard of latitudinarians in religion and in politics. We have heard of dexterous constructionists, who could construe themselves out of any creed, or any fundamental law. We have seen some wide constructions put upon our own Constitution. But who ever heard of the like of this before? Whoever heard before that the Congress of the United States was without a limit, without a restriction, without a guide, upon the exercise of its money powers? that it may, by a juggling trick of its own contrivance, throw off every constitutional restraint upon the power to raise, or to use money—take its own will for its sole guide, and go on to dispose of hundreds of millions, or thousands of millions of dollars, according to its own will and pleasure. Certainly, of all latitudinarian constructions of the Constitution, this is the widest and most dangerous. It is also one of the most flagrantly unfounded and indefensible; so that the Senator from Massachusetts, unfortunate as he was in his scant and stunted constitutional argument of Thursday, was still more so in the new and amended and boundless one of Saturday.

I now come, said Mr. B. to a subject which has become connected with this debate, and which has assumed a form to require a most deliberate conderation. I allude to the question of a foreign interference in our late Presidential election. I chanced to refer to this interference in a late speech; the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] denied it, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] has reiterated the denial. Under these circumstances it becomes my duty to advance, or to recede—to sustain my assertion, or to retract it; and, as truth and justice will not permit me to do the latter, nothing remains but to go on with the accusation and bring forward the proofs. This I mean to do, and with the gravity and moderation which is due to the occasion. It is not an occasion for invective, for denunciation, for assertion without evidence; it is not an occasion for passion or personality. It is an occasion which requires calmness, fairness, consideration, and precision. It is a case which requires the proof to follow the charge, and the whole to be conducted with the gravity and equity of a judicial investigation. It concerns foreigners, who are not here to speak for themselves; it concerns the safety and independence of our form of government, which should not be lightly subjected to suspicions which weaken its strength. I know the responsibility of my position. I feel myself to be responsible for what I say—responsible to my own conscience, and to the greatest power of the age—the moral sense of all good men. Under this sense of responsibility I proceed to the discharge of my duty, and will first state the question over again, that Senators may be corrected of errors into which they have fallen, and my own design be made more clear and manifest. I have nothing to do with the loss or gain of the late election. I do not pretend to account here for its result. I do not think the inquiry a fit topic to be introduced into this chamber. It is one of party, and belongs to the forum of the people, and not to the bar of the Senate. I have a higher object in view—one which rises far above party contests—one which rises far above the question of party supremacy—one which goes to the independence and the safety of our form of Government—which concerns the feelings of every patriot, be his place what it may in party politics—and which starts the frightful question whether this Republic, like all free Governments, is to become the prey and spoil of foreign interference, and foreign influence? This is the object in view, and this the question which it raises; a question which has nothing to do with the loss or gain of the election—which has nothing to do with our party contests—which refers solely to foreigners, and to their conduct in our election—to their interference in our election; and this without even suggesting the effect of that interference, and how far it might have influenced the result. I disclaim and repel all this inquiry, and limit myself to the mere question of interference. Have foreigners interfered in our election? That is my question; and not have foreigners governed the election? The offence is in the interference! The outrage to our form of Government—the insult to every American feeling—the attack upon our independence—is in the interference itself! in the audacity and criminality of daring to interfere in our election at all, and not in the contingent consequence of more or less effect from that interference. This is my question. It is one worthy to excite my inquiries—worthy to engage the attention of the Senate—worthy to command the attention of all patriots, be their party politics what they may; and to this question, stripped of all extraneous matter, I now proceed; and shall commence at once with the introduction of proofs.

Behold this book, said B. holding up a new and handsome octavo volume. It is fresh from the London press, and speaks the sentiments of the English capitalists in relation to moneyed questions, and political parties, in the United States. It is a work upon the financial position and credit of such of our States as have contracted debts in Europe; with a survey of their wealth and resources, their ability and disposition to pay their debts, and the dangers to be apprehended from the growth and prevalence of Democratic principles in the United States. It was published in London on the 26th day of December, 1839, being, by a curious coincidence, the precise time at which the anti-association resolutions were submitted in this chamber

The name of Alexander Trotter, esq. is placed on the title page, as the author of the work; but it is more the work of a class than of an individual, and evidently speaks the sentiments of the bankers and capitalists of London. It may be quoted and considered as their work.

The author entitles this work according to his fancy; I give it a different name from that which he has inscribed upon it; and draw my appellation from a similar production in English history, and which must have suggested the idea of the plan and design of this work: I allude to the Dooms Day Book of William the Conqueror, commonly called William, Duke of Normandy. We all know that when this French Duke had conquered England, he caused a survey to be made of the property of the kingdom, the value of all estates to be ascertained, and the whole to be entered up in a book, to which was given the impressive title of Dooms Day Book. It was a significant and appropriate title; for all the property registered in it was considered as the spoil of conquest—as being brought up to a sort of judgment day, and thenceforth doomed to taxation and confiscation. It was the judgment book of the conqueror against the people whom he had subjugated. It gave him, at a view, the value of his conquest, and the means of making it available for the support of his army and his throne. The volume which I hold in my hand is an imitation of that work, with a change of names and localities. It is the Dooms Day Book, not of an English King, but of English money dealers; not of English, but of American property. It contains the register of the debts of our States held in London, with a view of the wealth and resources of the States which owe them, with many reflections on the circumstances which may either endanger or assure the ultimate payment of these debts. Among those circumstances which go to endanger this ultimate payment, the author relies upon one which surpasses and transcends all the rest. It is that of the growth and prevalence of Democratic principles in America! Democracy is the dread and terror of these capitalists who hold the bonds of the States! It is their dread and terror. Democracy—American Democracy—is their fear and horror. But I will not precipitate the narrative, nor jump to the conclusion. The right understanding of the main point which I mean to bring out, requires the character of the whole work to be exhibited, that its political application to our affairs may be seen by all, and its authoritative weight may be felt. This character is well made known in the headings to the first chapter of the work; and from these headings I will read a selection of items which will be sufficient for the purpose which I have in view.

Mr. B. then read:

"High credit of the Federal Government. Credit of the States not identical with this. Accumulation and distribution of the surplus revenue. Financial difficulties, and postponement of the transfer of the fourth instalment. First National Bank of the United States. Second Bank of the United States. Opposition of the President (Jackson) to the renewal of the charter. His probable motives. Disastrous consequences of his hostility to the Bank. Effects of the President's interference with the banking system. Facilities afforded by the Bank of the United States interfered with by the withdrawal of the public deposits. Distribution of the surplus revenue injudiciously effected. Specie circular. Effects of the two combined. Measures of the President to procure gold. Disastrous consequences. Failures in New Orleans and New York. Suspension by the banks of specie payments. Impolicy of the gold bill. Moral influence of slavery. Funds for works of internal improvement, and for the establishment of banks, chiefly obtained from loans. Security of the public creditor derived from the application of the funds. Advantage of auxiliary funds. Second suspension of specie payments by the banks. Apparent necessity for this course. Dangers to which banks are exposed in the Southern States."

From these headings to the matters contained in the first chapter, Mr. B. said the Senate could comprehend the character of the work; that it was identical in political sentiment with the anti-Democratic party in this country; following the lead of that party, and borrowing the very topics and language which it used in our party warfare here. It would seem to be an American production, of the Federal school, issued from a partisan press of this country, instead of being, as it is, a high Tory production from the press of London, and the pen of an Englishman. It is needless to quote from the body of this chapter to show how the subjects are treated which are named in the headings. That is sufficiently manifest from the mere statement of the subject. If read, they would be taken for Federal speeches delivered on this floor. So exactly is this the case; that the main argument of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] on Saturday last, in favor of auxiliary supplies from the Federal Government to the States, appeared to me to be borrowed from this American Dooms Day Book of the English capitalists, which I hold in my hand. The argument of the Senator was, that as the States had surrendered to the Federal Government all the great sources of revenue in giving up to it the public lands and the custom-house duties, therefore, the Federal Government was bound to lend a helping hand to the States. This was the substance of his argument. The same idea is found in this book, published in London twelve months before the gentleman's speech was delivered here, but written in London during the year that the gentleman was in that city. The ideas of the speech and of the book are identical; and I will read from the book, for the benefit of the stenographers, who may not have completed their report, as well as for the information of the Senate, what I find to be written in it under the head of auxiliary funds needed by some of the States. Mr. B. read:

"In the case of many States, auxiliary funds are specially appropriated to this purpose; in others, the security of the loans are based solely on the general credit of the State. The appropriation of such funds is in almost all cases desirable, as, however great the resources of a State may be, its fiscal means are often extremely limited. Its resources, not only from the most productive sources of revenue, such as the proceeds of the sale of the public lands, imposts on commerce, and the revenue of the post office having been surrendered to the General Government, and belonging exclusively to it, but also from the anxiety always shown by the people of the United States to control their rulers by making them dependent on their will for the supplies, which they at all times very sparingly allot to them. This Democratic feeling is carried so far, even in the wealthiest States, that the treasuries are constantly exposed to become bare; and the accounts of almost all are complicated by the borrowing and repaying of temporary loans made by moneyed institutions of the State to provide for unexpected emergencies, or even for the ordinary demands of the public administration."

Having thus shown the political character of the work, its identity with Federalism, and its consequent conclusive authority with that party, Mr. B. proceeded to show the manner in which the author had executed his work in stating the debts, and showing the wealth and resources of the indebted States. For this purpose, he had taken the States in detail, one by one, and had examined the condition of each one under the same heads. Mr. B. would not follow the author over each State, but would give an idea of the whole, by showing the method of treating one; and, for his exemplar, would take the State of Kentucky—a State on which the author seemed to have bestowed peculiar attention. Mr. B. then read from the book:

"KENTUCKY.—Amount of debt and liabilities. Form of security, when and where redeemable. Rates of interest, and when and where payable. Amount at present chargeable on the Treasury. Bank of Kentucky. Northern Bank of Kentucky. Condition of the banks at different epochs. Nature of internal improvements. Condition of the Treasury. Commerce of the State. Amount of taxable property."

These heads are filled up by details, said Mr. B. which it is not my design to pursue. I only propose to show the manner in which the affairs of the States are treated, for the purpose of arriving at results. The author of the work finds Kentucky to be a rich State, and rapidly increasing in wealth. He is forcibly struck with this increase, and states it with clearness and precision. He says:

"The increase in the general wealth of the State may be judged of by the progressive increase in the returns made to the auditor of the taxable property in the State. This, which in 1830 amounted to $103,513,658, by the last valuation amounted to $224,053,011."

This is the result of the survey of the debts, resources, and wealth of Kentucky; and here the mind is naturally turned to make a remark, pertinent to the occasion, and entitled to the careful remembrance of every Democrat in America. It grows out of the last quoted paragraph of this London book—the paragraph in which the writer shows the wealth of Kentucky to have increased one hundred and twenty-one millions of dollars in the eight preceding years. This is an amazing increase, more than doubling the value of the State, and naturally turns the inquiry to the period of time at which it took place. That period was from 1831 to 1839; that is to say, it was during the Democratic administrations of General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren, covering a part but the whole of neither. It was during these Administrations, and during a period of time when the panic and distress orators were filling the land with cries and lamentations, and terrifying all imaginations with pictures of misery, poverty, and desolation. It was during the time that these orators daily proclaimed the total ruin of the country, and daily asserted there could be no prosperity without a change of men and measures—without the overthrow of the Democracy, and the re-establishment of a National Bank. It was during the time when there was "no King in Israel;" when the King Bank had expired under the veto, and the removal of the deposits; and when there was no "Regulator" to take care of the property and politics of the people. It was during the time of the gold bill, the specie circular, the war upon credit, the Maysville road veto, the pocketing of the land distribution bill, and so many other measures, each of which, according to the doleful lamentations of the distress orators, was sufficient to ruin and destroy the country. It was during this period of Democratic misrule and misgovernment, and in the midst of this national destruction and misery, according to these orators, that the authentic valuations of the Kentucky property show the wealth of that State to have advanced from 103 to 124,000,000 of dollars! to have more than doubled! to have gone 21,000,000 further in these eight years, than in the whole previous half century of her existence, during twenty years of which she had a double portion—two branches—Benjamin's share—of that national blessing, the Bank of the United States! The authentic record of the tax list shows this result. The record shows it; and in showing it, what a monument of honor and glory is raised to Jackson and Democracy! What a lesson of chastisement and rebuke is read to their assailants!

Mr. B. said it had been vauntingly declared on on this floor, during the extra session of 1837, by a Senator from South Carolina, who sits over the way [Mr. PIERCE], that the appointment of Mr. Biddle to be Secretary of the Treasury, would add one hundred millions of dollars to the value of the property of the people of the United States. This was said in reproach of the ruinous measures, as they were called, of Jackson and Van Buren, and to show the necessity of changing men and measures. It was spoken, as the event proves, without a reference to the valuation tables of taxable property, and has not been repeated since. It would doubtless not be said now. It was considered a hyperbolic compliment to Mr. Biddle at the time, and a couple of short years years proved it to be so. It has been seen to have been a most unmerited compliment to him; it has turned into little less than a sarcasm upon him. But, while shooting so far beyond the desert of him it was intended to honor, how infinitely it falls short of the merit of him it was intended to reproach! General Jackson's administration has actually increased the value of the property of the people—not one hundred—but more than a thousand millions of dollars. In Kentucky alone it was one hundred and twenty-one millions; in Massachusetts it was ninety-nine millions. Here are two hundred and twenty millions of increase in two States alone, and of the middle class—States which, in wealth and population, rank far below several others. Pursue the inquiry—apply it to the whole Union—extend it over the twelve years of Democratic sway—over the whole period of General Jackson's and Mr. Van Buren's administrations—and then see the result. Far above one thousand millions of dollars—much nearer to two thousand, than one thousand millions—will be the grand aggregate of the united increases. Instead of one hundred millions for a total increase, near one hundred and fifty millions of annual increase, for twelve successive years, will turn out to be the historical record of the case. Such is the answer which authentic history is giving to Federal lamentations over ruin and misrule. Such is the gorgeous picture of national prosperity which crowns and adorns the Democratic Administrations. Let the friends of Democracy every where verify and complete it. Let them apply to the fiscal record of every State and Territory—take the comparative valuations of property in all times and under all administrations—ascertain the comparative results—and thus arm themselves with a document which will place the administrations of Jackson and Van Buren far above any others—even the most prosperous—which our country has ever seen.

We come now to the last, and most important, chapter of this work, the contents of which are indicated by these heads:

"Aggregate of State debts.—Probable necessity of taxation to pay the interest.—Probable conduct of the States under these circumstances.—Influence of Democratic principles.—Durability of the Union."

These headings to the matter contained in this final chapter, announce its important bearing, and its just claim upon the attention of the people of the United States. I pass over the whole, important as they are, for the purpose of getting at the penultimate section of the chapter—the one that relates to the influence on these debts of Democratic principles; and shall only make such statements in relation to the others as are necessary to the correct understanding of this; the most important of all. From it, I will read copious extracts; for it is of a nature to require to speak for itself. The extracts will be read as soon as I make the preliminary remarks which the context requires.

The writer first states the aggregate amount of the State debts; and here it is somewhat amusing to remember the alarm and terror which filled the breasts of Federal gentlemen on this floor, for fear of divulging the amount of these debts, when the non-assumption resolutions were under debate twelve months ago. These gentlemen deemed it cruel and dangerous to the States to name the amount of these debts on this floor. They were afraid the British would find it out from our debates, and that the credit of the States would be ruined. It was to no purpose that we insisted that the English knew more about these debts than we did; and if they did not, that there was no morality in our concealing them. Nothing that we could say could appease the fears of these most cautious gentlemen. The States were to be discredited, if we told how much they were in debt. This was their incessant objection. Finally, to quiet this alarm, it was agreed to drop from the report, which was made on the occasion, all that related to the amounts, aggregate or individual, of these State debts. The amounts were suppressed. While this scene was being enacted here, this Doms Day book was in the course of publication in London, and was very gravely devoting one chapter to the amount of these debts individually, and another to their aggregate amount; and stating the results in good arabic figures. It was casting them up, and adding them together, with all the care of solving a question of personal interest in the exact sciences; and it arrived at a result equal to any which had been attained on this side of the Atlantic. It made these debts (inclusive of poor unfortunate Florida) amount to one hundred and eighty-three millions of dollars. This was the aggregate; and the first inquiry which presented itself to the mind of the writer was the question of ability in the States to pay it? This was the first question, and this being determined in the affirmative, the next inquiry was, could they be compelled to pay? Here the writer identifies himself with the capitalists of London by quoting, and giving in extenso, the letter of the honorable DANIEL WEBSTER to the Messrs. Barrings, in the autumn of 1839, in answer to their inquiry upon this same point. The letter was very satisfactory on the point of the capacity of the States to contract debts, but very unsatisfactory on the delicate point of compelling them to pay. On this vital point, the letter gave no satisfaction. It seemed to refer the payment entirely to the voluntary will of the States. In this opinion, the author of the book concurs; and, thereupon, enters upon the consideration of the great and vital question of the willingness of the indebted States to make this payment. This question he examines with all the consideration of the party most deeply interested. He examines it under many aspects, and by all the tests which can effect the solution of a problem on which depended the payment of the large annual interest, and the ultimate restoration of the great capital itself. He examines it analytically and philosophically—positively and comparatively—by single States—by classes of States—by clusters of States—and by States united, or disunited. He compares the slave and the anti-slave States together, and decides which will be most apt to pay. The same with the religious or irreligious States—with the old and the new ones—the Atlantic and the Western. He compares all these together; and still comes to the same question: which will be most willing to pay? He even examines this tender question under the aspect of a dissolution of the Union; and considers how far that catastrophe might endanger the payment of these debts, principal and interest. Under these various aspects he examines this question; and comes to conclusions more or less favorable to the creditors, and more or less honorable to different States, and classes of States, in each branch of the inquiry. But all these preliminary and subaltern inquiries, are finally absorbed and lost sight of in one grand, general, and overruling view which he takes of the whole question; and that is the political view of it. He examines it politically under the aspect of supremacy, or predominance, of each of the two political parties in the United States; and inquires from which of them the English creditors have most to hope, or to fear? This inquiry, as may have been anticipated from the whole character of the work, he solves to the prejudice of Democracy. He sees in the "rapid strides which Democratic principles are making in the United States"—"in the prevalence of Democracy"—"in the dangerous tendency of Democratic principles"—"in the growth of popular opinion in the worst sense of the word"—"in the dangerous right of universal suffrage"—"the subjugation of the better classes, possessed of wealth, talent, and station, to the numerical force of the majority"—"the little power of the Executive to resist popular clamor"—the influence of the Democracy in overruling the wiser and better principles advocated by the more enlightened portion of the citizens, and in conferring power on those who are little fit to judge of the interests of the State—"the elections of 1834, after the removal of the deposits, when the people sustained President Jackson"—"the want of a property qualification admitting into the legislative bodies of classes not directly interested in maintaining the financial integrity of the State"—"the indisposition of the Democracy to submit to taxation"—"their indifference to religious principles"—"their want of far sighted views and principles of national honor:" he sees in all these circumstances and considerations, and others which he mentions, danger to British interests; and brings himself to the conclusion, and with himself the whole body of the English capitalists, that the prevalence of Democracy in the United States is incompatible with the safety of the State debts held by the English. This is the conclusion arrived at. But this is a point on which it is right that the book should speak for itself; and at this point it is that I have intended to make it speak. Listen, then, to what it says:

"Where sufficient data have been obtained, an attempt has been made in the last chapter to show the ability of the several States to meet the demands that may possibly be made upon them; and in some cases that point has been satisfactorily established. But as the ultimate security of even, the greater part of the loans have finally to rest on a system of taxation, not only the means but the probable disposition of the inhabitants to submit to taxation, ought to be taken into consideration in an attempt to exhibit the degree of credit which should attach to these engagements."

"The effect of this prevalence of Democratic principles may have in the case before us, is very evident; for, should the States hereafter be obliged to have recourse to taxation to defray the interest on their loans, it will not, probably, be till the different undertakings for which the loans were raised will have been rendered unpopular by want of success; and though it does not follow that the people, under these circumstances, will refuse to make the necessary sacrifice, their adhering to their engagements cannot be so confidently depended upon as it might be if the legislative bodies were returned by classes more directly interested in the maintenance of the financial integrity of the States."

"Though in estimating the future by the past, there is great reason, therefore, to believe that a determination to adhere strictly to their engagements is still likely to characterize the people of the several States, yet the effect of the continued and rapid strides which Democratic principles are making in the United States may have too important consequences to be altogether overlooked in the present inquiry."

"The growth of popular opinion, in the worst sense of the word, in the United States, and the influence it has had in overruling the wiser and better principles advocated by the more enlightened portion of the citizens, have been lamentably shown in the little power which the Executive has been proved to possess at all points where it has been opposed by popular clamor, which, whether expressed throughout the Union generally, or in a detached portion of it, has, in the end, always proved victorious."

"Possessed of wealth, of talent, and of station, they (the better classes) were able to exert the influence which these ought ever to command in the selection of their representatives in the national councils; but the subjugation of this important, and respectable class to the numerical force of the majority, in the wealthiest States in the Union at the period of the elections in 1834, evinces the power which the dangerous right of universal suffrage is calculated to confer on those who are little fit to judge of the true interests of the State, and most open to the influence of uncontrolled feelings."

"In deprecating, however, the dangerous tendency of Democratic principles, it must be borne in mind that the direction of the bias which this power will give to the course of events, will depend on the character of the people who exercise it; and as, in the supposed instance, the question is a simple one, of whether the States will act honestly or fraudulently, much will depend on the prevalence of religious principles among them; for no views of expediency, however far-sighted, or even principles of national honor, can, under the supposed circumstances, be relied on."

Mr. B. after reading these extracts, resumed his remarks, and went on to say, that he had quoted enough to show the feelings of English capitalists with respect to the American Democracy—enough to show that their feelings were now what they were fifty years ago, and for the same cause. The British debts, due before the Revolution from American citizens to British merchants, and afterwards provided for in Jay's treaty, was then the great cause of English antipathy to American Democracy. These English then, as now, took it into their heads to believe that the American Democracy was a rabble; without morals, religion, property, honor, intelligence, or public or private faith; that they could not be relied on to pay the debts; and, therefore, they were against them. At the same time, they took into their heads that there was another party in the United States who were the reverse of all this—a party which was composed of the better classes—and on which they could rely for payment; and upon the success and elevation of this party, they immediately placed their hopes. This was the reasoning of British capitalists with respect to American debtors forty and fifty years ago; and, correspondent to this reasoning, was their action. They interfered in our elections. They took the field in favor of the Federalists, and against the Democracy. They operated by the means known to the money power—by applications of money to active agents—by disturbing the business, and misleading the mind of the public. Prominent individuals were gained over by largesses; the public was coerced, or misled—coerced by operating on the markets, or misled by daily publications from presses in British pay. What aged citizen is there who does not recollect these scenes—the scenes of foreign interference from 1790 to 1800? What young man is there who has not read of them? Who has not heard of the Porcupine Gazette, and its assistant laborers?—the first Bank of the United States, and its affiliated institutions?—the British merchants, and their emissaries?—all—all—openly engaged in our elections, and rivalling the Federalists in their abuse and hatred of Democracy. Who is there that has not heard of the younger Pitt's declaration in Parliament, that Cobbett, then the champion of England and the foe of Democracy, deserved a statue of gold for his writings in America? Who is there that does not know from recollection, or by reading, or by traditions, all these things? If there is any one, let him look to the history of the times—to the history of the elections of 1796 and 1800—and he will learn things which it concerns him to know. Now, in our own day, and at the end of near half a century, we find things reverted to their ancient position—debts again due to the British—debts, the payment of which depends on political as well as individual action—which will require legislation and taxation as well as individual faith and exertion. A treaty was necessary then; laws are necessary now; and thus the old state of things is revived, and with it, all its accessories and consequences. This book is proof of the fact; but it is not all the proof. It goes far enough; but there is more to come. It is a witness of the highest authority in this case, issuing from the bosom of the English capitalists; and speaking their every wish and feeling. It is the authentic exposition of their sentiments. It shows them to be the enemies of Democracy—the friends of Federalism—uneasy about their debts—eager to secure them—and looking to the Federalists for payment. It shows that the fate of the debts is believed to be involved in the issue of our party contests, and that all is lost if the Democracy is victorious. All this the book shows, and that the destruction of the American Democracy is the fixed end and aim of the British capitalists. Delenda est Carthago—let Carthage be destroyed—was never more distinctly pronounced by the elder Cato, at the conclusion of his every speech, than the destruction of American Democracy is denounced in the concluding chapter of this book.

Mr. BENTON said that he had now produced one division of the testimony which went to establish foreign interference in our elections, and would proceed to another. He would show to the Senate the letters of an eminent London banker, and a director of the Bank of England, which went fall, and without circumlocution, to the point. He alluded to the letters of Frederick Huth and Co. to the president of the Bank of Missouri, in the months of June and September last. The house of Huth and Co. had been made the agent of the Bank of Missouri in selling a few bonds which the State was impvident enough to issue; the sales were not made; and these letters were to explain the reason of this failure. The first letter bore date the 3d of June, and contained this sentence:

"The attention of our capitalists and others engaged in American affairs is now turned to your internal politics, and if the prospects for your next Presidential election held out by the last accounts should be realized, this circumstance will contribute more than any other to restore general confidence."

This, said Mr. B. is a very pregnant sentence, and every word of it is significant of an important result. The attention of British capitalists is turned to the politics, and the internal politics, of the United States. This is the declaration, and what curious matter it presents for our consideration. Capitalists, not politicians, are now occupied with our affairs. It was deemed bad enough—the framers of our Constitution thought it bad enough—for foreign Governments to interfere in our internal affairs; and therefore made provision against such interference. They did not think of guarding against foreign capitalists; yet this is the quarter from which the interference now comes. Degrading and dangerous as would be the interference of a foreign Government in our affairs, far more so is that of foreign money dealers. The purse is a more potent enemy than the sword; and the history of all free Governments shows that a foreign moneyed interference is more dangerous than the invasion of an army.

The first division of this sentence shows that our internal politics are the subject of this interference; the second division of it shows what part of our internal affairs are intended; and that this is no less than our Presidential election! It is equally explicit as to the side of that election which has their good wishes. If it turns out as they were led to expect, and we all know what that expectation was; if it turned out that General Harrison should be elected, then an important consequence was to ensue—a great result was to follow—no less than the general restoration of confidence! He does not say confidence in what, nor why the sudden resurrection of that feeling was to take place; nor was it necessary for him to do so. Dooms Day book had told that secret: it had explained that mystery. Democracy could not be relied upon to provide for the payment of State debts: Federalism could; and hence the consequence attached by British creditors to General Harrison's election. It shows where their eyes are turned—that they are turned to the Federal Government—to the President and to Congress—for the support and maintenance of State credit—for the payment of State debts, principal and interest. This is what it shows; whether truly or not, time and events will soon unfold; and thus it was not necessary for Mr. Huth to explain the manner in which the election of General Harrison was to operate a resurrection of the corpse of defunct confidence. Dooms Day book had done it; and to that we can refer for all the explanations which are wanting.

Mr. B. here remarked upon the word confidence. He said it was used more frequently during our late Presidential canvass than any other word in the English language, one only excepted, which he would name hereafter. It was used in Congress and out of Congress, in writing and in speaking, and by all orders of writers and speakers. It was used not only incessantly, but mysteriously. It was a cabalistic phrase. It stood for a whole argument within itself; was always ready when nothing else could be thought of; and was deemed the more potent because it was incomprehensible. Thus it was used during our canvass, playing a great part in the contest, and no one being able to tell the reason why. Now the secret is out. The origin and the import of the phrase is known: it is of British origin, and sinister import. It comes from London, and imports that the Federal party is to provide for the payment of State debts in Europe. Therefore, confidence is to be revived in State credit; the capitalists are to untie their purse strings; and bonds can be sold as fast as lamp black, and rags can be converted into State obligations.

Mr. B. proceeded to the letter of September, and read this extract:

"If however, your elections for the Presidency should have the result now anticipated, it is very probable that an impulse will be given to all State stocks, and the moment may then arrive when your bonds can be introduced under favorable auspices."

This paragraph (Mr. B. said) was a complete reiteration of the sentiments of the June letter, with an enlargement of the supposed consequential effects of the election of the Federal candidate. The June letter looked to the beneficial effect of the election on raising the value of State bonds; this letter looks to an increased value to be imparted to all State stocks; all to receive an impulse. This comprehensive phrase includes every variety of stocks created by State legislation. It includes banking, canal, railroad, fancy, territorial, city and all. It includes such establishments as the Bank of the United States, two-thirds of which is owned in England, and its stock now at 50 cents in the dollar, which is 45 cents more than it will yield when wound up; it includes such as the Morris Canal Bank stock, covered two or three deep with liens in Europe, and worth not a straw. It includes such articles as the Florida bonds, and the Pensacola Bank and railroad; it includes city stocks—cities which are only lithographed, as well as those which are incorporated. It includes all these, and myriads more, in addition to the State bonds—to amounts not known, and at every degree of depreciation, from the cool latitude of 50 cents in the dollar, down to the freezing point at zero. All these are to receive an impulse—to take a start in the market—to give per centums to the holders—in the event of General Harrison's election to the American Presidency. Add all these amounts to the State debts proper, and immense will be the aggregate, and almost incredible the interest which, according to their own calculations, these capitalists have dependant upon the issue of our Presidential election.

Mr. B. proceeded to another paragraph of the September letter. It was in these words:

"After you have waited so long, we think it would be a pity to recall the bonds without seeing what effect a change in your Executive will produce, in which point we may expect to form a fair judgment about the beginning of next year."

This, said Mr. B. is a most pointed paragraph. The London agent dissuades the Missouri Bank President from recalling the bonds. It would be a pity, he said, to recall them before the Presidential election—before seeing what would be the effect of a change in the American Executive. This change was to have a good effect upon the stock market, and that the result would be known by the 1st of January. Here was a clear declaration that the sale of the bonds was dependent upon the issue of the election, and, consequently, that if the bank wished to sell its bonds, it must first elect Harrison. This was the plain import of the letter; and when we recollect that this was only a sample of what was said to all—that all sellers of stocks of every kind, to the amount of some hundreds of millions of stocks, and comprehending tens of thousands of persons, and whole States, corporations, and cities; that all these were tempted and excited as the Missouri Bank was, then we see the immensity of the influence which the London moneyed power was bringing to bear upon the election. No doubt thousands of similar letters were written to other institutions, and to other individuals; that they were sent into every part of the Union, and among all classes of debtors, individual, corporate, and States; and that all were made to believe that, on the result of the election, depended the fulness or the emptiness of their own purses.

Mr. B. reminded the Senate that he had made an exception in favor of another phrase, not then named, when he spoke of the incontinent use of the phrase, confidence, in our late Presidential canvass: he made an exception in favor of another phrase when he spoke of the incessant use of that one, and promised to bring it to light in due time. That promise is now complied with. The excepted phrase is brought to light. It is found in the last quoted paragraph from the London letter, and in that part of it which looks to the change in the American Executive. This phrase, above all others, even above that of confidence, figured in our election, and resounded in the Federal harangues. It would be difficult to recollect a speech, to find an essay, or to remember a conversation in relation to the election, in which this word change, did not play its prominent and conspicuous part. It, also, was cabalistic and talismanic. It stood for a whole argument in itself, and like the other, was the more potent because incomprehensible. Change! change! was the Federal cry during the summer campaign, and high above all the others, was heard the voice of a gentleman who had visited England in the summer of 1839, and from whom the cry of change, change, change, was heard to resound from Boston to Richmond, and back again from Richmond to Boston. Had he been a starling, caged in England, and taught the daily lesson, he could not have repeated it with more incontinent assiduity. Now we all see where the phrase comes from; that it is of London origin, and comes from the bosom of the English capitalists, and from the mouth of a director of the Bank of England. Well, the change has come! The American Executive is changed, and with it many changes of place and office will take place. That may satisfy the summer patriots on this side of the Atlantic, but it will not satisfy the purse holders on the other side. They want the fruits of the change—the per centums on rising stocks; and it will require something more than an exit and an entrance at the White House to satisfy them. They must have measures—legislative measure—laws—to answer their purpose. They must have State credit sustained; and to this body they will look for all this substantial and profitable work. The hurrah of the election victory, a dance in log cabins, the change of place and office, will not satisfy them. The "stocks," is the word! Make them rise, is the demand!

Mr. B. said he had expected to have presented the Huth letters to the Senate under a most impressive form—he had expected to have presented them under the authority, and in obedience to the instructions of the General Assembly of Missouri. That body has taken cognizance of these letters, written to the president of the Bank of the State. It had taken cognizance of them, and made them the subject of a series of resolutions, one of which required them to be communicated to the delegation of the State in Congress. The resolutions had all passed, as himself and colleague knew from letters, and from newspaper reports; they had passed long since, but had not been received by himself or any one of the delegation. That they were lost on the way, in one of the numerous mails which had been robbed this winter, was the probable conjecture; and having a correct, but not an official copy of the resolutions, he (Mr. B.) would now present them as a part of his argument, and as an authentic commentary upon the character of the Huth letters.

Mr. B. then read:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives, the Senate concurring therein;

"1st. That the bonds of the State of Missouri in the hands of Frederick Huth and Co. in London, be recalled, and taken out of the European market.

"2d. That the two letters from Frederick Huth and Co. dated London, June 3d, and September 11th, 1840, disclose the evidence of a direct interference on the part of British capitalists in the internal politics of the United States, and especially in the Presidential election of 1840, and in favor of changing the American Executive.

"3d. That the said letters contain internal evidence of a belief in the minds of British capitalists that the value of American bonds and stocks in their hands will be increased by the election of the Federal candidate to the Presidency in 1840.

"4th. That the said letters contain internal evidence of a design on the part of British capitalists to bribe the American people with their own money.

"5th. That any legislation on the part of Congress to increase the value of American bonds and stocks in the hands of British capitalists, will be an alarming compliance with the belief and expectation of the said capitalists, and will be a reward to them for their interference in our election, and an encouragement to continue their interference in time to come.

"6th. That any assumption or guarantee of said debts, or any provision for paying them, on the part of the General Government, or any attempt to appropriate the public land revenue to their payment, will be an invitation to British capitalists to interfere in our legislation, as well as in our elections, and an inducement to them to use all the means known to the moneyed power to obtain the passage of laws favorable to their interest; and tending to enhance the value of the stocks and bonds held by them.

"7th. That of all the modes of assuming, guarantying, or providing for the payment of the State debts in Europe, the most objectionable and injurious would be by appropriating the public land revenue to that object, as thereby, in addition to all the evils of an actual assumption of said debts, the public lands would become virtually mortgaged to foreigners, who would immediately feel an interest in the sale and disposition of said lands, adverse to the interest of the people, and would use their influence in Congress to procure the same to be sold for the highest possible price, and to prevent all equitable reductions of price, and also preventing all donations and pre-emptions to actual settlers.

"8th. That it is unconstitutional, degrading to the character of the States, tending to consolidation, and involving corrupt practices on the part of foreigners, for Congress to engage in any schemes to sustain State credit in Europe.

"9th. That a copy of these resolutions, and of the two letters to which they refer, be furnished to the Missouri delegation in Congress; and that the same be spread on the journals of this House."

Such, said Mr. B. is the commentary of the General Assembly of Missouri on these extraordinary letters, and in every word of which I concur. The General Assembly has properly resented the insult to the integrity of its bank by ordering the recall of its bonds; and it has signally rebuked the insolence of a foreign interference in our affairs by a public denunciation of its atrocity.

Mr. B. said the authentic testimonies which he had produced, and which established the great point of a foreign interference in our election, now gave him a right to introduce other evidence of a character not so high as the former, but perfectly admissible now that the main fact was established: he alluded to the newspaper press of Great Britain—the High Tory papers of that kingdom—which were much more direct and unreserved, more open and coarse in the expression of their sentiments than were the book and letters from which he had been quoting. These papers were as explicit as they were indecent in their denunciations of Democracy, in their praise of Federalism, in their wishes for the election of General Harrison, in their assumed knowledge of his sentiments, and in their directions and intimations to our Congress. From some of these he would read, and would show that the American nation was the subject of a degree of interference, and of insult, such as no other nation on the globe now received; and which would seem to say that some of these Editors had never yet heard of the American Revolution, and still considered these States as the dependent colonies of the British empire. Take, for example, this paragraph from the London Morning Chronicle of September last:

"At present Great Britain exercises a powerful influence over the social, political, and fiscal affairs of the United States. The dependence of the planters in the South, and the commercial men in the North, upon the British market, necessarily superinduces a desire for peace on their part, while it gives this country a large amount of control over the public decisions of those bodies. The ultra Republicans of the States do not relish this control. They see that it interposes a barrier against the working out of their Democratical principles."

Here is the direct and peremptory assertion of foreign influence—of control over public bodies—of opposition to Republicanism and Democracy. The assertion is too direct—the language too explicit—to require, or even to admit, of comment.

Take again this from the London Morning Post of June last;

"By the election of General Harrison the Whig candidate, and the rejection of Mr. Van Buren, the return of the Government to a sound and rational system of banking will follow as a matter of course; and possibly the United States Bank may once more find itself under the protection of a proper charter. The rejection of Mr. Van Buren will be decisive of the fate of the Sub-treasury scheme. That insane piece of legislation will be most assuredly knocked on the head, and we shall no longer hear of the pet banks, and the thousand other absurdities with which it is associated.

"We rejoice in the downfall of the visionary undertakings of the radical spirits and political economical coxcombs, whether they be of the old world or the new, and may, accordingly, congratulate the Americans on the prospects they have of getting rid of such quacks as Van Buren, 'Van' Jackson, and Mr. Amos Kendall."

Here, said Mr. B. is a glimpse of some of the fruits which the English capitalists expect to gather from the change of the American Executive. They expect the Bank of the United States to be rechartered—they expect the local banks to be freed from all restraint or subordination to law—they expect the balloon of paper credit to be again inflated—they expect the dead carcass of bank credit to be revived and reanimated—they expect State credit to be sustained—they expect paper dollars and shin plasters, post notes and broken bank notes, to constitute the currency of the United States, while our gold and silver goes to them: this is what they expect; and as the preliminary measure—as the first step towards all these English advantages, they expect that insane piece of legislation, called the Independent Treasury, to be knocked on the head. Yes, sir, knocked on the head! That is the command—the British order! Knock it on the head! Strike it on the forehead! Kill it, like a dog! Such is the order to the American Congress, which comes from the High Tory press of Great Britain!

Mr. President, continued Mr. B. you may recollect the part which it fell upon me to sustain during the revolt of the Bank of the United States against the country—during the veto—the panic—and the expunging sessions—and how I was accustomed to answer upon the spot all the speakers of the Opposition, replying, not only to their speeches generally, but to their arguments in detail. My friends were often surprised at the promptitude and fulness of these replies. They have often expressed astonishment at it; and now, sir, I can tell you how it happened. I always observed the instructions of the militia captain to his beginners in the manual exercise: I kept my eye upon the "fugleman!" I kept it upon the Bank press in Philadelphia. From that press I could always learn, before Congress met, what it was that Congress would be required to do—not only the thing itself which was required—but the mode of doing it, and all the arguments for it. These, I clipped from the papers, and laid by for use; and when the session came on, and the measures were moved, and the speeches delivered in favor of them, I was ready for action: I was ready for the reply. Thus I kept myself, semper paratus—always ready—during that long contest with the British power, impersonated in the mis-called Bank of the United States. That institution is as much British as ever, and more too. It is British in toto now; but it has managed too badly—sunk too low—done too much damage to its owners abroad—to be allowed any longer to take a lead in the British affairs in America; it is reduced to the condition of an organ and an instrument of the real power in London. It has sent its old cashier there. The supreme direction of affairs is called home—called back to London; and now it is in London that I shall look for future intimations of what is required to be done here. The High Tory press in London is the index which I shall watch. I shall still keep my eye upon the fugleman; but henceforth shall look for him, not in Philadelphia, but in London. This is what I shall do, and it is what I have already done, and with good effect. Look to the article which I have just read. Compare it with the movements here, and the very language which is used here, and the temper and spirit which is shown here: compare all together, and see how precisely the London High Tory press is an index to what we see and hear. It is an index, not only to the measures which are proposed, and the arguments used in support of them, but also to the spirit and language in which Democratic statesmen are mentioned. Look to the contemptuous and re-proachful epithets lavished upon the heads of our party—such radical coxcombs as Van Buren, Van Jackson and Amos Kendall: they are the counterpart of what are used here. I name them to show the identity of spirit between High Toryism in England and Federalism in America—to show the unrelenting vengeance of this spirit on both sides of the ocean—and that, even in retirement, our leading men cannot escape their insults and persecution. General Jackson is pursued to his fireside in Tennessee; Mr. Kendall is pursued into his private and modest retreat: no peace for them any where: the London papers, and the American orators, all at work upon them at once.

Mr. B. here paid a deserved compliment to Mr. Kendall, and remarked, as a proof of his integrity in the high office which he had filled, that all the great contractors were against him—that all, or nearly all, were reproaching and denouncing him. This was homage to his integrity: it was applause upon his administration. Contractors want bargains; great contractors want great bargains; they want a contract and a fortune together, and will praise any head of department who will gratify them in these wishes. To grant them rich contracts is to command their applause: to prefer the public interest to theirs, is to incur their censure. This censure, followed by unparalleled persecution, Mr. Kendall has received; and this fact is equivalent to the highest earthly proof in favor of his integrity. If any thing was wanting to complete the evidence, this clause from a London high Tory press supplies and furnishes it.

Mr. B. resumed his readings from London papers, and read from the London Times of September last, soon after the Maine election:

"Among their distinguished leaders may be ranked Governor Fairfield of Maine, whose fanaticism was countenanced, if not excited, by the President and his cabinet. But the sceptre has passed from Judah, and one of the beneficial results, it is hoped, will be a settlement of this vexed question. If it cannot be arranged without an appeal to arms, (which no rational man will believe), the sooner this fact is known the better. General Harrison will come into power with the most pacific views. He will be surrounded and sustained by men under the influence of similar sentiments."

Mr. B. said this was a most pregnant paragraph, and went beyond any that had been quoted. It went into the field of foreign politics, and rejoiced that a Democratic candidate for Governor was defeated—that the sceptre had departed from the land of Judah. Besides this, it goes into the sentiments of General Harrison—assumes to know his policy—his foreign policy—his policy in relation to England—and declares that to be pacific. Here, then, is an English High Tory editor assuming to know the sentiments of one of our candidates for the Presidency who would make no declaration of sentiments for the information of his own fellow-citizens. More than this: he assumes to know the Cabinet! to know the gentlemen who are to surround the General, and to sustain him! and that these gentlemen are under the influence of similar sentiments! that is to say, under the influence of a pacific policy towards England! This is really curious, and leads the mind back upon past events, as well as conducts it forward upon coming ones. The sentiments of a Presidential candidate, unknown here, to be known in London; the new Cabinet to be known there, before the election was over here; and the sentiments of this Cabinet declared to be favorable to English interests. These are curious revelations, and throws the mind back upon the voyage of a distinguished Federal gentleman from this country to England in 1839—his renunciation there of his canvass for the Presidency—his espousal of the cause of General Harrison—the immediate forthcoming of the whole British interest, political and pecuniary, in favor of the General—and the declarations from so many books, letters, and newspapers, that on his election depended the pacific settlement of the boundary question, the payment of the State debts, and the rise in value of all sorts of American stocks. The mind is forced back upon these recollections; and, while cautious justice may withhold a judgment, keen-eyed vigilance is required to be wide awake. The new Administration may be American, but thus far the signs are British.

Mr. B. would close his reading from British papers by giving a quotation from one since the election. It was from the London Morning Chronicle, and contained the British bill of indictment against Mr. Van Buren, and the congratulations of England upon the election of his competitor. Hear it:

"The election of General Harrison to the Presidency of the United States is an event deeply interesting to England.

"Mr. Van Buren was the deadly enemy of Great Britain. He stimulated the various crusades against puper money. He headed the conspiracies that were formed for the purpose of defrauding English creditors out of the debts due to them by America. He was the abettor of treason in Canada. He prompted resistance to the just claims of England in reference to the Northeastern boundary question.

"The sympathies of General Harrison point, we believe, in a direction the reverse of that to which the prejudices of Mr. Van Buren inclined.

"The election of General Harrison is, in short, a result on which England may congratulate herself."

Mr. B. would make no comment on this paragraph; and he begged not to be misunderstood. He was dealing with foreigners, not with his own fellow-citizens; he was discussing the question of their interference in our election, and for that purpose quoting their acts and words, and showing their hopes and fears. This was good evidence against them; it was authoritative against them, but it was not authoritative against our own citizens. They have a right to be tried upon their own merits—by their own acts and words; and, so far as I am concerned, they shall be so judged. The President elect shall be tried by his acts—not past, but future—his acts, from and after the 4th day of March next. I, for one, shall close my eyes upon all that friends or foes have said, and look to his acts; but the signs, it must be admitted, are any thing but auspicious.

Mr. B. was done with his quotations—done, for the present, with his production of evidence to establish a foreign interference in the late Presidential election. There was another large and distinct branch of the same subject, to which he would make no allusion now, but which he might explore on some future occasion. A few remarks on an incidental point, and he would conclude. It has been supposed, said Mr. B. that in alleging a foreign interference in our election, I was also alleging an application of foreign money to the voters, and accounting for the loss of the election by supposing that all these voters had been bribed. No such thing was said or intended—no such thing was thought or insinuated. I spoke of the interference; and not of its effect—its degree—or even its mode of operating. All this was opening a field which I did not choose to enter; but I am very ready to say, that the application of money to the mass of the voters, is not the way that the foreign moneyed power operates; that when money is applied at all, it is not to the mass, but to leading men, and confidential agents that it is delivered, and that in large sums. The mass are operated upon through the markets and the public intelligencers. Markets are reduced, times are made hard, the money market is tightened, the mass are distressed; and all these evils, they are taught to believe, flow from the misgovernment and misrule of those in power. This is the way a foreign moneyed power interferes in the affairs of a free State; and, unhappily, our affairs, our trade and currency, are in foreign hands—in English hands. An English minister once had the audacity to say to Europe that England held the tempests in her hand! The English capitalists may say to our America, without impudence, and with perfect truth, that they hold our finances in their hand! The baseness of our paper system—its dependence upon London—the fatal power of the Bank of the United States—an English institution—all place our currency, our business, our markets, our prosperity or misery, under British control. An order from London to the Bank of the United States to make money scarce or plenty—to suspend or resume—to ship gold to Europe, and inundate America with post notes and shillasters; an order of this kind is obeyed with the alacrity with which the slave obeys the master. An order from the same quarter to take part in the elections, is obeyed with the same alacrity. Some gentlemen say, and very truly, that the distress of the times has contributed to the result of the election. Very good! and where did that distress come from?

Whence came all the expansions and contractions, panic, and alarms, suspensions and non-resumptions, issues of base paper, gambling in cotton and stocks, exportation of specie, and all the other machinery of distress; whence came it but from the Bank of the United States? and what is that but a foreign institution? Others say that fraud, double voting, pipe laying, transfer of voters from one point to another, Hessians conducted by police officers and agents from city to city—that these have done much to carry the election. Very good! and where did all this fraud and villany come from? Where did it all originate? In the Bank of the United States! and what is that bank but an English institution? Others say that the public press, the travelling orators, and the emissaries, have done much of the mischief. Very good! And where did many of these receive their impulsion, and their reward? In this same Bank of the United States—a foreign institution. To this fountain all these causes are traced, so that in attributing the election to the distress of the times, or to the frauds, or to publications, it all comes to the same thing. They are all attributed to foreign interference.

Mr. B. believed that he had now justified the allusion which he had made a few days since to the subject of a foreign interference in our election, and his assertion that the change of the American Executive had been made a stock jobbing operation on the London exchange. He believed the proof to be full and complete to this point; and further than that, he did not propose to pursue the inquiry at present. He had shown the interference, and the object of the interference; and he had intimated that these foreigners were not going to content themselves with the barren honors of an election, a dance in a log cabin, and a view of the procession of the office holders going out, and the office seekers coming in. They would have something more substantial; and to the legislative power they would look for that something. In the autumn of the year 1839, these capitalists held a meeting in London, and adopted a resolution to send agents to the Legislatures of the States to press the measures which were necessary to the security of their debts. The resolution was adopted, but not acted upon. It was in these words: "That agents be sent to the State Legislatures to press the said Legislatures to appropriate funds to reduce the amount of their scrip, and establish sinking funds to secure the remainder." This resolution, though adopted, was not acted upon; and a change of direction in the labors of the agents seems to have been resolved upon. Instead of applying to the State Legislatures, the National Legislature seemed to become the authority to which application should be made for the payment of the State debts. On the 16th of October was written the famous letter to the Barings, telling them what they knew, that the States had capacity to contract debts, but also telling them that there was no way to compel the States to pay these debts. Two days thereafter, namely, on the 19th day of October, appeared the notorious London Bankers Circular, proposing the assumption or guarantee of these debts by the Federal Government, and on the appearance of that proposition here, the papers in the interest of the foreign organ—the United States Bank papers—not all, but most of them—immediately adopted and advocated the proposal. The non-assumption resolutions, submitted in this body at its first subsequent meeting, nipped this scheme in the bud. It killed up the scheme of open assumption, and knocked it on the head—as the Independent Treasury is to be knocked; and now it remains to be seen in what manner the British capitalists are to be gratified.

Open assumption being out of the question, disguised operations become the substitute: and this land distribution scheme, now called limited, becomes the first step in the unlimited succession of measures which are to end in the total loss of all the land revenue, in the final saddling of all the State debts on the broad back of the Federal Union, and in giving to the foreigner the double gratification of seeing our defences neglected, while our revenue is poured into his lap.

DISTRIBUTION—PROTECTIVE POLICY.

SPEECH OF MR. WRIGHT,

OF NEW YORK,

IN SENATE, January 21, 1841.

Mr. CRITTENDEN having addressed the Senate at much length, animadverting upon the measures of the present Administration—

Mr. WRIGHT said it would be unnecessary for him to say that he had not power to answer the remarks of the honorable Senator from Kentucky who had just taken his seat. [Mr. CRITTENDEN.] He (Mr. WRIGHT) had been too long there, and was too well known in that body, to attempt to follow the lively course of remark—the keen and cutting satire of the honorable Senator from Kentucky. His was a more plain and humble part—that of facts so far as he understood them, and of argument so far as he was able to bring arguments to bear on those facts. He confessed he was unexpectedly called upon to address the Senate in immediate reply to the Senator from Kentucky. The Senator on his right, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] to whom the appeal had been more particularly directed, had yielded the floor to him for a particular purpose, he not being prepared, as He (Mr. W.) was not, without examination into the facts, to answer the remarks which had been made on the subject of certain items of public expenditure.

He should discuss but one single topic, first briefly noticing, and very imperfectly, some of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Kentucky. But first it was due to himself that he (Mr. WRIGHT) should offer his humble apology for an interruption of the honorable Senator, not that it was noticed by the Senate, but because it was discourteous on his part. Still it was a compliment to the gentleman's powers as a debater, for it was an interruption which nothing could have drawn from him but the rapidity and force with which he was rushing to conclusions calculated to carry his hearers along with him, and to lead the Senate, as Mr. WRIGHT thought, to erroneous impressions upon the points he was discussing. Hence the interruption, for which he sincerely asked his pardon.

[Mr. CRITTENDEN courteously remarked, in an under tone, that apology was wholly unnecessary.]

Mr. WRIGHT continued. The honorable Senator then told the friends of the present Administration, they had attempted to sneer at the now dominant party. Now, if he had said or done any thing which should seem to have given the honorable Senator just cause for such an imputation, he had said and done what he had not intended to say or do. He (Mr. WRIGHT) now stood in a minority in the country, and he had been called upon, on various occasions, since the meeting of the Senate, to say that he desired to demean himself, with all becoming modesty and humility, in that unfortunate condition; but yet he might say to the honorable Senator, while that honorable gentleman was presenting to them 1,200,000 votes on his side, as too large a body to be sneered at, that 1,100,000 freemen, as a minority, might look and smile, though they should not sneer. He admitted that the Administration, which was to come in on the 4th of March next, came in by a vastly larger vote than any which had preceded it; and he would tell those gentlemen—and he did it with feelings of kindness—that they came in, in the face of a minority, in numbers and proportion, much more powerful than any previous Administration ever yet met. Let, then, on all hands, the admonition of the honorable Senator be looked to; for while it does not belong to the minority to sneer, the majority have not advantage enough to swagger. The great sea of public opinion cannot bear deep agitation, without some danger of a change of power, when the difference between the contending parties is so small, and a change of ten per cent. may easily be wrought against him who dares excite this immense mass of mind, even upon the surface. Let all, then, look well and carefully to their measures and to their policy. He took the reproof, or desired to do so, with which the honorable Senator had favored himself and party; and he would be very glad to profit by it. At the same time he wished to impress the honorable Senator and his friends with the palpable truth that a strong party must do right, or be overthrown. He appeals to the public judgment of the freemen of the country. Mr. Wright cheerfully acknowledged the propriety of the tribunal, and its perfect jurisdiction, while he believed the representatives of majorities might be sometimes wrong, and that constituent majorities were easily changed by over confidence on the part of their representatives, and by consequent measures having more reference to interests and classes than to our entire constituency.

Another position of the Senator, in the course of his interesting argument, was that they (the present majority) "as a dying party, upon the last stage of their condemned term," were endeavoring to do—what? To occupy the ground of the future Administration, and to forestall its measures. Was that so? Had the history of this very short period, in which they had had the pleasure of sitting together, warranted such a charge? They had, it was true, introduced the measure under discussion—a pre-emption bill—a prospective pre-emption; and this, it was true, in that respect, was a novel feature in a settled policy of the retiring Administration. What were the great measures of policy, as he believed—for no man could speak with any certainty on the subject—which were looked to by the whole country as the measures of the coming in Administration? A destruction of the system of finance of the present Administration, was, he supposed the most prominent. Were they (the present Administration) responsible for presenting that? He knew the other honorable Senator from Kentucky would discharge them from such an accusation, for he would feel honored in acknowledging that he had himself called upon them (the present majority) to undo what, with intentions as pure to their country as those which govern the gentleman opposite, they had done. He (Mr. Wright) complained not; yet surely they ought not to be charged with attempting to forestall the measures of the coming in Administration. Thus far, the resolution to repeal the law establishing an Independent Treasury for the country, was thrust upon them almost as soon as they were in their seats, and from one of the great leaders of the opposition to that strictly constitutional and truly republican measure.

Next as to this proposed distribution to the States of the proceeds of the public lands. Was not that looked upon every where as one of those measures which would be favorite and prominent with the coming in Administration, and as a measure against which the existing Administration was known to have sustained an immovable opposition? Were they then to be charged—and he would observe, if he should appear to speak warmly, that he spoke with no unkindness—were they to be charged with bringing this measure before the Senate, and, by acting upon it, with forestalling the measures and policy of the new Administration? Certainly not. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] would concede that it was through his agency, and not through the agency of any friend of the present Administration, that this question has been forced on this body, and calls for its action and its judgment.

Taking the facts, then, as they stood, were the friends of the Administration chargeable with forestalling the policy of the triumphant Administration which was now so near? It had seemed to him that they were not. There were many other remarks of the honorable Senator which he might notice, but he would return to the question before the Senate, for the purpose of discussing briefly the single point which had called him to the floor.

The proposition before the Senate was to recommend the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, which had reported it, with instructions to report a bill to provide for the distribution of the proceeds of those lands to the States, as a part of the instructions proposed. The point he wished now to discuss related to this part of the instructions; and although, at the commencement of the debate, he had proposed to himself to discuss this whole subject of distribution, his present intention was to examine one single ground upon which the policy of distribution was urged.

He had been persuaded to take this course, at this time, because he had seen the short period which remained for the transaction of business during the present session of Congress, the press of business to be done, and the great anxiety of the peculiar friends of the pre-emption bill for its passage.

This should control his present action; but if the debate should take a different direction, or if he should retain a seat in the Senate, and a future occasion should arise, in consequence of a future prosecution of this policy, he might then claim the privilege of giving his sentiments at large upon the proposed measure in all its aspects.

At the present time he would consider but one of the arguments by which it was supported in the country, and in the minds of a portion of the constituency of the present Congress. He referred to its connection with what is familiarly known as the tariff, or the protective policy of the country. It must be known to many of the members of the two Houses of Congress, that with a large portion of the people of the New England States, and he believed the same thing was true as to portions of his own and other States, this policy of the distribution of the proceeds of the lands was popular, not so much from any love to the appropriation and application of these proceeds, as from a wish to have that amount, whatever it might be, subtracted from the Treasury, that there might be an occasion to increase the duties on imports to an equal amount. This idea, if indeed it did prevail in the tariff States, must, it would be seen at once, rest upon the supposition that the more duties there were imposed upon imports, the more protection must be afforded to domestic manufactures or products, coming in competition with the imports thus burdened with duty. Is this a sound inference? He was aware the inquiry was addressed to those Senators who represented States favoring the protective policy. He was not sure the position was sound or practical, but it seemed to him to be both. He was also sensible that it might, at the first impression, strike the minds of the Senators from the anti-tariff States as being an argument, if it had any force, in favor of the policy of the distribution. He entreated all to listen to the suggestions, and to take time to weigh them well, before they should be made the foundation of official action upon either side of this important question.

When, then, does a duty commence to be protective? Is it so either to our manufacturer or our producer, while the foreigner has the entire and exclusive possession of our market, for the sale of his manufactured article, or foreign production? All would say no. The duty, under such a state of things, might fill the public Treasury, but it could not, in any possible sense, protect any domestic interest. The operation of the tariff of duties must commence to be exclusive and prohibitory before it can begin to be protective. It must, to some extent, shut the foreigner from our market, and open it to the domestic manufacturer and producer, before its protective features can be at all valuable; and when this process once commences, the farther it is carried in its exclusive and prohibitory action, the more protective is the tariff under which it takes place.

But what may be the effect upon the revenue, of this protective action? In the precise proportion in which it is exclusive and prohibitory, it must diminish the revenue upon imports. In other words, as far as any tariff shall be protective in its action and effect, just so far it must be a tariff not the most perfectly fitted for the purposes of revenue. That tariff which is best adapted to the purposes of revenue, by itself considered, must be that which promotes the greatest amount of importations and the greatest amount of revenue combined. That tariff which is best adapted to the reasonable purposes of protection is the one which shall place American and foreign interests of the same character upon a par in our own markets, and this is the least which the tariff interests can desire.

Try, then, the policy of this measure with these interests. It is now proposed to separate from the Treasury, to give away, the revenue from the lands, our principal source of internal revenue, and that for the purpose of affording an opportunity to impose higher duties where protection is desired. This is acting upon the principle, not simply that the higher the duty the greater will be the protection, but also that the higher the rate of duty the greater will be the amount of revenue received. A single reflection will convince any one that this will be true only while the foreigner has the exclusive possession of the market, and, by necessary consequence, the duty is not protective at all. If the high rate begins to exclude the foreigner and let our own produce or manufactures compete with him in the market, the question of revenue immediately becomes incidental, and its amount will depend, regardless of the rate of duty, upon the advantage which the state of trade and of the market gives to the foreign, or the domestic parties, at any given period. If the protective influence shall predominate, the foreigner will be driven from the market and the revenue will fail. How, then, is it to be supplied? Most clearly, if import be the only resort, by a reduction of the rate of duty, until the foreigner can again come into the domestic market, upon grounds of advantageous competition. In other words, by taking from the tariff its protective and giving it a revenue preponderance. Can there be a doubt that this must be the principle of action in all such legislation?

How, then, is the principle of protection to be preserved consistently with its action? By giving away, or destroying, all our sources of internal revenue, and making our Treasury wholly dependent upon imports? Or by fostering and preserving every source of internal revenue, so far as the state of the Treasury will permit, that when our tariff for revenue shall, by the course of trade, or exchange, or national policy, become protective, we may preserve it so, and not be compelled to reduce our rates of duty, to invite the foreigner into our markets, to undersell our own citizens; that our Treasury may be sustained from the duty to be imposed upon the importations?

The proposition now under consideration is to give away to the States, to take from the National Treasury, our richest source of internal revenue, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, an amount of from three and a half to four millions of dollars annually, and to throw that Treasury exclusively upon a revenue from customs for dependence and support. This, too, is proposed to be done at a time when the whole revenue from lands and customs is not equal to the payment of the ordinary expenses of the Government. And why is this strange policy to be adopted? Why is this most stable source of revenue to be cut off, and given away in gratuities, when we are borrowing money to pay the expenses of the nation?

Among other grounds assigned for the strange policy, one is that he had mentioned—to favor the protective policy, by making the occasion for increased duties upon imports. Could it be necessary for him to say more to show that this ground was not sustainable?—that this policy would be suicidal to the interests it was advocated to protect? It seemed to him not. The proposition was too plain to admit of amplification. Duties, to be protective, must be, to a greater or less extent, exclusive and prohibitory; must have a tendency rather to diminish than to increase revenue, by giving a fair portion of the market to domestic products and manufactures to the exclusion of foreign; and when there is a deficiency of revenue from imports under such a system, it must be supplied from internal sources, or the protection must be surrendered, the duties reduced, greater advantages given to the foreigner in our market, and the importations be thus increased. Under our system, the internal sources of revenue are the proceeds of the lands, excise, and direct taxation. Give away the former, and who expects a Congress will ever be found to resort to either of the latter to raise revenue, when it can be raised by duties on imports? Who will believe that excise, or direct taxation, will ever be imposed to save a protective tariff? No man acquainted with the feelings of the people, or the action of legislative bodies elected by the people, would indulge such a hope.

Our sources of internal revenue then, which do not spring from taxation, must be preserved and fostered, or a protective policy cannot be independently pursued.

Take the articles of wool and woollens, the great Northern and Eastern interests. So regulate the tariff that American wool holds the market against the foreign article, and that American cloths can enter into the consumption of the country in fair competition with the foreign, and then experience, as at this time, a deficiency of revenue, that arising from an immense public domain having been taken from the Treasury, and given to the States. What are you to do. Will higher duties produce more revenue? Not in the case supposed; for when the competition is even, or balancing in favor of the domestic interests, more duties will be prohibition; and while protection may be rendered perfect by such legislation, all revenue will be lost. You must reduce the duty, then, and thus invite importations to raise your revenue, and having no other resource, the policy would be compulsory.

It is a mistake, then, to assume that this measure will necessarily favor the protected interests and the protective policy. It may injure both. It is a mistake to suppose that forcing the Treasury to an exclusive dependence upon revenue from imports, will secure the system of protection. It may destroy it. The Treasury of the nation must be supplied; and if such imports as are consistent with the system of protection do not yield the requisite revenue, the protection must be yielded to the necessity for revenue.

There is another consideration growing out of the policy of making the Treasury dependent upon a revenue from imports alone, which deserves the serious examination of all, before it shall be adopted as the policy for our country. Where will rest the control, both as to our supply of revenue and the protection of our domestic interests, under such a policy? Will it be in the hands of Congress, or in foreign hands? Congress can invite, but Congress cannot compel importations. Those great interests which regulate the trade of the world govern our importations; and they are, at all times, subject to the influences of foreign interests and foreign policy, as well as our own. Make the Treasury of the nation exclusively dependent upon these importations, and it too must be equally in subjection to the same influences. The protective features of our tariff become, in their operation, injurious to some important interest of a country with which our trade is extensive, and produce a desire on the part of that country to change our rates of duty. Our Treasury is solely dependent upon revenue from imports, and by consequence proportionably dependent upon importations from the country in question. It stops its trade with us. Our revenue falls off, and our Treasury is made empty, while we are told, reduce your rates of duty, and the suspended trade shall be renewed and extended. Can Congress regulate this attempt to control our policy by a foreign power? By a countervailing policy it can; but that will not produce revenue, or fill our Treasury; and, if our sources of internal revenue be destroyed, or given away, can only be adopted and sustained by a resort to direct taxation. What, in such a case, would be likely to be done? Would our system of protection be adhered to, or our duties be reduced? If we have the land revenue to supply the Treasury, the countervailing policy will be likely to govern us; but if it is to be resorted to, at the expense of direct taxation, protection will be very sure to be yielded, and the Treasury supplied by a reduction of our rates of duty. In short, if we place our Treasury in a condition to be exclusively dependent upon customs, our policy must be to invite importations, to burden them as lightly as possible, lest they are turned into other channels, to make the trade of foreigners with us as profitable as possible, that they may consent, through its means, to supply our Treasury.

Can considerations such as these fail to convince the tariff interests in our country that they are not fostered by giving away our sources of internal revenue, and forcing ourselves into a state of entire dependence upon foreign trade for the supply of our National Treasury? It seemed to him not.

Nor could this view of the operation of this distribution, properly considered, render the measure, or the policy, more acceptable to the anti-tariff interests. They desire the least possible amount of duties consistent with a healthful and certain revenue, and it is admitted, on all hands, that the distribution to the States of the land revenue will produce the instant necessity of an increase of duties to the full extent of the money taken from the Treasury for distribution. Whatever, therefore, may be the effect upon the protective policy, the influence of the measure upon the free trade principle cannot be equivocal.

These suggestions had been hastily and crudely given, and yet he hoped he had sufficiently developed his views to enable the members of the Senate to understand him. It was to them he desired to address himself upon this point. They would reflect upon the ideas he had thrown out, and he knew they would allow them all the weight they deserved, if indeed they should be found to deserve any.

He would take up but a very few moments more of their time in briefly replying to some other observations of the Senator from Kentucky. If he understood that honorable Senator—and he begged him to believe that he did not wish to misunderstand him—he said that the present Administration had spent 135 millions of dollars in the four years of its term; and that upon roads, harbors, canals, ships, fortifications, &c. there had been expended but nine millions of dollars.

He (Mr. WRIGHT) had not the means at hand to examine this matter, but he believed in the four years they had been in the habit of passing bills annually for fortifications of from a half to a million of dollars—for the navy of from five to six millions, including a permanent appropriation of half a million to be exclusively expended for the increase of the navy, separate from the support, repairs, and the like, as well as sundry large appropriations for steam ships—for harbors large appropriations, nearly annually, if not entirely so; though for roads and canals he was happy to know little or nothing had been done, because he considered all such expenditures by this Government wrong in principle and impolitic in practice.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said, in justice to himself, he should explain, that he did not include the repairing of ships, and the pay of the officers and the men, but the mere building of ships.

Mr. WRIGHT had understood the Senator to speak simply of the ships, and not of the pay, but he supposed he had intended to include rebuilding repairs, and similar expenditures.

Well, then, the Senator said there were some one hundred and twenty-six millions of dollars which had been expended within four years, and how expended? Why, expended in pursuance of appropriations made by themselves (Congress,) and for that whole period they had had the honorable Senator's watchfulness and guardian care over them, constantly; and he believed he did that honorable Senator no injustice when he said, that if he had seemed to feel more dissatisfied at one time than another with the votes of him, (Mr. WRIGHT,) it was when he voted against appropriations. Still he admitted there might have been abuses practised in expenditures—he was not prepared to say there had not been; but he said cheerfully—what the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] said yesterday—he challenged investigation, not in a spirit of triumph, but with a patriotic feeling towards the country and its interests. If there had been abuse, let exposure and punishment be visited upon the guilty; on him, if he were the man; on his best friend; on any man, whoever he might be, in this vast nation, who had embezzled the public money, who had squandered it improperly, or who had been unfaithful in a pecuniary trust. He again said examine, but examine with justice and truth. That was all the favor he asked; and he now appealed to that great party, for some of the members of which he cherished a feeling bordering on friendship, to do to their opponents justice—to tell the truth of them—and to punish them only when they should be found, after careful and fair examination, to deserve it. The papers and records were soon to pass into their hands, and the means for investigation would be ample. Let not the desire to find fault be paramount to the obligations of truth and justice.

Another subject has given employment to the honorable Senator's talent for satire in no stinted measure. He referred to the Senator's sedentary army of militia, which the President is said to have organized, to prosecute the Indian war in Florida.

Previous to the late elections, the honorable Senator and his party told a very different story, touching the military designs and propensities of the President. Then his purpose was a "standing army" of 200,000 men—militia, it is true—to be used, not to subdue the murderous Seminole, but to prostrate the liberties of this free country, to break down the Constitution and the Union, and establish a military despotism upon the ruins.

He (Mr. WRIGHT) could not forget this startling ground of the Opposition during the late contest, because he had then, as now, constantly found himself contending upon this point before meetings of the people, and then, as now too, as the result had proved, contending against antagonists who were more than a match for him. Then the President was a fearful despot, a tyrant, and through the instrumentality of our neighbors, our friends, our fathers, brothers, sons, the militia of the country, converted into a standing army, not of regular soldiers, with their permanent officers, but of militia, was to destroy the liberties of this our beloved land, and to rule our sixteen millions of people as a military despot, supported and sustained by these 200,000 citizen soldiers!

What is the President now? In what frightful aspect does the Senator present him to the country on this day? As imbecile in the extreme; as to terminate an Indian war of some four or five years' duration, which has baffled the efforts of our whole gallant little army for that entire period, by means of a sedentary army of six hundred men. A corps of sedentary militia of that formidable number.

Of one thing he (Mr. WRIGHT) hoped he might now assure himself, and that was that this new army of six hundred sitting men would not frighten from their propriety the great party of which the honorable Senator was so distinguished a member, nor render them inconveniently uneasy in regard to the safety of the liberties of the country; most especially so when a few weeks must terminate the command of their present chieftain.

Look at these positions. That man who, on the first days of November, was to cleave down the liberty of the people by a standing army of militia, was now, in January, to defend the country by 600 men, whose duty it was to sit, not stand, and who were limited to an employment within twenty miles from the place on which they set. Now he thought there was a little extravagance in all this; and he could not believe, after all, that there would, thereby, be much added to the expenses of the Government.

Mr. CRITTENDEN read the order of General Reed, to which he had referred, but the Reporter could not obtain a copy. Of the authority of the order, Mr. C. said, he knew nothing. It had been placed in his hands, and was a publication from a newspaper.

Mr. WRIGHT had only referred to the matter, because it had been introduced by the honorable Senator. He thought it wholly irrelevant to the subject before the Senate, and was not disposed to consume further time about it. What he had learned from the remarks of the gentleman, and the extract he had read from an unknown authority, constituted the whole of his information upon the subject. He had never before heard of even the existence of this militia force, this sitting army; and he certainly did not desire to extend remarks upon a subject about which he knew nothing.

A word upon another subject. The honorable Senator complained that there had been a wanton expenditure of money for supplies for the army in Florida and the Creek and Cherokee countries, that provisions had been purchased for high prices, which were not used; and that they had been sold at public auction for low prices. These might be facts. The Senator read from a printed document which he [Mr. WRIGHT] had never seen, but which he presumed was good authority for his positions. Did it follow, however, that the present President was in fault in the matter? Did it follow, by necessity, that any person was in fault; and if any person, would it not be more just to state who was the officer in command, who had charge of the purchases spoken of, and under what public agent the property had been thus sacrificed?

There had been a period in our history, if he was not mistaken as to facts, when provisions purchased for the use of our armies, at a dearer rate even than those referred to by the Senator, had been piled together and burned, to furnish light for a distinguished retreating General from a retreating enemy; and yet, neither the General, nor the Administration under which he served, was condemned either for the military achievement, or the loss of the public property. This did not take place, as his memory told him, upon the Southwestern, but upon the Northwestern frontier, and not during the Florida war, but the war with England of 1812-15.

Had the officer in charge of this property in the Indian country pursued this course; had he, instead of his auction sale, burned the supplies, and made a precipitate retreat, the Administration he served, as well as himself, might have been spared these sharp censures. He however, as Mr. WRIGHT believed, had accomplished the duty assigned to him, and was ready to dismiss his force to their homes, so far as they were militia, and to other service so far as they were regulars, and the supplies not being wanted at the station where they were, and transportation being the principal ingredient of their cost, he took, whether wisely or not, the expedient of a public sale at auction, rather than that of a second transportation. If the prices paid at the sale were low, the loss was the greater, but it was not a total loss, nor was the property consumed to furnish a light, not for a pursued, but retreating general. He thought, therefore, he was authorized to say that if the entire public loss in the one case was not cause for censure upon the general, but rather for his greater elevation, the partial loss in the other could not be a broad ground for the sweeping condemnation of a whole Administration.

CESSION AND DISTRIBUTION BILLS.

SPEECH OF MR. CALHOUN.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

In Senate, January 23, 1841.—On the amendment proposed by Mr. CRITTENDEN to the pre-emption bill, to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the States.

Mr. CALHOUN said that the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN] to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, was no stranger in this chamber. His colleague [Mr. CLAY] had introduced it many years since, when he was in the Opposition, and had often pressed its passage as an Opposition measure, and once with success, while the Treasury was groaning under the weight of a surplus revenue, of which Congress was willing to free it on almost any terms. It was then vetoed by General Jackson, and has had to contend ever since against the resistance of his and the present Administration.

But it is now, for the first time, introduced under different auspices, not as an Opposition, but an Administration measure—a measure of the coming Administration, if we may judge from indications that can scarcely deceive. It is brought in by a Senator, who, if rumor is to be credited, is selected as a member of the new cabinet, [Mr. CRITTENDEN] backed by another in the same condition, [Mr. WEBSTER] supported by a third, [Mr. CLAY] who, all know, must exercise a controlling influence over that Administration. It is then fair to presume, that it is not only a measure, but a leading measure of General Harrison's administration, pushed forward in advance of his inauguration by those who have the right of considering themselves his organs on this floor. Regarded in this light, it acquires a vastly increased importance—so much so as to demand the most serious and deliberate consideration. Under this impression I have carefully re-examined the measure, and have been confirmed in the opinion previously entertained, that it is perfectly unconstitutional, and pregnant with the most disastrous consequences; and what I now propose is to present the result of my reflection under each of these views, beginning with the former.

Whether the Government can constitutionally distribute the revenue from the public lands among the States, must depend on the fact, whether they belong to them in their united Federal character, or individually and separately. If in the former, it is manifest that the Government, as their common agent or trustee, can have no right to distribute among them for their individual, separate use, a fund derived from property held in their united and Federal character, without a special power for that purpose, which is not pretended. A position so clear of itself, and resting on the established principles of law, when applied to individuals holding property in like manner, needs no illustration. If, on the contrary, they belong to the States in their individual and separate character, then the Government would not only have the right, but would be bound to apply the revenue to the separate use of the States. So far is incontrovertible, which presents the question, in which of the two characters are the lands held by the States?

To give a satisfactory answer to this question, it will be necessary to distinguish between the lands that have been ceded by the States, and those that have been purchased by the Government, out of the common funds of the Union.

The principal cessions were made by Virginia and Georgia; the former of all the tract of country between the Ohio, the Mississippi and the lakes, including the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, and the Territory of Wisconsin; and the latter of the tract included in Alabama and Mississippi. I shall begin with the cession of Virginia, as it is on that the advocates for distribution mainly rely to establish the right.

I hold in my hand an extract of all that portion of the Virginia deed of cession, which has any bearing on the point at issue, taken from the volume lying on the table before me, with the place marked, and to which any one desirous of examining the deed may refer. The cession is "to the United States in Congress assembled, for the benefit of said States." Every word implies the States in their united Federal character. That is the meaning of the phrase United States. It stands in contradistinction to the States taken separately and individually, and if there could be, by possibility, any doubt on that point, it would be removed by the expression "in Congress assembled"—an assemblage which constituted the very knot that united them. I regard the execution of such a deed, in such an assemblage, to the United States so assembled, so conclusive, that the cession was to them in their united and aggregate character, in contradistinction to their individual and separate character, and by necessary consequence, the lands so ceded belonged to them in their former and not in their latter character, that I am at a loss for words to make it clearer. To deny it, would be to deny that there is any truth in language.

But as strong as this is, it is not all. The deed proceeds and says that all the lands so ceded, "shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become members of the Confederation, or Federal alliance of said States, Virginia inclusive," and concludes by saying "and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use and purpose whatever." If it were possible to raise a doubt before, these full, clear, and explicit terms would dispel it. It is impossible for language to be clearer. To be "considered a common fund," an expression directly in contradistinction to separate or individual, and is by necessary implication as clear a negative of the latter, as if it had been positively expressed. This common fund to "be for the use and benefit of such of the United States, as have become or shall become members of the Confederation or Federal alliance;" that is as clear as language can express it for their common use in their united Federal character, Virginia being included as the grantor, out of abundant caution.

[Here Mr. CLAY said in an audible voice; there were other words not cited. To which Mr. CALHOUN replied:]

I am glad to hear the Senator say so, as it shows, not only that he regards the expressions cited standing alone, as clearly establishing what I contended for, but on what he relies to rebut my conclusion. I shall presently show, that the expression to which he refers will utterly fail him. The concluding words are, "shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that use, and no other use and purpose whatever." For that use—that is, the common use of the States, in their capacity of members of the Confederation or Federal alliance—and no other; positively forbidding to use the fund to be derived from the lands for the separate use of the States, or to be distributed among them for their separate or individual use, as proposed by this amendment, as it is possible for words to do. So far, all doubt would seem to be excluded.

But there are other words to which the Senator refers, and on which the advocates of the measure vainly rely to establish the right. After asserting that it shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of the States that are or shall become members of the Confederation or Federal alliance, Virginia inclusive, it adds, "according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure." Now, I assert, if these words were susceptible of a construction that the fund was intended for the separate and individual use and benefit of the States—which I utterly deny—yet it would be contrary to one of the fundamental rules of construction to give them that meaning. I refer to the well known rule, that doubtful expressions, in a grant or other instrument, are not to be so construed as to contradict what is clearly and plainly expressed—as would be the case in this instance, if they should be so construed as to mean the separate and individual use and benefit of the States severally. But they are not susceptible of such construction. Whatever ambiguity may be supposed to attach to them, will be readily explained by reference to the history of the times. The cession was made under the old Articles of Confederation, according to which the general or common fund of the Union was raised, not by taxation on individuals, as at present, but by requisition on the States, proportioned among them according to the assessed value of their improved lands. An account had, of course, to be kept between each State and the common treasury; and these words were inserted simply to direct that the funds from the ceded lands were to be credited to States according to the proportion they had to contribute to the general or common fund respectively, in order, if not enough should be received from the lands, to meet their contribution, they should be debited with the deficit; and if more than sufficient, credited with the excess in making the next requisition. The expression can have no other meaning; and so far from countenancing the construction, that the common fund from the lands should be applied to the separate use of the States, it expressly provides how it shall be credited to the confederated or allied States, in their account current with the general or common fund of that Confederacy. The opposite interpretation would imply the most palpable contradiction and absurdity.

But it is asked, what would have to be done if their had been a permanent surplus? Such a case was scarcely supposable, with the heavy debt of the Revolution, and the small yield from the land at the time; but if it had occurred, it would have been an unforeseen contingency, to be provided for by the United States, to whom the fund belonged, and not by Congress, as its agent, or trustee, for its management.

That this expression was intended merely to direct how the account should be kept, and not to make that the separate property of the States individually, which had been declared, in the most emphatic manner, to belong to them, and to be used by them, as a common fund, in their united federal character, we would have the most conclusive proof, if what has been stated already was not so, in the fact that, in the deeds of cession from all the other States, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, North Carolina, and South Carolina, these words are omitted.

As to the cession from Georgia, it is impossible that there should be two opinions about it. It was made under the present Government, and in the very words of the Virginia cession, excepting the words, "according to their usual respective proportion in the general charge and expenditure." The omission, while the other portion was exactly copied, is significant. The old system of requisition on the States to supply the common treasury, under the Articles of Confederation, had been superseded by taxes laid directly on the people, under the present Government, and it was no longer necessary to provide for the mode of keeping the account, and for that reason was omitted. But the cession by Georgia was, in reality, a purchase. The United States has paid full consideration for the land, including the expense of extinguishing the Indian titles, and other charges; and of course the portion of the public domain acquired from that State may be fairly considered as standing on the same principle, as far as the present question is concerned, as that purchased from foreign powers.

So undeniable is the conclusion that the lands ceded by the States were ceded to them in their united and aggregate character as a Federal community, and not in their separate and individual, that the Senator from Massachusetts was forced to admit, if I understood him correctly, (and if not, I wish to be corrected,) that they were so ceded in the first instance, but only for the purpose of paying the public debt, and that on its final discharge, the lands became the separate property of the States. This, sir, is a perfectly gratuitous assumption on the part of the Senator, and is directly opposed by the deeds of cession, which expressly provide that it shall be a common fund for the use and benefit of the States in their united and Federal character, without restriction to the public debt, or limitation in point of time, or any other respects. This bold and unwarranted assertion may be regarded as an implied acknowledgment on his part of the truth of the construction for which I contend, and on which the Government has ever acted, but now attempted to be changed on a false assumption.

The residue of the public lands, including Florida and all the region beyond the Mississippi, extending to the Pacific Ocean, and constituting by far the greater part, stands on a different footing. They were purchased out of the common funds of the Union, collected by taxes, and belong, beyond all question, to the people of the United States in their federal and aggregate capacity. This has not been, and cannot be denied; and yet it is proposed to distribute the common fund derived from the sales of these, as well as from the ceded lands, in direct violation of the admitted principle that the agent or trustee of a common concern has no right, without express authority, to apply the joint funds to the separate use and benefit of its individual members.

But setting aside the constitutional objection, as conclusive as it is, I ask what consideration of expediency—what urgent necessity—is there for the adoption, at this time, of a measure so extraordinary as a surrender to the States, for their individual use, of the important portion of the revenue derived from the public domain, which, it is probable, will not fall short, on an average of the next ten years, of five millions of dollars? Is the Treasury now burdened with a surplus, far beyond the wants of the Government, for which all are anxious to devise some measure of relief, as was the case when the Senator introduced and passed his scheme of distribution formerly? On the contrary, is it not in the very opposite condition—one of exhaustion, with a deficit, according to the statement of that Senator, and those who act with him, of many millions of dollars? And is not the revenue still declining, so that in a short time the present deficit will be double? To take a broader view, I would ask, is the condition of the country less unfavorable to the adoption of the measure than the state of the Treasury? Is there an individual capable of taking a comprehensive view of our foreign relations at this moment, who does not see the imperious necessity of applying every dollar that can be spared to guard against coming dangers, more especially on that element where a revolution so extraordinary is going on, by the all-powerful agency of steam, both as to the means of attack and defence?

If, then, the state of the Treasury and the condition of the country so urgently demand the retention of this important branch of revenue, for the common use and objects for which the Government was created, what possible motives can impel those who are shortly to be charged with its administration, to bring forward, at such a period, the extraordinary proposition to take from the necessities of the Treasury and the country so large a sum, to be distributed among the States for their separate and individual use? To this question but one answer has been or can be given—that many of the States want the money. They have contracted debts for their own individual and local purposes, beyond their ordinary means, and which the dominant party in those States are unwilling to meet by raising taxes on their own people, for fear of being turned out of power. The result has been a loss of credit, followed by a depreciation of their bonds, held by rich capitalists at home and abroad. The immediate object of this scheme is to raise the credit of the indebted States by distributing the revenue from the lands; that is, to surrender about one-fourth of the permanent revenue of the Union, and that the most certain, to enhance the value of the State bonds, now greatly depressed, because some of the indebted States do not choose to raise, by taxes on their own people, the means of paying their own debts. To have a true conception of the whole case, it must be borne in mind that these bonds were taken by the capitalists on this and the other side of the Atlantic on speculation, in the regular course of business, as a profitable investment, and many of them, at great depreciation; and that the demand on the common Treasury is substantially to make good, not only their losses, but to enable them to realize their anticipated profits. Such is the object.

We are thus brought to the question, in what manner is this deficit of at least five millions to be supplied? By taxes—additional taxes on the commerce of the country, preparing the way for still higher by combining the indebted States with the tariff interest, to impose heavier burdens on that important but oppressed branch of industry. Wines and silks are to be selected, under the plea of taxing luxury; and much manœuvring has been resorted to in order to enlist the tobacco interest in favor of the tax, with, I fear, too much success. They are, I admit, fair objects of taxation, and ought to bear their due proportion of the public burden. I am prepared to act on that opinion when the tariff comes up for revision, as it must, at the next session. I go farther: Fix the amount which the just and necessary wants of Government may require, including the revenue from the lands, and I will cheerfully agree to lay as much on luxuries as gentlemen will agree to reduce on necessities. It is my favorite system, and I am prepared to go as far as any one in that direction. But I shall not agree to impose a cent on luxuries, or necessities, on the rich or poor, to pay the debts for which this Government is in no way responsible, and which we cannot pay without a palpable violation of the Constitution, and gross injustice to the great body of the community. I was struck with the fact, that, while the Senator [Mr. WEBSTER] held out at one moment that the duties on wines and silks would fall on the consumers, and, by consequence, on the rich, in the very next he informed us that they would not rise in price in consequence of the duties, and, of course, they would entirely escape from them. To prove that they would not increase in price in consequence of the duties, he assumed, as a principle, that where one country is the principal producer of certain articles, as France was of wine and silks, and another a principal consumer of them, as the United States were, a duty imposed on them by the latter would have the effect, not of raising the price in the country where it was laid, but to reduce it where they were produced; that is, to reduce it in France, and not to raise it in the United States.

Now, I put it to the Senator, whether the loss, taking his own conclusion, could fall on the French producers of wines and silks, without, in its reaction, falling also on the American producers of the products given in exchange for them—that is, the growers of tobacco, rice, and cotton, which furnish almost exclusively the means of payment? Is it not clear, if they cannot sell as high or as much to us, in consequence of the duties, that we in turn cannot sell as high or as much to them in consequence of the fall of price on their products? Their loss must be followed by ours; and it follows, according to the Senator's own reasoning, that the five millions, which is proposed to be raised by duties, to make good the deficit caused by the distribution, would be filched from the pockets of the honest and industrious producers of our great staples, and not, as alleged by the Senator, from the wealthy consumers of wines and silks. It is out of their hard earnings that the means must be raised to enhance the value of the bonds of the States in the hands of foreign capitalists. The Senator must surely hold in low estimation the intelligence and spirit of the Southern planter, in supporting such a proposition.

But I take still stronger grounds. The necessary effect of all duties is to diminish the imports; and the consequence of diminishing the imports is to diminish, in the same proportion, the exports. Imports and exports are dependent each on the other. If there can be no imports, there can be no exports; and if there be no exports, there can be no imports. The exports pay for the imports, and the imports for the exports—the one always implies the other. So, if the imports are limited in amount, the exports must be limited, when fairly estimated to the same amount, and vice versa. But the effects of all duties, whether they fall on the consumers of the articles on which they are laid, or on the producers, must be to diminish the amount of the imports, and, by consequence, of the exports. In a word, duties on imports affect the amount of the exports to the same extent that they do the imports; and it would have just the same effect in the end, whether the deficit of five millions which would be caused by the distribution, be raised by a duty on tobacco, rice, and cotton, or on the wines and silks for which they might be exchanged. The loss would fall, in either case, on the same interest, and to the same amount, and those immediately connected with it.

But I rise to higher grounds. As bad as the scheme is in a financial view, it is far worse in a political. The most deadly enemy of our system could not, in my opinion, propose a measure better calculated to subvert the Constitution and the Government. It would necessarily place the State Governments in direct antagonist relations with this on all questions except that of collecting and distributing the revenue, which would end in defeating all the objects for which it was instituted, and reduce it ultimately to the odious capacity of a mere tax collector for the State Governments. In this there can be no mistake.

The money to be distributed would go, not to the people of the States individually, but to the State Legislatures; or, to be more specific, to the majority, or rather to the dominant portion of the majority, which for the time might have the control. They, and their friends and supporters, would profit by the scheme. The money distributed would be applied in the most effective way to secure their ascendancy, and to give them the lion's share of the profit. The dominant party in the States would thus be enlisted to continue and enlarge the distribution; and when it is added, that the sums expended in the States would embrace powerful local interests, which would be seen and felt in its effects by large portions of the people, while the expenditures of the Government would be on objects of a general character, connected, for the most part, with the defence of the country against foreign danger, which would be little felt or regarded by the great body of the community, except in war, or on the eve of hostilities, I hazard nothing in asserting, that the interests in favor of distributing the revenue would overpower that of expenditures by the General Government, even on the most necessary objects; the consequence of which would be such as has been stated. Be assured that the system, once fairly commenced, would go on and enlarge itself, till every branch of revenue would be absorbed, when the Government, divested of all its constitutional functions, would expire, under universal scorn and contempt. Such must be the end of this most dangerous and unconstitutional measure, should it ever be adopted.

But the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] and others, allege that the cession of the lands to the new States is itself but a mode of distribution, with a view, doubtless, to weaken the force of my objections to this amendment. If it be so, I can only say that it is not intended, and if I can be satisfied that it is, I would be the first to denounce it. Its object is to remedy what I believe to be great and growing disorders in the operation of our land system, as it now exists; but as dangerous as I regard them, I would never consent to remedy them by a measure which I regard as vastly more dangerous. But the Senator will, if I mistake not, find it far more easy to call it a scheme of distribution, than to prove it to be so, or even that it is in the slightest degree analogous to it in any particular, as I hope to prove in some subsequent stage of this discussion.

I have heard, Mr. President, with pleasure, the deep denunciations leveled against the whole scheme of distribution, whether applied to the revenue from lands or taxes. It strengthens my confidence in the force of truth, and the conviction that, if one has the courage to do his duty, regardless of defeat for the time, he may hope to outlive error and misrepresentation. Let me add, if any of the denunciations were aimed at me, they passed harmless over me, and fell on another, against whom I would be the last to utter a censure in his retirement and declining years, however opposed to him while in power. The Senate will understand that I refer to General Jackson. It is far from agreeable to me to introduce his name here, or to speak of myself; but I am compelled, from the remarks made in a certain quarter, to do so, not from any feeling of egotism, (for I am too inconsiderable to involve what concerns me individually in the discussion of so grave a subject,) but that I may not be weakened, as the opponent of this most dangerous measure, by any misconception of my past course in relation to the scheme of distribution.

It has, sir, been my fortune to be opposed to the scheme from the beginning. It originated with a former member of this body, Mr. Dickerson, of New Jersey, and recently Secretary of the Navy, as far back as the year 1827. His proposed object was to strengthen the protective tariff interest, by distributing a part of its proceeds, (if I remember correctly, five millions of dollars,) annually, among the States, in the manner proposed by this amendment. I took my stand against it, promptly and decidedly, on its first agitation, as a measure dangerous and unconstitutional, and well calculated to fix the protective system permanently on the country. The next year, the oppressive tariff of 1828 was passed, and the year afterwards General Jackson was elected President, with the expectation, as far as South Carolina supported him, that he would use his patronage and influence to repeal that obnoxious act, or at least greatly reduce the burthen it imposed.

But it was the misfortune of General Jackson and the country, that when he arrived here to assume the reins of Government, he was strongly prepossessed in favor of the plan of distributing the surplus revenue, after the final payment of the public debt, under the impression that it would be impossible to repeal that act, or reduce the duties it imposed. How he received so dangerous an impression, I have never understood; but so it was. I speak not from my own knowledge, but from information that is unquestionable, that his inaugural address contained a passage in favor of the distribution, when it was laid before those whom he had selected for his first cabinet; and that it was with difficulty he assented to omit it, so strongly was he impressed in its favor —no doubt honestly and sincerely impressed. His first message to Congress, in December, 1829, contained a strong recommendation of that scheme, which was repeated with additional arguments in its favor in his second message the succeeding year. A recommendation from so high and influential a quarter, could not but have a powerful effect on public opinion. The Governors of two great States, Pennsylvania and New York, recommended it to their Legislatures, who adopted resolutions in its favor. That the views which he then entertained may be fully understood, I ask the Secretary to read the portions of the two messages, which he will find marked in the volumes on his table, in the order of their respective dates.

First session, Twenty-sixth Congress.

After the extinction of the public debt, it is not probable that any adjustment of the tariff, upon principles satisfactory to the people of the Union, will, until a remote period, if ever, leave the Government without a considerable surplus in the Treasury beyond what may be required for its current service. As then the period approaches when the application of the revenue to the payment of debt will cease, the disposition of the surplus will present a subject for the serious deliberation of Congress, and it may be fortunate for the country that it is yet to be decided. Considered in connection with the difficulties which have heretofore attended appropriations for purposes of internal improvement; and with those which this experience tells us will certainly arise whenever power over such subjects may be exercised by the General Government; it is hoped that it may lead to the adoption of some plan which will reconcile the diversified interests of the States, and strengthen the bonds which unite them. Every member of the Union, in peace and in war, will be benefited by the improvement of inland navigation and the construction of highways in the several States. Let us then endeavor to attain this benefit in a mode which will be satisfactory to all. That hitherto adopted has, by many of our fellow-citizens, been deprecated as an infraction of the Constitution; while by others it has been viewed as inexpedient. All feel that it has been employed at the expense of harmony in the legislative councils.

To avoid these evils, it appears to me that the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenue, would be its apportionment among the several States according to their ratio of representation; and should this measure not be found warranted by the Constitution, that it would be expedient to propose to the States an amendment authorizing it. I regard an appeal to the source of power, in cases of real doubt, and where its exercise is deemed indispensable to the general welfare, as among the most sacred of all our obligations.

Second session, Twenty-sixth Congress.

I have heretofore felt it my duty to recommend the adoption of some plan for the distribution of the surplus funds which may at any time remain in the Treasury after the national debt shall have been paid, among the States, in proportion to the number of their representatives, to be applied by them to objects of internal improvement.

Although this plan has met with favor in some portions of the Union, it has also elicited objections which merit deliberate consideration. A brief notice of these objections here will not, therefore, I trust, be regarded as out of place.

They are, as far as they have come to my knowledge, on the following grounds. 1st. An objection to the ratio of distribution; 2d. An apprehension that the existence of such a regulation would produce improvident and oppressive taxation to raise the funds for distribution; 3d. That the mode proposed would lead to the construction of works of a local nature, to the exclusion of such as are general, and as would consequently be of a more useful character; and last, that it would create a discreditable and injurious dependence on the part of the State Governments upon the Federal power. Of those who object to the ratio of representation as the basis of distribution, some insist that the importations of the respective States would constitute one that would be more equitable; and others, again, that the extent of their respective territories would furnish a standard which would be more expedient and sufficiently equitable. The ratio of representation presented itself to my mind, and it still does, as one of obvious equity, because of its being the ratio of contribution, whether the funds to be distributed be derived from the customs or from direct taxation. It does not follow, however, that its adoption is indispensable to the establishment of the system proposed. There may be considerations appertaining to the subject which would render a departure, to some extent, from the rule of contribution proper. Nor is it absolutely necessary that the basis of distribution be confined to one ground. It may, if, in the judgment of those whose right it is to fix it, be deemed politic and just to give it their character, have regard to several.

In my first message, I stated it to be my opinion that "it is not probable that any adjustment of the tariff upon principles satisfactory to the people of the Union, will, until a remote period, if ever, leave the Government without a considerable surplus in the Treasury, beyond what may be required for its current service." I have had no cause to change that opinion, but much to confirm it. Should these expectations be realized, a suitable fund would thus be produced for the plan under consideration to operate upon; and if there be no such fund, its adoption will, in my opinion, work no injury to any interest; for I cannot assent to the justness of the apprehension that the establishment of the proposed system would tend to the encouragement of improvident legislation of the character supposed. Whatever the proper authority, in the exercise of constitutional power, shall, at any time hereafter, decide to be for the general good, will, in that as in other respects, deserve and receive the acquiescence and support of the whole country; and we have ample security that every abuse of power in that regard, by agents of the people, will receive a speedy and effectual corrective at their hands. The views which I take of the future, founded on the obvious and increasing improvement of all classes of our fellow-citizens, in intelligence, and in public and private virtue, leave me without much apprehension on that head.

I do not doubt that those who come after us will be as much alive as we are to the obligation upon all the trustees of political power to exempt those for whom they act from all unnecessary burdens; and as sensible of the great truth, that the resources of the nation beyond those required for immediate and necessary purposes of Government, can no where be so well deposited as in the pockets of the people.

Such, I repeat, were unfortunately the opinions which General Jackson entertained on this all important question, when he came into power. I saw the danger in its full extent, and did not hesitate to take an open and decided stand against the measure which he so earnestly recommended; and that was the first question on which we separated. In placing myself in opposition to him, on a measure so vital, I was not ignorant of the hazard to which I exposed myself, but the sense of duty outweighed all other considerations. I clearly saw, that there would be an increased surplus revenue, after the final payment of the public debt, a period then rapidly approaching; and that, if it was once distributed to the States, it would rivet on the country the tariff of '28, to be followed by countless disasters from the combined effects of the two measures. Had it been adopted, the last ray of hope of repealing or reducing that oppressive and ruinous measure would have vanished. It would, by its seductive influence, have drawn over to its support the very States, whose prosperity it was crushing, not excepting South Carolina itself. The process is not difficult to explain.

For that purpose, I will take the case of South Carolina; and will assume that her citizens paid, under the tariff of 1828, four millions of dollars into the Treasury of the Union, which is probably not far from the truth, and would have received back under the proposed distribution of the surplus, but one-fourth, making one million. The sum to be distributed, as has already been stated, would not have been returned to the people, but to the Treasury of the State, to be disposed of by the Legislature; or to speak more specifically, by the small portion, which, for the time, would have had control over the dominant majority of the Legislature. All who have experience in the affairs of Government, will readily understand that no disposition would have been made of it, but what they and their friends and supporters would have had a full share of the profits and political advantages to be derived from its administration and expenditure. Thus an interest would be created on the part of the controlling influence in the State for the time, adverse to it—an interest to sustain the tariff, as the means of sustaining the distribution, and that for the plain reason, that they would receive more from the former than they would pay as citizens under the duties.

Now, sir, when we reflect that the amount taken by the duties out of the pockets of the people, was extracted in so round about and concealed a manner that no one, no, not the best informed and shrewdest calculator, could ascertain with precision what he paid, while that received back from distribution would have been seen and felt by those into whose hands it would have passed, it will be readily understood, not only how those who participated directly in its advantages, but the people themselves, would have been so deluded as to believe that they gained more by the distribution than what they lost by the tariff, especially when the dominant influence in the State would have been interested in creating and keeping up the delusion.

It is thus that the result of the scheme would have been to combine and unite into one compact mass the dominant interests of all the States, with the great dominant interest of the Union, to perpetuate a system of plundering the people of the products of their labor, especially the South, to be divided among those, with their partisans, who could control the politics of the country. It was against this daring and profligate scheme that South Carolina interposed her sovereign authority, and by that interposition, as I solemnly believe, saved the Constitution and the liberty of the country.

But that step, as bold and decisive as it was, could not accomplish all. To save the manufacturing interest, and avoid the hazard of reaction, it was necessary to reduce the duties on the protected articles gradually and slowly. The consequence was a continued overflow of the Treasury, notwithstanding standing the duty on every article not produced in the country was repealed, amounting in value to one-half of the whole, to such an enormous extent had the protective duties been raised. A remedy had to be applied to meet the corrupting and dangerous influence of this temporary surplus, till the gradual reduction of the protective duties under the compromise act would bring them to the ordinary wants of the Government. There was but one remedy, and that was, to take it from the Treasury. The flow was too great for the most lavish expenditures to keep down. I saw, in advance, that such would be the case, and, with the design of devising a remedy beforehand, moved for a special committee, with the view mainly of freeing the Treasury of its surplus, as the great source of Executive influence and power. The committee concurring in that opinion, recommended that the Constitution should be so amended as to enable Congress to make a temporary distribution. The report fully explains the reasons for believing there would be a large and corrupting surplus, and why, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the distribution as proposed was the only remedy. I have marked a portion of it that will show the opinion I then entertained in reference to distribution, and which I ask the Secretary to read.

Second Session Twenty-third Congress.

Your committee are fully aware of the many and fatal objections to the distribution of the surplus revenue among the States, considered as a part of the ordinary and regular system of this Government. They admit them to be as great as can be well imagined. The proposition itself, that the Government should collect money for the purpose of such distribution, or should distribute a surplus for the purpose of perpetuating taxes, is too absurd to require refutation; and yet what would be when applied, as supposed, so absurd and pernicious, is, in the opinion of your committee, in the present extraordinary and deeply disordered state of our affairs, not only useful and salutary, but indispensable to the restoration of the body politic to a sound condition; just as some potent medicine, which it would be dangerous and absurd to prescribe to the healthy, may, to the diseased, be the only means of arresting the hand of death. Distribution, as proposed, is not for the preposterous and dangerous purpose of raising a revenue for distribution, or of distributing the surplus as a means of perpetuating a system of duties or taxes, but a temporary measure to dispose of an unavoidable surplus while the revenue is in the course of reduction and which cannot be otherwise disposed of without greatly aggravating a disease that threatens the most dangerous consequences, and which hobbles the hope, not only of arresting its further progress, but also of restoring the body politic to a state of health and vigor. The truth of this assertion a few observations will suffice to illustrate.

It may, perhaps, be thought by some, that the power which the distribution among the States would bring to bear against the expenditures, and its consequent tendency to restrain the disbursements of the Government, would be so strong as not only to curtail useless or improper expenditure, but also the useful and necessary. Such, undoubtedly, would be the consequence, if the process were too long continued; but, in the present irregular and excessive action of the system, when the centrifugal force threatens to concentrate all its powers in a single department, the fear that the action of this Government will be too much reduced by the measure under consideration, in the short period to which it is proposed to limit its operation, is without just foundation. On the contrary, if the proposed measure should be applied in the present diseased state of the Government, its effect would be like that of some powerful alterative medicine, operating just long enough to change the present morbid action, but not sufficiently long to superinduce another of an opposite character.

The measure recommended was not adopted. It was denied, and violently denied, that there would be a surplus, and I left it to time to decide which opinion was correct. A year rolled round, and conclusively decided the point. Instead of overrating, experience proved I had greatly underestimated the surplus, as I felt confident at the time I had. It more than doubled even my calculation. I again revived the measure; but before it could be acted on, instructions from State Legislatures, with intervening elections, turned the majority in the Senate, which had been opposed to the Administration, into a minority. I acquiesced, and gave notice that I would not press the measure I had introduced, and would leave the responsibility with the majority, to devise a remedy for what was at last acknowledged to be a great and dangerous evil. All felt that something must be done, and that promptly. In the greatly expanded state of the currency, the enormous surplus had flowed off in the direction of the public lands, and was, by a sort of rotary motion, from the deposit banks to the speculators, and from them to the receivers, and back again to the banks, to perform the same round again, rapidly absorbing every acre of the public lands. No one saw more clearly than the Senator from New York, [Mr. Wright,] that an effectual and speedy remedy was indispensable to prevent an overwhelming catastrophe; and he promptly proposed to vest the surplus in the stocks of the State, to which I moved an amendment to deposit it in their treasuries, as being more equal and appropriate. These were acknowledged to be the only alternatives to leaving it in the deposit banks. Mine succeeded, and the passage of the deposit act, which is now unjustly denounced, in a certain quarter, as distribution, and not as deposit, as it really is, followed.

As far as I am concerned, the denunciation is utterly unfounded. I regarded it then, and still do, as simply a deposit—a deposit, to say the least, as constitutional as that in State banks, or State stocks held by speculators and stockjobbers on both sides of the Atlantic, and far more just and appropriate than either. But while I regard it as a deposit, I did then, and now do, believe that it should never be withdrawn but in the event of war, when it would be found a valuable resource.

But had it been in reality a distribution, it would be, in my opinion, if not altogether, in a great measure, justified, under the peculiar circumstances of the case. The surplus was not lawfully collected. Congress has no right to take a cent from the people, but for the just and constitutional wants of the country. To take more, or for other purposes, as in this case, is neither more nor less than robbery—more criminal for being perpetrated by a trustee appointed to guard their interest. It in fact belonged to those from whom it was unjustly plundered; and if the individuals, and the share of each, could have been ascertained, it ought, on every principle of justice, to have been returned to them. But as that was impossible, the nearest practicable approach to justice was to return it proportionally, as it was, to the States, as a deposit, till wanted, for the use of the people from whom it was unjustly taken, instead of leaving it with the banks, for their use, which had no claims whatever to it, or vesting it in State stocks, for the benefit of speculators and stockjobbers.

As brief as this narrative is, I trust it is sufficient to show that the advocates of this amendment can find nothing in my former opinion or course to weaken my resistance to it, or to form the show of a precedent for the extraordinary measure which it proposes. So far from it, the deposit act, whether viewed in the causes which led to it, or its object and effect, stands in direct contrast with it.

We stand, sir, in the midst of a remarkable juncture in our affairs; the most remarkable in many respects, that has occurred since the foundation of the Government; nor is it probable that a similar one will ever again occur. This Government is now left as free to shape its policy, unembarrassed by existing engagements or past legislation as it was when it first went into operation, and even more so. The entire system of policy originating in the Federal consolidation school has fallen prostrate. We have now no funded debt, no National Bank, no connection with the banking system, no protective tariff. In a word, the paper system, with all its corrupt and corrupting progeny has, as far as this Government is concerned, vanished, leaving nothing but its bitter fruits behind. The great and solemn question now to be decided is, shall we again return and repeat the same system of policy with all its disastrous effects before us, and under which the country is now suffering, to be again followed with ten fold aggravation; or, profiting by past experience, seize the precious opportunity to take the only course which can save the Constitution and liberty of the country—that of the old State Rights Republican policy of 1787. Such is the question submitted for our decision at this deeply important juncture; and on that decision hangs the destiny of our country. A few years must determine. Much—very much will depend on the President elect. I he should rest his policy on the broad and solid principles maintained by his native State, in her purest and proudest days, his name will go down to posterity as one of the distinguished benefactors of the country; but, on the contrary, if he should adopt the policy indicated by the amendment, and advocated by his prominent supporters in this chamber, and attempt to erect anew the fallen temple of consolidation, his overthrow, or that of his country, must be the inevitable consequence.

SPEECH OF MR. WRIGHT, OF NEW YORK.

In Senate, Wednesday, January 27, 1841—The Pre-emption Bill being under consideration, and the question being upon the motion of Mr. CARR TENDER to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, with instructions to report a bill to provide for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the lands among the States:

MR. WRIGHT said he would occupy a single moment to explain the singular state of facts before the Senate, and to put himself right in the matter, as he could not hope, at this or any other time, to fulfil the expectations which the conversation now going on was likely to excite here and out of doors: It had been his intention to take part in the discussion of the question now before the body, but he did not know, until yesterday that the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] was desirous to follow him, or again to address the Senate in the course of this debate. A private conversation between himself and the Senator, on that day, had notified him of both facts, and he had then manifested the willingness he then and now felt to accommodate the distinguished Senator on upon both points.

Still the discussion, in the course of that day, seemed to him to take a wide departure from the question before the Senate; and with the collateral matters thus drawn into the debate, he had little, and did not wish to have any thing more to do. His object had been to obtain the floor when they should have been disposed of, and he had refrained from making the attempt for this day, because it was expressly intimated to him that other Senators desired to occupy a part, or the whole of it in a continuance of the discussion of those collateral topics. He had not, therefore, come to his seat with an expectation of addressing the Senate to day, and being reluctant to throw himself upon its attention at any time, he was much more so, when he was consciously unprepared to offer the views he wished to present. Yet rather than see the day consumed, for the purpose of affording him time for preparation, and be, in the mean time, the declared object of that delay, he would now enter upon the task he had designed to attempt, and would ask the Senate to extend to him its patient indulgence, while he should pass, as briefly as he might, over his too voluminous notes.

He had not desired, if he could have avoided it consistently with his sense of his public duty, to address the Senate at all upon the great question which now occupies its attention, or indeed upon the bill to which the proposition now under consideration relates, but occasions had arisen, in the course of the wide discussion, when that duty seemed imperative, and now he would endeavor to perform it with as little consumption of time as possible.

What is the proposition immediately before us? It is very simple, and may be perfectly intelligible to all who will try to understand it. It is to take from the permanent revenue of the country, at a time when that whole revenue is confessedly inadequate to meet the wants of the Treasury, from one-fifth to one quarter of its whole amount, and to give it away, so far as the National Government and its Treasury are concerned; to do this at a time when no proposition to supply the deficiency of revenue to be thus caused is directly and practically before either House of Congress; and to do this, under these circumstances, within five weeks of the close of an annual session of Congress.

This was presenting the question of a distribution of the land revenue to the States in a manner in which it had never before been presented to his mind, at least, and he believed in a manner and under circumstances which had never before attended its presentation to Congress, or to the country.

In the course of the debate, much had been said of former propositions of this character, and the high authority of distinguished statesmen had been quoted in favor of the policy. In favor of it, how? By thus giving away the public revenue, when the Treasury of the people is in want? No! But by discharging that Treasury from an inconvenient, a vicious, and a dangerous surplus; and by doing that in a constitutional mode; in obedience to the will of the Constitution-making power of the country. He would go back to the first of these high references, in point of time. A distinguished Governor of his own State, (De Witt Clinton,) now deceased, had been quoted as favorable to this policy. Favorable to it at such a time as this, and in this shape and way? No, sir. Favorable to it by way of relieving the Treasury from a surplus, expressly reserving any opinion as to the competency of Congress to make the distribution under the Constitution as it is, and expressly referring to the source of all power, the people themselves, as the proper tribunal to settle all doubts upon that point by an amendment of the Constitution. Expressions of a subsequent Governor of his State, and of its Legislature, had also been made matters of reference in favor of the policy, but all these expressions would be found accompanied by the same reservations of an opinion as to our constitutional power even to distribute a surplus, and the same references to one great source of power, for authority to carry out the measures thus equivocally recommended.

The late President Jackson had also been repeatedly quoted as a friend to this distribution policy, and quotations from several of his early messages had been read to the Senate to show his views. This was fair as to him and fair as to the question; but what were his views as thus given by himself? To distribute the revenue, when the Treasury was in want? No, far from that. They were to relieve the Treasury from a surplus. And did he express the opinion that Congress possessed the constitutional power to make the distribution. No. So far from it, he expressly, in his first message in which the subject is mentioned, and an extract from which was, but a few days ago, read to the Senate, recommended an appeal to the people to amend the Constitution to reach the object. In that same message, in conformity with his professed principles and uniform practice, he says these appeals should be made in all cases where a reasonable doubt exists, and the exercise of a power not expressly granted is supposed to be desirable. He considers such appeals not dangerous to any sound policy, but salutary and salutary in their very nature. And why did he favor a distribution at all? He tells us it was because the country was then threatened with a surplus revenue; that when the national debt should be fully paid, such a surplus must accumulate, unless our revenue laws were materially modified, and that he did not anticipate that the public opinion would sanction modifications so sudden and extensive as would be required to bring the revenue within the wants of the Treasury. His only object was to devise a safe and constitutional mode of disposing of that surplus which did accumulate from 1834 to 1837, and which brought upon the country many of the evils under which it suffers to this day, and upon this Government the very extravagances in expenditure of which his political opponents had so loudly and perseveringly complained; but he did not propose even the distribution of so mischievous a surplus, without an amendment of the Constitution which should expressly confer the power to do it.

The high authorities, then, to which reference had been made, were not authorities for the proposition now before the Senate. They had proposed to distribute surpluses only, not current revenue of which the Treasury was in daily want; and even such a distribution as they suggested was always with them a question of constitutional power, which they proposed to refer to the sovereign people, the source of power under our system. It was that question, prominently, which he proposed to discuss, and he would proceed to that discussion, merely remarking that he felt most sensibly his inability to conduct the argument as its importance required. The consciousness of this fact had, from day to day, deterred him from making the attempt, until further delay might be, on his part, a criminal neglect of a high duty. That he might now have the attention of the body, as far as their great patience would permit, gentlemen would pardon him for saying that he believed, in his heart, if he could do justice to the facts and the fair conclusions from them, this would be the last occasion upon which the word "distribution," in the sense in which it is here used, would be heard in the halls of Congress, under our present Constitution, and with an empty Treasury. Now to the discussion.

His first proposition was one which he was sure would not be controverted from any quarter. It was, that all the powers of Congress rest upon, and are derived from, the Constitution of the United States, and that it has no single power which is not granted by that instrument.

His next proposition involved the great point in controversy, and must be disputed, or he trusted the distribution policy would be abandoned until the constitutional power to adopt it should be conferred. He would state it, as follows: The power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution over the money derived from the sales of the public lands, and constituting the proceeds of those lands, which the proposition before the Senate declares shall be distributed to the States, is identical with, and in no way different from, the power of Congress over all other money and property of the United States, however derived, or in whatever shape existing, within the exclusive control of Congress.

He found but two provisions of the Constitution material to the fair and full discussion of this broad proposition; and those he would read in the order they were found in the instrument. The first was in article first, section eighth, clause first, and in these words:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States."

His reading of this provision of the Constitution was, that the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," was given to Congress for the purpose of paying the debts, and providing for the common defence and general welfare of the United States. He knew a very different reading had been sometimes contended for, and that the second clause of the sentence, instead of being a limitation upon the powers granted in the first, had been supposed to confer distinct and separate powers of itself. Under this construction, the reading would be to give Congress power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," and power "to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." It was not his present object to enter into a discussion of the correctness or incorrectness of either of these constructions, but simply to state what he believed to be the correct reading, as he had done. Now was he now to enter into argument of any sort in relation to this "general welfare" clause of the Constitution. He too well remembered the volumes which had been written upon the subject, without accomplishing any other purpose than to show the radical difference in the rule which governed the two great contending political parties in construing that instrument, from which all the powers of this Government must be drawn. To his mind, the clause was not a grant of power at all, but an express limitation upon the powers conferred by the clause which immediately precedes it; and he believed this, at the present time, was a much more universally received opinion of the country, than at a former period. In any event, if there should be advocates for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, who seek the power to pass a law for that purpose in this general welfare clause, it will be for them to show that a living money from the common Treasury to the separate States, to be expended upon objects exclusively of a State character, is, in fairness of language and intentment, to provide for "the general welfare of the United States," in their united capacity, as contradistinguished from the individual States as sovereign and independent Governments and communities, and which, as such, constitutionally hold their separate general welfare in their separate and independent keeping.

The other clause of the Constitution to which he had referred, was the second clause of the third section of the fourth article, in the following words:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory, or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in the Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

The power here conferred is over the "territory, or other property belonging to the United States"—terms as broad as could have been used to include every thing which is property, and belongs to the United States, while the word "territory," instead of lands or public domain, clearly shows that that single enumeration of a single description of property had not reference to the public domain simply, in the common acceptance of those terms as used by us, but was intended to embrace all lands and soils "belonging to the United States," however and wherever situated, for whatever use and purpose held, and however acquired—all territory. The power conferred is identical over the "territory," and over the other "property," and it is to "dispose of" both, and "make all needful rules and regulations respecting" both. The grant of power is as broad as the terms "territory" and "property," and the whole grant is alike applicable to both and either, and to every part and parcel of each. Who, then, shall say that this provision of the Constitution gives to Congress a power over the public domain of the country, which it does not give over any other property of the United States? That it authorizes Congress to give away the public lands, and does not give the same authority to give away the public money? That it confers the power to distribute to the States, for their separate use, the money in the Treasury arising from the sales of the public lands, and does not confer the same authority to distribute in the same manner, and for the same purposes, any other money in the Treasury belonging to the United States, from whatever source derived? That it authorizes the distribution of the proceeds of the public domain, usually so called, and does not authorize a like distribution of the proceeds of any other portion of the "territory" of the United States? That the lands can be sold to raise money for distribution, and not the fortifications, ships, arms, and any other like "territory" and "property" belonging to the United States? That the property of the country, as contradistinguished from its money, may be made a fund for distribution by a sale and conversion into money, while the money itself required to purchase the property cannot be so distributed? That all money in the Treasury, and belonging to the United States, from whatever source derived, is not as much "property belonging to the United States," as "the territory or other property" mentioned in this constitutional provision, and as much subject to the power of Congress, therein granted over "the territory or other property," either for distribution to the States, or for any other application or expenditure?

He would not for a moment suppose that contradictions of this character could be contended for by any Senator; and he must, therefore, suppose that the only ground upon which this proposed distribution of the proceeds of the public lands was to be advocated and defended, was that the deeds of cession of the public domain from the States to the United States, laid the foundation for a "claim" to such distribution upon some principle, and thus brought the proposition within the terms of the last clause of the constitutional provision last referred to, in the following words: "And nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

That this policy is urged under this clause of the constitutional provision is made more probable, from the fact that its advocates have usually referred to the cessions from the States, and the payment of the debt of the Revolution, as facts upon which the right to the distribution on the part of the States, and the authority to make it on the part of Congress, were both to be rested. It would be necessary, therefore, to examine the deeds of cession, and see whether they furnished any foundation for "claims" on the part of the States; or any of them, within the meaning of the provision of the Constitution above quoted, or of a power on the part of Congress to satisfy such "claims" in the way proposed.

Upon this point his examinations had induced him to come to the following conclusion, and he now stated it in the form of a proposition.

The deeds of cession from the States of that part of the public domain held by and under those cessions, do not contain any thing which gives the States, or any of them, "claims" to those portions of the public lands, or to the proceeds thereof, which do not equally exist against all other "territory or property belonging to the United States;" nor do those deeds of cession contain any thing which confers upon Congress any other or different power over the ceded lands, or the proceeds from the sales thereof, than that possessed by the grant of the Constitution over "the territory and property belonging to the United States," acquired in any other manner.

A brief reference to the cessions would establish this proposition. The States which made cessions under the Articles of Confederation, and before the adoption of the Constitution, were five in number, and the order of the cessions, in point of time, were as follows:

New York—Deed of cession executed 1st March, 1781.

Virginia—Deed of cession executed 1st March, 1784.

Massachusetts—Deed of cession executed 19th April, 1785.

Connecticut—Deed of cession executed 13th Sept. 1786.

South Carolina—Deed of cession executed 9th August, 1787.

All the deeds of cession above enumerated were executed by the delegates representing the States named; in the Congress of the Confederation, and in conformity to laws passed by the Legislatures of the respective States, conferring the power upon their delegates in the Congress to make the cessions for them respectively. He had carefully examined those State laws, and the deeds executed by their authority, and had found that, in the terms of the grants and the estates conveyed, the authority thus conferred upon the grantors had been carefully followed. It would not be necessary, therefore, for him to make a reference to the laws. One to the deeds executed under them would be sufficient. And here again his references might be materially abbreviated, as he found all the grants substantially following either the form adopted by New York, or that adopted by Virginia, and extracts from those two deeds would show the nature and character and extent of the estate conveyed in all the five cases.

Before he read the extracts it would be profitable to make a remark, that the peculiar language of the deeds might be more fully understood and rightly appreciated. There was, at the time of these cessions, no Union, but a simple Confederation, an alliance, of the old thirteen States. The common Government was called a Congress; but it was more like a Congress of Nations than like the present Congress of the United States. All the States, however represented, were equal in that body, and it had no power to act coercively either upon the States, or the people of the States, in the raising of revenue, or the imposition of taxes of any character. When money was wanted for the purposes of the common Government, the Congress determined the sum to be raised, apportioned it among the States according to a rule established in the Articles of Confederation, and called upon each State to raise its proportion, in its own way, by virtue of its own taxing powers, and through the agency of its own affairs. If these facts are borne constantly in mind, the language used in the deeds of cession will be perfectly intelligible.

The State of New York did "cede, transfer, and forever relinquish, to and for the only use and benefit of such of the States as are, or shall become, parties to the Articles of Confederation, all the right, title, interest, jurisdiction, and claim, of the said State of New York, to all lands and territories to the northward and westward of the boundaries to which the said State is in manner aforesaid limited and restricted, and to be granted, disposed of, and appropriated in such manner only as the Congress of the said United or Confederate States shall order and direct."

The Legislature of the State of Virginia, in the act authorizing and directing the cession, enact that the lands ceded "shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation, or Federal alliance, of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever;" and her delegates in the Congress, in obedience to that act, "transfer, assign, and make over, unto the United States in Congress assembled, for the benefit of the said States, Virginia inclusive, all right, title, and claim, as well of soil as of jurisdiction, which the said Commonwealth hath to the territory, or tract of country, within the limits of the Virginia charter, situate, lying and being to the northwest of the river Ohio, to and for the uses and purposes, and on the conditions of the said recited act."

Such were the terms employed, and such the estates granted by the States of New York and Virginia, and the other three States named followed substantially the one or the other of these forms in their cessions subsequently made. All the five States granted all they had, all they owned, and all they "claimed," in the lands ceded by them respectively, and what was that? It was, at most, the sovereignty, the jurisdiction of Government, and as appurtenant to these the right to purchase the lands from the Indians. Perhaps it would be more technically proper to say that the States granted the soil, the fee, of the land, with the sovereignty and jurisdiction, and the appurtenant right to purchase the possessory interests of the Indians. The substance is the same, however, as each State granted all it had, "all its right, title, interest, and claim," in the language of the deeds.

Is there, then, in any of these deeds, any condition of reversion? any specific appropriation of the proceeds of the lands, with remainder over to all or any of the States? None whatever. The grants were "for the only use and benefit of such of the States as are, or shall become, parties to the Articles of Confederation;" "for the benefit of the said States, Virginia inclusive;" and the proceeds were to be "a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation, or Federal alliance of the said States," the granting State inclusive, "according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure." The States, under the Confederation, paid their respective proportions of the charge and expenditure of the common Government by States, and each was to receive from the proceeds of the ceded lands a share exactly in proportion to its share of the common charge. In other words, its proportion of that charge to be raised by taxation upon its own citizens was to be diminished by its proportion of the proceeds of the lands, which proceeds were to be a "common fund" for the benefit, in that way, of all the States, parties to the alliance. The common Government, the Congress, was to "dispose of" the lands, but for that purpose, and no other. Such was the state of things under the Confederation.

The difficulties about these lands retarded the consummation of the Confederacy. The States which did not claim any of the ceded lands as within their limits, did claim a common right with the other States in them, contending that they were not the separate property of certain States, but a part of the royal domain of the British crown, won by conquest in the war of the Revolution, at the common expense and peril of all the States, parties to the war, and that they were thus, of right, made the common property of all. The State of Maryland, though as active and patriotic in the prosecution of the war as her sister States, did not subscribe to the Articles of Confederation until the day of the date of the New York deed of cession, standing out exclusively upon her claim to a common right in these lands.

The Constitution was formed in 1787, subsequently adopted by the States, they being the same States which were parties to the Confederation, or Federal alliance, and consequently to the deeds of cession, and the new Government went into operation on the 4th of March, 1789. Still the cessions were imperfect? The States of North Carolina and Georgia, claiming large portions of the Western lands as within their respective chartered limits, had made no cessions to the common Government. They did, however, subsequently cede, not to the confederation, but to the Union, at the following dates.

North Carolina—Deed of cession executed 25th February, 1790.

Georgia—Deed of cession executed 16th June, 1802.

The deeds from these two States were, in all material respects, so far as this argument is concerned, similar to those executed by the five States before named. They, like the other deeds, contain no reversionary clauses, no specific applications of the proceeds of the lands, with remainders over to the granting States, or any other, but expressly declare the ceded lands "a common fund" for the benefit of the Union to which they ceded.

The fact that these States had not made cessions at the time of the formation of the Constitution, may and probably does account for the insertion, in that instrument, of the clause last above quoted, "and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State." What has been before said will show that other States did claim a common right in the unceded lands, not as their individual and separate property, but as the property of the nation, of the Confederation before the Constitution, of the Union afterwards. Still the ceding States claimed them as their several property, and hence the language, that the Constitution should not "prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State." If this conjecture be well founded, the deeds of cession from these two States put at rest forever the "claims" referred to of all the parties interested, by the surrender and relinquishment on the one side, and the acceptance and satisfaction on the other.

Be that, however, as it may, there is not, upon the face of any of these deeds, any ground for "claims" in favor of any or all of the States against the United States, beyond the obligation upon the latter to administer the common fund constituted by the cessions for the common benefit of the whole Union, and the right of the former to have it so administered. Whatever may have been the powers of Congress over this fund, under the Confederation, is not now material, as the parties to the Confederation are the same parties which formed and adopted the Constitution, and voluntarily merged the old in the new Government, with new, and different, and defined powers. The Congress under the Constitution cannot look behind that instrument for either powers or prohibitions, not even to these deeds of cession, or to any other act of a single State, or of the confederated States. If it possess any power over this common fund constituted by the deeds of cession, that power must be found in the Constitution, and be exercised in obedience to its provisions. This will be admitted as to the two cessions made subsequent to the Constitution, and to the Union, and no man has ever yet been found to contend that the different portions of the ceded lands are subject to different rules of disposition, or that the powers of Congress over them are different. Still it is worthy of remark, in this connection, that the power conferred by all the deeds of cession was "to dispose" of the lands, and the power conferred by the Constitution is "to dispose," &c. of the "territory or other property" of the United States.

It is said, however, that these lands were, in fact, ceded to pay the debt of the Revolution, and, that debt being paid, that there is an equitable right in favor of the States to a reversion of the funds, or to the remainder of the proceeds, for their individual and separate use. Indeed, so confidently was this opinion entertained by one honorable Senator, and he too a distinguished lawyer, [Mr. CRITTENDEN] that he had, upon a former occasion, said he verily believed, if a suit in chancery could be instituted against the Government, the States would obtain a decree for the retrocession of the lands, or a distribution of their proceeds.

Had this assumption that the lands were ceded for the specific purpose of paying the debt of the Revolution any foundation in fact? The assumption, so far as he had been able to ascertain its foundation, was rested upon the resolution of the old Congress, of the 10th of October, 1780. That resolution was in the following words:

"Resolved, That the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States, by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress of the 6th day of September last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct Republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom and independence, as the other States; that each State which shall be so formed, shall contain a suitable extent of territory, not less than one hundred nor more than one hundred and fifty miles square, or as near thereto as circumstances will admit: That the necessary and reasonable expenses which any particular State shall have incurred since the commencement of the present war, in subduing any British posts, or in maintaining forts or garrisons within and for the defence, or in acquiring any part of the territory that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States, shall be reimbursed. That the said lands shall be granted or settled at such times and under such regulations as shall hereafter be agreed on by the United States, in Congress assembled, or any nine or more of them."

Here is a promise of a specific appropriation of the proceeds of the lands, or other means, for a certain object, namely, to reimburse the States the necessary and reasonable expenses incurred by them, after the commencement of the war, in subduing British posts within the ceded territory—in maintaining forts and garrisons within and for the defence of the ceded territory, or in acquiring any part of the ceded territory. These items of expenditure were made claims in favor of the States against the United States, but not claims upon the lands particularly. They were to be claims in favor of the particular States incurring the expenses against the common Treasury, and might be paid from the proceeds of sales of the lands, or from any other means, as the United States should choose. The cessions were not to be made conditional and dependent upon the payment of these expenses, and no such condition is found in any one of the deeds of cession. Yet this was a sort of specific obligation connected with the cessions, but not to pay the debt of the Revolution, or any portion of it which was a charge against the common Government. It was simply an obligation to pay certain specified expenses which had been incurred during the war, by particular States, in acquiring the land, or in defending it.

While, then, this resolution furnishes no ground for the assumption that the lands were ceded for the specific purpose of paying the debt of the Revolution, with any legal or equitable reversion to the States, or remainder over in the proceeds after the payment of that debt, it does furnish, in this very stipulation to reimburse to the ceding States all the expenses incurred by them in acquiring and defending the lands, the strongest circumstantial evidence that no such reversion or remainder, either equitable or legal, was contemplated, and that no other obligation or indebtedness was contracted by the common Government to the States than that mentioned and directly assumed. That obligation has been long since discharged. Those expenses of the States were assumed and paid by this Government, together with their separate debts contracted to carry on the war of the Revolution, and both together formed a part of that mass of national debt which this Government has finally paid. No claim, therefore, in favor of any State, can now be sustained upon this part of the resolution, and none other of a pecuniary character was incurred by it.

The deed of cession of Massachusetts makes express reference to this resolution, and declares that the cession of that State is made in conformity with it. A reference is made in this resolution to a recommendation of Congress of the 6th of September, 1780. That is a report and resolution adopted in consequence of certain instructions from the State of Maryland to her delegates, respecting the Articles of Confederation, and containing a declaration as to her common rights in the lands, the act of the Legislature of the State of New York authorizing her cession, and a remonstrance from the State of Virginia, upon the same general subjects, all before Congress at the same time, and all referred to the same committee of the body, which made the report, and proposed a resolution, by way of recommendation to the States here referred to. This report and resolution is no other way important to this discussion, than to show, as part of the history of the period, that the cessions from the States were urged—not so much on the ground of the pecuniary benefit to be derived to the common Government, as to promote harmony among the States, to perfect the alliance, and bring into the Confederation the State of Maryland, which State declined to subscribe to the Articles of Confederation, in consequence of differences about these lands. A reference to this report was to him a matter of the highest gratification, as it presents the State which he has the honor in part to represent here, foremost in the exhibition of that patriotic liberality, which did finally perfect the alliance, cement the Union of the States, and lead to the glorious consequences, the blessings of which we now enjoy.

Nothing, however, is found in any of these proceedings upon which to found the assumption that the cessions were made for the specific object of paying the debt of the Revolution; but, on the contrary, the report and both resolutions, rebut that assumption directly, and exhibit other and higher objects as moving the States to those grants—objects connected with the harmony of the States, the Union of the States, and, consequently, with their success in the fearful struggle which was to determine the question of our independent existence as a nation. He felt authorized to conclude, therefore, that this assumption had no foundation in fact, and could not be sustained by the history of the transactions; and if falling, the assumed rights of reversion or remainder in the States, to the lands, or their proceeds, supposed to flow from and rest upon it, must fall with it.

Still another ground is assumed, however, and that is, that an equitable right to the net proceeds of these lands, after the payment of debt of the Revolution, results in favor of the States, notwithstanding there are not, in the deeds of cession, or in any of the proceedings on the part of the States, or of the United States, any terms or conditions of reversion, any reservations of remainders, or any specific application of the fund to the payment of that debt. This broad assumption of an equity would require examination in various aspects.

The first step in this examination would seem to him to be to inquire to what parties this equitable reversion, or right, not claimed as matter of law, or of fair legal inference from the deeds, but as a general equity, without specified foundation, would enure, in case the right should be recognised? Could it be to any other parties than those making the grants? He thought not. It was found that there was no reversion in terms, and no remainder reserved, either to the ceding States, or to all the States, and the claim was one of mere equity, without legal foundation, and said to result from the conveyances. Could such a claim result to parties not known, not thought of, not in existence, at the time the grants were made? He admitted the right of any grantor of an estate to secure remainders and reversions to any parties he might choose, whether in existence or not at the time of the grant; but he could not conceive of a resulting legal right, much less of a resulting equity, to an entire stranger to the conveyance, to one of whose existence the grantor had not a thought, and towards whom there could have been no intention of making the grant. The claim is that of a mere legal, or equitable, consequence. It is rested upon the assumption that the estate conveyed was a mere trust, that the trusts have been fulfilled in the payment of the debt of the Revolution, and that, in the absence of other express provision, a reversion, legal or equitable, follows. Follows to whom? To what parties? To any but the grantors? Certainly not. It was competent for them to have secured remainders and reversions to whatever parties they pleased; but it is admitted that they did not do so to any parties, by the terms of their grants. If, therefore, any such resulting right can be sustained, it must be in favor of the seven ceding States only, and upon the principle that whatever remains from an estate granted, beyond the full purpose and object of the grant, as well by legal as by equitable consequence, reverts to the grantor. In other words, what is not granted is retained, and when the grant is satisfied the remainder, if any, rests where it did before the grant.

If this position be wrong, and the deeds of cession are susceptible of a construction which will make this equitable remainder, or reversion, enure to the benefit of all the States, yet the claim assumes that the lands have been a mere trust in the hands of the Federal Government, a trust to pay the debt of the Revolution simply; and that the remaining, or reversionary claim in favor of the States is one exclusively equitable, there being neither the specific application of the fund, nor the resulting right expressed in the grants. In this sense the equity must, of course, be claimed from the trustee, subject to all equitable demands against the estate in his hands. How, then, will this claim, interposed in favor of the States to the proceeds of the public lands stand, upon a fair adjustment of accounts between the trustee and the cestui que trusts; between the United States, which have held and managed the fund, and the several States in whose favor the claim is made?

It has already been seen that, so far as the pecuniary interests were concerned, the States did not convey a clear title, but the mere right to purchase such a title from the Indians. The trustee, therefore, must make this purchase to bring the trust fund into a productive state at all, or to render it possible to perform the trust, which is assumed to be the payment of the debt of the Revolution. If these be sound positions, there is a very short way of showing that the equity in the remainder, or reversion, whatever it may be, and however clearly it may exist, cannot yet attach, because the net annual proceeds of the lands do not now, and are not anticipated for the year to come, to be equal to the current charges upon the Treasury, for the purchase of the Indian titles, and that branch of the Revolutionary debt yet undischarged. Two items only of the current ordinary expenses of the Government will demonstrate this fact.

The Indian annuities are debts contracted for the purchase of the Indian title to these lands, and the Revolutionary pensions are, upon every fair principle of equity, a part of that debt which it is assumed the lands were to pay. It might be said, that these pensions were mere gratuities, disconnected from the legal debt at the time of the cessions, and, therefore, not legally chargeable upon the fund thus provided for the payment of that debt. Admit this objection, in its legal sense, and what is its equitable aspect? Why have the pensions been granted? Is it not because resolutions of the Congress held out inducements to enter the military service of the country which were not fulfilled, and because the currency in which the soldiers in that memorable war were paid was valueless? Were not these, then, equitable claims against the United States, and are not the payments equitable charges upon a fund dedicated to the payment of the Revolutionary debt, before a mere inferential and consequential equity can sweep away that fund? It did not appear to him that the point admitted of argument. It was too clear for discussion, and too just for resistance. He would state the account current between the Treasury and the lands, upon this simple principle, and see what was the equitable remainder or reversion to the States.

The actual amount payable to the various Indian tribes annually from the public Treasury, as annuities secured to them by different treaties, and as interest upon money stipulated by treaty to be permanently invested, and not yet invested, as shown by a statement in his hand, carefully prepared at the Indian Office, is $817,793 00

The actual payments from the Treasury for Revolutionary pensions, for the year 1839, as shown by a statement from the office of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, and now before him, were 2,956,135 75

Making, together, an amount of annuities for Indian lands, and pensions to officers and soldiers of the Revolution, payable annually from the National Treasury, of $3,773,928 75

26TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Pre-emption Law—Mr. Wright.

Senate.

The estimated receipts into the Treasury from the sales of the public lands for the present year are just about the same as the actual receipts of the last year, and either sum is - 3,500,000 00

This will leave an annual balance of the annuities and Revolutionary pensions, over and above the whole current proceeds of the lands, of - $273,928 75

This will be about the true state of things for the last and the present years. It is true that the payments for Revolutionary pensions are now diminishing, from the death of the pensioners, more rapidly than they are increased by new applications and admissions under the existing laws, and this diminution will be annually more and more rapid, if further legislation does not prevent it. It is also true that many of the Indian annuities are for terms of years, and the expiration of such annuities may sink the amount of payments under that head, if new treaties do not make a corresponding addition. So also the annual sales of lands may be extended in future years, and thus this comparison be changed. But at present there are no net proceeds from the lands, if these two single items are made an annual charge upon them. Still there are constant annual charges of the highest necessity, which are not included here, and which, by the admission of all, should be deducted to arrive at the net proceeds for distribution. He referred to the ordinary expenses of the land system, of the General Land Office here, of the various local land offices, of surveys, and all those classes of expenditures which are paid by annual appropriations from the Treasury, and not by commissions upon the money collected. These expenses cannot fall short of, and are more likely to exceed, half a million annually. He had caused them to be ascertained for the five years, commencing with 1833 and ending with 1837, to be used for another purpose, and during that period they averaged more than one million per annum. Those, however, were years, or at least some of them, when the surveys and sales were unusually extensive. Still half that average, he thought, could not be excessive for ordinary years. It should not be forgotten that no mention is here made of annual payments for holding new treaties, for new purchases of land from the Indians, and for the many other constant but uncertain expenditures growing out of the acquirement of title, management, and sale of these lands, and nothing is said of the expenses of the frequent Indian wars which have attended the execution of the various treaties, and the clearing the lands from Indian possession.

He would now pass to another part of the argument. He had already said that the right of the States to the distribution proposed, and the power and duty of Congress to make it, had been attempted to be rested upon the deeds of cession from the States to the United States, and the alleged object and purpose of those cessions. He had previously attempted to show that neither those deeds, nor any of the proceedings, either on the part of the States, or the United States, presented any resting place for the assumptions in question. He might, however, have been mistaken in his efforts to accomplish that object, and it would be too great an exhibition of vanity on his part to say he had accomplished what he had hoped to accomplish upon those points. He must, therefore, pursue the argument further. Suppose he had wholly failed to establish those positions, a consequence followed from which there was no escape, and that he would now state.

No right of the States, or power or duty of Congress, based upon the deeds of cession, could apply to any other than the ceded territory. This must be admitted, for whether the cessions contained upon their face reversionary rights to the ceding States, or remainders over to all the States, no such rights could attach, or be valid, either in law or equity, beyond the limits and interests of the estate covered by the deeds; the estate to which the grantors in the deeds claimed title or interest. He would not for a moment presume that any Senator would attempt to push the right of the States to a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands upon such grounds beyond this limit, and he would therefore proceed to show how far short of the ground covered by the proposition before the Senate this justification of its principle and equity would be found to cover.

The boundaries of the cessions were, invariably, all the lands situate without and beyond certain defined limits, northerly, westerly, or southerly, and without any prescribed extent, or specified limit, north, west, or south. The limits of the ceding States in those directions were fixed and defined, and the grants were of all the lands belonging to the granting State without and beyond its boundaries. The most which can be asked, therefore, as the outer limits of the ceded lands, is the outer limits of the United States as established by the definitive treaty of peace of 1783. This must follow from the fact that the lands, whether in fact the property of the Confederation of States, or of the seven ceding States, were held by conquest in the war of the Revolution, and cannot be supposed to extend beyond the boundaries fixed in the treaty which terminated the war, and fixed the limits of territory for the belligerent parties. The western and southern of these boundaries are now alone material, as the northern and northwestern is the present limit of British and American possessions. The western and southern of these boundaries, beginning upon the Lake of the Woods, are described in the treaty as follows:

"And from thence on a due west course to the river Mississippi; thence by a line to be drawn along the middle of the said river Mississippi until it shall intersect the northernmost part of the thirty-first degree of north latitude; south by a line to be drawn due east from the determination of the line last mentioned, in the latitude of thirty-one degrees north of the equator, to the middle of the river Apalachicola or Catohouchie; thence along the middle thereof to its junction with Flint river; thence straight to the head of St. Mary's river; and thence down along the middle of St. Mary's river to the Atlantic Ocean."

Thus making the middle of the Mississippi river the western, and the thirty-first degree of north latitude the southern boundary of these cessions. With these boundaries, the ceded lands do not include any of the territory west of the Mississippi; and the Territory of Iowa and the States of Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana, and all the country west of them, are free from any claim of the States growing out of the deeds of cession. So, also, those parts of the States of Mississippi and Alabama, south of the thirty-first degree of north latitude, and the whole of the Territory of Florida, are equally untouched by these grants. It may be well further to specify what the grants do not touch, before seeing what they did cover and convey. They did not, then, touch any portion of the old thirteen States, as at present bounded, or any portion of the present States of Maine, Vermont, and Kentucky. A very small portion of the State of Tennessee was ceded by the deed of cession of North Carolina; but the remnants of land were so scattered, and so badly located, that the Government has never yet supposed it a matter of interest to cause their survey, or to open a land office and attempt a sale of lands within that State. Indeed, it seems now certain that nothing is to come to the common Treasury from the public lands in Tennessee, as a bill passed this body at its last session, without a dissenting vote, to cede the remnants of those lands to that State without compensation; and a similar bill has again passed by the same vote, at the present session. Thus the whole cession of North Carolina is disposed of, without bringing one dollar into the Treasury; for he found that the law for the admission of the State of Tennessee, described the State as "all the territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina." He did not mention this fact to the prejudice of that old, patriotic, Republican State. Her cession had given to the Union one of the proudest of the present sisters of the family; and it was made with a patriotic devotion to that Union not inferior to that which governed the action of any other of the seven ceding States. Yet when a claim for a reversion, or an equitable remainder, was interposed against this Government, a fact like this spoke volumes in relation to that equity. It showed, beyond the power of question, what net proceeds one of the ceding States would receive, if the right of reversion to the ceding States alone should be admitted, and the equity claimed should be adjusted by that rule.

There were other facts of a somewhat similar character, to which it might be well to refer in this connection. The cession of Georgia was last made, and comprehended all those portions of the States of Alabama and Mississippi which are north of the thirty-first degree of north latitude; and it is daily contended here, by the friends of this proposition for distribution, and has been regularly so contended, ever since the Cherokee controversy has been known to the country, that the Federal Government, by the terms of this cession, had contracted to pay all and more than the ceded lands were in fact worth. And ever since the late Cherokee treaty, extinguishing the Indian title to the lands in the State of Georgia, this argument, which, previous to that period, was only hypothesis, has been assumed as demonstration. The net proceeds of the Georgia cession, then, must be much like those of North Carolina—nothing. Virginia is claimed to have made the great and material cession, and yet Virginia did not cede Kentucky, the only part of the great unappropriated country, in all probability, falling within her chartered limits. Kentucky was constituted a State from the acknowledged bounds of Virginia, as was Maine, at a much later day, from those of Massachusetts. These facts were not mentioned, or referred to, for the purpose of detracting from the patriotic liberality, public spirit, and devotion to the Union, of Virginia. Far from it. She claimed the territory northwest of the Ohio rather by conquest than by chartered right, and she ceded her claim, whatever it might be, as a common fund to the Union, upon terms which yet show, upon their face, that her object was the extension of those free Republican principles she has ever so dearly cherished, and so fearlessly maintained, rather than any pecuniary consideration to herself, or even to the Union.

These facts, however, show that from all the ceded territory southwest of the Ohio, no net proceeds were to come, or ever can come, into the common Treasury, either for distribution or for any other purpose.

It would be proper here to extend a little farther an idea following from a former position of his argument. He had attempted to show, and he thought upon unanswerable grounds, that if any right of remainder, or reversion to the ceded lands, or to their proceeds, whether legal or equitable, can be sustained in favor of any of the States, it must result to the ceding States only, as it was only asserted and claimed as an inference and consequence of law or equity, from the grants, and the alleged object and purpose of the grants. He now wished to inquire, upon the supposition that such a right should be admitted, what would be the state of things with the ceding States. He found, upon a careful examination of the deeds of cession, that the descriptions of the territory ceded by New York and Massachusetts were identical, and without stopping to inquire where, within the present bounds of the United States, that territory was, who should determine what the rights of these States would respectfully be to such remainder or reversion? Let the cessions of Connecticut and South Carolina be examined with the same view, and let those who could, answer these inquiries.

He would now proceed to show where and what the ceded lands in fact were, regardless of the question as to what State may have originally owned them, or what State may now be entitled to a remainder or reversion of them, or their proceeds. Those portions of the States of Alabama and Mississippi north of the thirty-first degree of north latitude, the States of Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, and Michigan, and the Territory of Wisconsin, embrace the country, and, from a calculation made at the land office, which he held in his hand, the whole number of acres, within those districts of country, were,

ally ceded, including the cession of Georgia 224,546,974
 Out of these lands Congress has made certain specific grants, viz:
 For military bounty lands, (acres) 4,266,615
 For schools, roads, canals, &c. - 8,673,278
 And there was reserved in Indian treaties, to be sold for the exclusive benefit of Indians, - 6,830,051
 And certain private claims upon the lands northwest of the Ohio, existing previous to the cessions, have been since allowed, and have taken, - 2,310,265
 22,080,209

Thus leaving the number of acres for sale, and to produce money to the Treasury, out of the whole cessions, 202,466,765
 Of this quantity of the ceded lands, the Indian title still remains not yet extinguished, or, in other words, the United States have not purchased, the following parcels, viz:
 In the State of Ohio, (acres) 107,816
 Do. Indiana, 504,800
 Do. Michigan, 8,932,440
 In the Ter'y of Wisconsin, 17,377,675
 26,922,731

This leaves the number of acres owned by the United States, by clear title, and which could have been and can be sold for the benefit of the common Treasury, - 175,544,034
 Out of this number of acres, the United States had, on the 30th of September, 1839, sold, and received pay for, - 69,678,915

Leaving, of the ceded lands, susceptible of sale, on the 1st October, 1839, this number of acres, though portions had not been surveyed and made "subject to sale," - 105,865,119
 These lands are situate in the following States and Territories, viz:
 In the State of Ohio, (acres) 1,801,394
 Do. Indiana, 4,984,354
 Do. Illinois, 19,436,870
 Do. Michigan, 20,998,493
 Do. Alabama, 19,940,585
 Do. Mississippi, 11,549,003
 In the Ter'y of Wisconsin, 27,154,420

These statements, as will be seen, exclude the remnants of the ceded land belonging to the United States in the State of Tennessee. The reasons for that exclusion have been before given, and the simple fact only requires mention here. It will be seen from the above table that a very large proportion of these lands are in States extensively settled; and whether, from the fact of those settlements, and the improvements consequent upon them, the lands are worth more than the average of the public lands, or whether they are, from this same fact of extensive settlements, culled and inferior lands, he had no means of determining. The term of years for which many of these lands have remained in the market, and subject to sale at $1 25 per acre, to any purchaser who should choose to enter them, is certainly not favorable evidence either as to their quality or location, or both.

Such, however, is the extent and present condition of this ceded territory, and such the fund from which any distribution, rested upon the deeds of cession, must be made, and not from that great public domain of the Union, the most of which has been acquired; not from the States, but by purchases from foreign Governments, by the powers of the Union, and with the "property," the money, of the Union.

This would bring him to a further position, which, in his mind, was most material to the present discussion. The assumption was that on equity, on the part of the States, to the distribution proposed, did actually exist, from whatever source that equity was derived, and upon whatever foundation it might rest. Still the equity set up and contended for was merely to the net proceeds from the sales of the public lands, and it became, therefore, material to determine what was "net proceeds" from those sales, in an equitable sense, between the common Treasury and the several States; inasmuch as the proposition was advocated by its friends, as he had before shown, upon equitable and not legal grounds. What expenses, then, should be deducted from the gross proceeds to determine the equitable net amount for distribution? He would name the heads of those expenditures, which he thought such a rule would deduct, and he would leave it to those who should follow him in the discussion to point out his errors, if any, upon either side. That he should not include any head of expenditure which ought to be excluded, he felt sure but that he should omit some which ought to be included, his very imperfect acquaintance with the subject rendered more than probable. The following, however, were the heads of expenditure which he would present:

1. The purchase money for lands paid to the Indians in hand.
2. The annuities stipulated by treaty to be paid to the Indians in lieu of purchase money.
3. The expenses of holding Indian treaties for the purchase of lands.
4. All payments stipulated to be made to Indians, by the treaties with them, for buildings, schools, mechanics' tools, mills, implements of husbandry, and the like; all these being payments in lieu of purchase money.
5. All expenses of the removal of the Indians from the lands, and of their subsistence on the way and at their new homes, when made from the Treasury of the United States.
6. All expenses of the survey of the lands for sale.
7. All expenses of the Surveyor General's offices.
8. All expenses of the local land offices, which are not paid in commissions upon the money received.
9. All expenses of suits to establish the title to the lands, or to maintain it, and to protect the lands from trespasses.
10. All expenses of the General Land Office at Washington, and of the offices to preserve the records of titles elsewhere.
11. The five per cent. commissions reserved to the new States, by the terms of their admission into the Union.

All the expenditures, under all these heads, have been incurred, and must have been incurred, to enable the United States to perfect, preserve, and maintain, the titles to the lands, to protect the lands from waste, and to make sale of them, and thus execute the alleged trust of paying the debt of the Revolution from their avails. "Net proceeds," therefore, could not be looked for until these expenses were paid beyond the assumed trust.

It was proper here to say, that most of the land bills heretofore introduced, and which had occupied the attention of Congress at former sessions, either did not prescribe any rule to determine what should be considered net proceeds, or prescribed a rule erroneous in principle, and unjust to the National Treasury. He believed there had been six of these bills presented to, and considered by, this body; and the first four provided for the distribution of the "net proceeds" of the sales of the lands, without declaring what should be considered such, or laying down any rule by which that should be determined. The two last declared that the expenditures under the following heads should be deducted from the gross proceeds, and what remained should be held to be net proceeds, viz:

1. The salaries and expenses on account of the General Land Office.
2. The expenses of surveying the public lands.
3. The salaries and expenses of the Surveyor General's offices.
4. The salaries, commissions, etc. of the registers and receivers of the local land offices.
5. The five per cent. upon the amount of sales, reserved by the terms of their admission into the Union, to the States in which the lands are situated.

The deductions here provided for, it cannot fail to be seen, are merely such as are indispensable to keep the system of sales in operation, and do not make any allowances for the expense of acquiring the Indian title, of defending that title, and clearing it from the Indian possessions, and other incumbrances—expenses as necessary to bring the lands into the market for sale, as those of the land system itself. Such a rule of net proceeds was to charge upon the common Treasury, and the revenues of the country derived from other sources, the cost of the lands; and of acquiring their possession, and to divide their avails among the States discharged from that cost.

This brought him to another and most important position in this discussion. It was that, upon the fair rule of calculating the net proceeds of the lands which he had laid down, there never had yet been any net proceeds, either for application to the debt of the Revolution, or for distribution, whether the whole public domain, or the lands ceded by the States only, were taken into the account. This proposition might be startling to some members of the body, as it would no doubt be to a very large proportion of their common constituents, and yet he had taken the utmost pains to learn the truth from the proper offices, and he held in his hand the official statements to verify this position. He had procured the data from which he spoke during the last session of Congress, and the accounts were brought up to the 30th of September, 1839, but nothing had transpired, since that time, which could materially vary the results then exhibited. The facts were taken from the records in the archives of the country, and must, if any thing could, lay the foundation for correct and safe conclusions.

He would first state the account with the whole public domain, as these records presented it. He would not detail items, as that would be tedious and unprofitable, but the statement before him showed that the cost to the United States of Louisiana, as purchased from France, and Florida, as purchased from Spain, the payments to and for the State of Georgia in conformity with the terms of the cession, the expenses of the General Land Office, of the local land offices, including salaries, commissions, and the like, the expenses of surveys, including those of the Surveyor General's Offices, and the five per cent. upon the amount of sales to the new States, had together, up to the 30th of September, 1839, amounted to - $49,081,172 20

A similar statement from the Indian Office, made upon the principle of estimating perpetual annuities at a capital which, invested at five per cent. would produce the annuity, annuities for terms of years at their actual amount, and life annuities as annuities for twenty-one years, and all other amounts as actually paid, or stipulated by treaties to be paid and yet due, showed that the amounts actually paid and liabilities incurred by the United States for the extinguishment of Indian title to different portions of the public lands, and for the removal of the Indians therefrom, up to the 30th September, 1839, were - 85,974,052 84

Making the whole actual cost of the public domain, to the Treasury of the nation, up to the date named - $135,055,225 04

A statement from the General Land office shows that the gross receipts of money from the sale of lands, up to the same date, was but - 116,198,179 15

Thus leaving a balance against the lands, and in favor of the Treasury, upon a simple comparison, between the expenses for their account and the receipts from them, of - - - $18,857,045 89

This is the result of the statement of the account with the whole public domain. A statement applicable to the lands ceded by the States simply, making the number of acres of land surveyed and sold, and the amount of purchase money received, the rule of proportion of charge as to the items to be divided, such as the expenses of the General Land Office, and the like, and preserving the principles of the former statement as to annuities, presents the following result.

Payments to and for the State of Georgia, the five per cent. to the new States, all the expenses of the local land offices, and the proportion of the expense of the General Land Office, of surveys, and the like, applicable to the ceded lands, up to the 30th of September, 1839, had amounted to $16,416,589 11

The proportion applicable to these lands, of the expenses of extinguishment of the Indian title, including the annuities and other liabilities yet unpaid, as nearly as it is possible to ascertain the proportion from the treaties and appropriations, is 83,476,882 84

Thus showing the actual cost to the Treasury of the ceded lands, up to the 30th of September, 1839, to be - $99,893,371 95

A statement from the General Land Office shows that the whole gross receipts from the sales of the ceded lands, up to the date mentioned, have been - $98,786,265 56

This leaves a balance in favor of the Treasury, and against the ceded lands alone considered, and simply comparing the expenses for their account with the receipts from their sales, up to the date named, of - $1,107,206 39

There might be slight errors in these calculations, but it would be perfectly apparent to any one who would make himself acquainted with the subject, that if the results varied from the exact truth, that variation would be found to be in favor of and not against the lands, in either statement. No items of expenditure had been included which had not been incurred, while it was scarcely possible that some should not have been overlooked, which should justly have been embraced. It should also be remarked here, that nothing is included in either of these statements to cover the expenses of the various Indian wars which have grown out of the treaties for the purchase of lands, and the execution of them by the removal of the Indians from the lands sold.

There have been, then, no net proceeds from the sales of the public lands even to apply towards the extinguishment of that Revolutionary debt which the cessions of the States are said to have been made to extinguish, and much less to distribute to the States over and above that debt. So far, therefore, the equities are palpably in favor of the National Treasury instead of the ceding, or any other States, and it would seem to be in time to talk about the indebtedness of this Government to the States, by reason of the lands, when its Treasury shall have been reimbursed, the money paid, and liabilities incurred, on their account.

To meet an allegation often made, and which had been repeated in the course of this debate, that injustice had been done to the States, and they had been made to suffer in their pecuniary interests, by the refusal of the late President to sign the bill which passed both Houses of Congress during his administration, providing for a temporary distribution of the net proceeds of the public lands among the States, he would lay down another position, which the facts would sustain. It was that the States received from the United States more money, under the deposit act of 1836, than they would have received under either of the six land bills which had been introduced into that body, by an honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY] if either of those bills had been passed and become laws, and especially the one which did pass the two Houses, and failed for the want of the signature of the President.

The first four of these bills, including that one which passed the two Houses, proposed to make the distribution for a period of five years, commencing with 1833, and ending with 1837, and simply directed that "the net proceeds" should be distributed in a certain manner, without prescribing any rule by which net proceeds should be determined. As, therefore, the rule he had laid down was manifestly the fair and just one, he should make the comparison based upon that rule. Before proceeding to do that, however, it was due to the subject to remark, that the period selected by the honorable Senator for the operation of these bills, turned out to be far the most fortunate for his plan of distribution, and for this comparison in that aspect, which could have been selected since the commencement of the land system. It was a fact that the receipts into the Treasury from the lands, during the five years named, were more than half of the whole amount of those receipts from the first land sales in 1794, to the close of the year 1839, a period of forty-five years. It had already been shown, in another place, that the entire receipts of money from the whole public domain, up to the 30th September 1839, were - $116,198,179 15

During the five years commencing with the 1st of January, 1833, and ending with the 31st of December, 1837, those receipts were:

" 1834,	6,099,981 04
" 1835,	15,999,804 11
" 1836,	25,167,833 06
" 1837,	7,007,523 04
	$59,247,426 09

Thus leaving the gross receipts of the remaining forty years to amount but to the sum of - $56,950,753 06

Being less than the amount received in the five years covered by these first four land bills, by the sum of - $2,296,673 03

If, then, the sum received by the States under the deposit law of 1836, was greater than the net proceeds of the lands for these five years, it will not be pretended that any other five years could have been, or can now be selected, which will produce a more favorable result for the distribution interests. A comparison from the records will establish the following facts. The expenses of the General Land Office, of the local land offices, of the Surveyor General's offices, of surveys, including all salaries, commissions, and contingent expenses of commissions to settle land claims, and the five per cent. to the new States, for the five years from 1833 to 1837 inclusive, amounted to $5,368,843 70

The amount actually expended in the Indian Department during the same five years, as ascertained from the appropriations and accounts, exclusive of Indian wars, and the suppression of Indian hostilities, was - 18,743,314 93

The value of Indian annuities created, and stipulated by treaties to be paid, during that five years, estimating the annuities for terms of years at their actual amount, those for life at twenty-one years, and those which are perpetual as a capital which, invested at five per cent. will produce the annuities, was - 5,933,400 00

The value of the annuities resting as a charge upon the lands at the commencement of the five years, and which could not produce net proceeds until those debts were discharged, was - 6,675,675 00

The amount of the money paid to the States under the deposit act of 1836, was - 28,101,644 97

These sums together, make a total of - - -	64,822,878 60
The gross receipts from the lands for the five years, as has been shown, amounted to - - -	59,247,426 09

Thus showing a deficiency in the receipts to meet the payments for account of the lands for the period, to discharge the liabilities contracted for and resting upon the lands, and to make the payments to the States, which were actually made under the deposit act, of the sum of - $5,575,452 51

These charges and payments, for the five years, may seem large, and they are so; but it must not be forgotten that, while we sold lands rapidly during that inflated and speculating period, we also purchased rapidly from the Indians; and an examination of the transactions of the Government will show that more Indian title was extinguished, and a greater number of Indians were removed west of the Mississippi, during the period in question, than in any other period of equal length, if not more than ever previously. It may be supposed that the fourth item in the statement, that for the annuities existing previously to the commencement of the five years, is improperly charged in the account. It is not easy to see how the lands could be said, with truth, to produce net proceeds for distribution, while debts legally and equitably chargeable upon them, debts contracted for their purchase, remained unpaid; but if this item be mistaken, another of a less amount, the annual current annuities for the five years, should unquestionably be substituted. They would make an amount of $1,668,918 75 for the period in question, and such a change in the statement would still leave a deficiency in the fund to meet the payments of $568,696 26. In any shape, therefore, in which the comparison can be made, the sum paid to the States was more than the net proceeds of the lands would have given them for the period which has been examined.

The later land bills proposed to make the distribution for the five years commencing with 1837 and ending with 1841, and although they prescribed a rule, and, as he thought, one most erroneous and unjust to the Treasury, for determining what should be considered net proceeds, yet under those bills and that rule the States could not have received any thing like the sum which has been paid to them under the deposit act. Indeed it does not now seem likely that the whole gross proceeds of the sales for these five years will reach the amount so paid over to the States. It was not his intention to enter into any discussion now as to the character of those payments and whether they were to be viewed in the light of deposits or distributions. When the bill was on its passage, which authorized the payments to be made, he attempted to show that they would be distributions in effect, if they were not in form, and he believed all would now admit that such was likely to be the result.

A single remark further under this head, and he would indulge what seemed to be the wish of the Senate, by yielding to a motion to adjourn. It should not escape attention that, in all these statements and comparisons, nothing has been taken from the proceeds of the lands to be applied to the debt of the Revolution, to the payment of which it is said they were pledged by the States; nothing to pay the Revolutionary pensions, in equity certainly a part of the Revolutionary debt, and for several years last past amounting to some three millions per annum; nothing to pay the expenses of Indian wars prosecuted for the recovery and protection of these lands, and two of which, within the five years from 1833 to 1837 inclusive, took from the National Treasury probably not less than twenty millions of dollars.

Here the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 28.—Mr. WRIGHT said, if he had succeeded in making himself understood yesterday, it would be recollected that he sought to establish the general position that the proposition now before the Senate, to distribute the proceeds of the public lands to the States, was, in principle, identical with a proposition to distribute any other equal portion of the revenue, derived from customs, or from any other source, or an equal portion of the proceeds of any other property of the United States. His course of argument was,

First. That the power given by the Constitution to Congress, over the lands or "territory" and over all "other property belonging to the United States," was identical.

Second. That the deeds of cession from the States contained no provisions laying a foundation for "claims" upon the lands, or their proceeds, in favor of the ceding States themselves, much less in favor of the other States, within the meaning of the second clause of the third section and fourth article of the Constitution.

Third. That any such "claims," if existing by legal inference and consequence from the cessions, and whether of a legal or equitable character, could only so exist in favor of the seven ceding States, and not in favor of all the States, to which this proposition proposed to distribute the proceeds of the public lands.

Fourth. That no such "claims" flowing from the cessions, either by express provision, or by legal inference and consequence, can attach to any other than the ceded lands and their proceeds, while the proposition under discussion is to distribute the proceeds of the whole public lands, including as well the proceeds of the public lands acquired by purchase as of those ceded by the States.

Fifth. That if, as is insisted by some, there be equitable "claims" in favor of the States to the net proceeds of the public lands, after the payment of the debt of the Revolution, no such claims can yet exist, because that debt is not paid, and cannot be, while the Revolutionary pensioners remain a charge upon the Treasury; because no part of the proceeds of the lands have yet been applied towards the payment of the Revolutionary or any other debt, except the expenses incurred for account of the lands themselves; and because, whether the account be stated with the whole public domain, or with the ceded lands only, the whole proceeds have not yet equalled those expenses.

Sixth. That the sum paid to the States under the deposit act of 1836 is greater than any sum they could have received under any of the former land bills, if either of those bills had passed and become a law, and consequently any equity in favor of the States thus attempted to be established, had been cancelled by payment in money.

He would now pass to another view of the subject. Much had been said, in times gone by, of the severity, the injustice, the cruelty, of our Indian policy—of our driving "the poor Indian" from his home, and the graves of his fathers, without a just compensation for his lands or a suitable provision for himself. At one period during the late Administration, complaints of this character took a political and partisan direction, and the venerable patriot then at the head of the Government, with the friends who supported him, were charged with cruelty and extortion towards these ignorant and unprotected natives. The treaties making for their lands were broadly and loudly censured as oppressive and unjust, as securing no adequate return to the red man for the value of his property wrenched from him; and his removal from the lands, in conformity with his treaty stipulations, was characterized as nothing short of a violent exercise of arbitrary power—an expulsion by force from his native hearth and his native home.

Perhaps impressed with a sense of the partial justice of these complaints, the then President, General Jackson, directed a change of the policy as to the purchases of land, and a treaty was entered into with the Chickasaw tribe of Indians, covering their whole extensive country east of the Mississippi, in the month of May, 1834, upon the new terms proposed. These terms, were, in brief, that the United States should become the trustee of the Indians, without compensation, for the survey and sale of the lands and the removal of the tribe to their new homes in the West, and should account for and pay over to them the whole proceeds, merely deducting the actual expenses of the execution of the trust; but reserving no commissions or other compensation for the superintendence and responsibility. This new policy met the approbation of this body, as the treaty was ratified here, by the vote of two-thirds of the members present necessarily, and thus became the supreme law of the land, as between the United States and these Indians, and as between the Treasury of the United States and any proceeds from the Chickasaw lands. He well recollected that, at the time, this treaty was freely and universally spoken of as the commencement of a new and more just policy in our dealings with the Indians, and the subject impressed itself more strongly upon his mind, because it was substantially the policy which his own State had pursued in the purchase of the Indian lands within her limits, and subject to her pre-emptive right, ever since he had had any knowledge of her Indian relations.

His present impression was, that this treaty with the Chickasaws was among the last which had been made between this Government and the Indians, covering any large extent of lands. Was this new, more liberal, more just, more humane policy to prevail hereafter? Who would rise in his place here, and say it was not? Who would contend that, for the sake of bringing money into the Treasury for distribution to the independent States of this Union, speculations were again to be attempted in the purchases of Indian lands? If no one, then the question of proceeds for such distribution, beyond the unsold lands to which the Indian title has been already extinguished, is at rest forever.

The extent of the interest in the unsold lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished, he was unable to state, as he had not possessed himself of the facts upon that point, except as to the ceded lands. In reference to them he had done so, with great labor, and he had reason to believe with great accuracy; and as some of the leading features of this discussion made the facts upon this point most important, he would again refer to the exact figures, in another view which he was now called upon to take of this equity in favor of the States, growing out of the cessions.

The assumption and argument is, that the cessions were made to pay the debt of the Revolution, with a resulting equity, not in favor of the ceding States, but of all the States of the Union at any period, not expressed upon the face of the deeds of cession, but following as an equitable consequence from all the transactions connected with and relating to the cessions. This position and argument pre-supposes that the payment of the debt was the first condition of the trust, and that the remainder over to the States was the residue of the fund after the payment of that debt out of it. The equity contended for, therefore, must be to that residue of the common fund constituted by the ceded lands, for it would be trifling to say that the cessions were made to the common Treasury to constitute a fund for the payment of the debt of the Revolution, with an equity over in favor of the States, to such remainder as might exist after the payment of the debt; and that that equity attaches before one dollar has been taken from the fund towards the payment of the debt, for the payment of which it was exclusively pledged: in other words, to contend that the entire pledge, the very object and purpose of the cession, has become merged in the mere equitable remainder, and that that incidental and inferential equity now swallows up the whole, and more than the whole, fund; the entire proceeds of the whole public domain, over and above the necessary expenses of Administration.

Take then the fair ground of the argument, that the equity, if it exist and can be maintained at all, is to the remainder of the fund to arise from the sales of the ceded lands, after the payment out of it of the debt for which the fund was constituted and pledged. It had been already seen that, of the ceded lands, the Indian title remains yet unextinguished to 26 922,731 acres. If the policy adopted in the Chickasaw treaty is to govern the extinguishment of the title to these lands; if the Indians are to receive the whole proceeds as the Chickasaws do, deducting merely the actual expenses, then no proceeds are here to be realized, either to apply towards the debt, or to strengthen the remaining equity in favor of the States. All that remains, therefore, for both objects, is the quantity of the ceded lands yet unsold and to which the Indian title has already been extinguished. That quantity had been shown to be 105,865,119 acres. A balance in favor of the common Treasury, for the mere expenses upon the ceded lands, has been shown yet to exist to the amount of more than eleven hundred thousand dollars, which should be first paid out of this unsold remainder of the fund. Then the future expenses of management and sale and collection must be deducted from the proceeds. Then the debt of the Revolution, usually so called, existing at the time of the formation of the constitutional Government, was more than one hundred millions of dollars, and after all these demands shall be discharged from the proceeds of the sales of the one hundred and five millions of acres of ceded lands, what do gentlemen suppose will be left for distribution to the States under this alleged resulting equity? Is there a man who believes that the claims specified can be paid from the residuum of the fund? He did not believe there was, and yet he had said nothing of the Revolutionary pensions, as a part of the Revolutionary debt, and which were now a larger sum annually, than could be brought into the Treasury in proceeds from the sales of the ceded lands remaining unsold. Admitting, therefore, for the sake of the argument, the equity claimed and contended for, and which is not admitted for any other purpose, or believed to be sustainable upon the facts, and there does not seem to be any fund upon which it can act in aid of the measure now proposed.

A single other proposition would enable him to come to the close of this part of his argument; and that was one which had been referred to in his opening remarks, and which would now be fully admitted by every friend of the distribution policy in the Senate. It was that the common Treasury could spare nothing from its present revenues, those from all the public lands included, and meet the necessary expenses of the common Government, without an increased supply of means, from some other source of revenue, at least equal to the amount of money distributed under the name of net proceeds of the land sales.

It was his good fortune, after the tedious details he had been compelled to go through, to know, and to be able to say to the Senate, that very brief references of this character would content him upon this point. He had before said his notes were prepared during the last session of Congress. His references, therefore, as a necessary consequence, had been made to the state of the Treasury at that time. The year 1840 was then his test of the proposition—a year when the estimate of revenue, from the proper department of the Government, was less than the estimate of expenditure by one million four hundred thousand dollars. This expected deficiency was to be met, for that year, by the unexpended balance in the Treasury on the first day of it, and by the avails of certain debts due to the Treasury from the banks, growing out of the accumulations of revenue in former years.

Still he had felt it to be his duty, making his remarks now, to apply them, in this respect, to the anticipations for 1841. He found the estimates from the same Department, for the current revenue of the present year, to exceed that of the current expenses by three millions three hundred and thirty thousand dollars; but, at the same time, presenting the two material facts that the collection upon the debts to the Treasury, within the last year, had very nearly consumed that accumulation of means from the revenue of former years, which was then made a reliance, and that an outstanding debt, in the shape of Treasury notes, issued for the expenses of the last year, would fall upon the Treasury for redemption during the present year, over and above the current expenses of the year, which would very nearly consume this surplus of revenue, and all which could be further realized from the debts against the banks, and would only leave in the Treasury, on the 1st of January, 1842, the sum of $324,273, in case every thing shall be realized which is anticipated, and appropriations of Congress shall not exceed by a dollar the estimates of expenditure.

This simple statement will show that, the whole land revenue being retained in the Treasury, it is a matter of reasonable doubt, whether the Government can reach the close of 1841 with a dollar in the Treasury; or whether there will then be found an empty Treasury and an existing debt, and this too without reference to the appropriations of Congress beyond the estimates. The sources of supply are merely conjectural, and the slightest disappointment, in any of the anticipated sources, may change the balance. Then it has been usual for Congress to exceed the estimates in its appropriations, by the sum of one and a half to three millions of dollars, and if that shall be the result of the action of this session, a deficiency of means, without a loan, ceases to be a question. In any event, the facts before Congress and the country, authorized the inference he wished to draw, that the Treasury of the nation could spare nothing from its resources for distribution to the States, or for any other application, without a counterbalancing supply of means from some improved source of revenue, or from loans upon the credit of the country.

This brought him back to the position he had, from the first, been laboring to establish, viz: that a proposition to distribute, to the States of the Union, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, net or gross, in any aspect in which it can be compared with the material facts, is but a proposition to distribute to those States an equal amount of the general revenues of the country, whether the principle or practical effects of the measure be considered.

In reference to this proposition, established by facts and history, as he believed it to be, he had but a very few remarks to make; and as he saw he was exceeding the time to which he had limited himself this morning, he would hasten to his conclusion. He would admit here, as preliminary to what he was about to say in reference to this broad principle upon which the favors of this Government were to be dispensed, that an argument founded upon the possible abuse of a power expressly granted by the Constitution was not a legitimate course of argument, in the field of discussion. Under our system, whatever was granted to Congress had been so granted by the States and the people, and whatever had not been so granted was expressly reserved to the one or the other. If, then, this right of the States to the distribution proposed, or the power of Congress to make it without such right, could be found in the Constitution, that should end his resistance, as matter of principle, and place his action upon the ground of policy alone. But if, as he understood the matter, the right of the States to the money was mere consequential, inferential, constructive, and drawn by doubtful reasoning from the deeds of cession and the circumstances attending that act on the part of the ceding States; and if the powers of Congress to make the distribution are also consequential, inferential, and constructive from the Constitution, and rest upon the unexpressed and doubtful meaning of the deeds of cession, and the still more doubtful objects of those cessions, he should consider an argument, drawn from the possible and probable abuses of such a power, perfectly legitimate to prove that it ought never to have existed, and, if not expressly granted, that it never ought to be drawn into exercise from the most direct construction, much less from one which is forced to leave the Constitution itself and go to other doubtful sources for a resting place.

It should be borne in mind that the position was believed to be established that the passage of the proposition now under consideration, and making the principle contained in it a law of Congress, would be equivalent to an assertion of the power, on the part of Congress, to raise revenue, by taxation or otherwise, and to require property, whether in lands, fortifications, ships, or in any other form, for the purpose of distributing the property itself, or the proceeds of its sale, to the States, in the manner now proposed.

In examining the consequences of the exercise of such a fearful power, it will be necessary to mark the manner of execution, as upon that may depend the form of injury and destruction to our institutions. In any form the consequences may not be less fatal, while the propelling power may be, in any one form, the reverse of that which shall be the moving influence in all the others.

Suppose, then, as the first form of this influence, that the distributions to the States be made without limitation as to the object of expenditure. We thus free the Legislatures of the States from the odium of imposing taxes and burdens upon our common constituents, and take that odious duty upon ourselves; while we leave them to dispense the bounties to the people, which our exactions from their pockets have furnished the means of dispensing. We, in effect, and in practice, convert this Government into a tax-laying and tax-collecting machine, odious and hateful in its action upon the people, and separated from those sensibly beneficent dispensations which render the mildest Government tolerable to a free people, that we may make the Governments of the States dispensers of munificence only, utterly disconnected from those exactions which are among the necessary burdens of all civil Government. Connect with the exercise of this policy the idea, and the fact that this Government exists upon the mere volition of the States; that their pleasure must sustain or terminate it, and that the declination on their part to send representatives into this body may, at any time, put to an end all its active and efficient powers for good or evil, and how long would it be likely to continue, as a mere instrument of taxation, separated from the benefits which the evils of these taxes are to dispense among, and for the benefit of the tax-payers? Commence the system, and where will it be likely to end? Can cupidity be satisfied by giving? And if not, will the benefited States be likely to cease asking? It seemed to him that such a policy must soon drive this Union asunder, by leading to local conflicts and a contention of rival and sectional interests, which can only end in anarchy.

Take the other direction of the influence. Suppose this Government assume, and can exercise the right to prescribe the object of expenditure of the money it shall distribute to a State. All the land bills have proposed to do that, and have enumerated various objects, such as internal improvements, the payment of State debts contracted for such works, education, the colonization of free blacks, and the like. Under such a system of policy, this Government, being the layer of the taxes by indirectness, and the direct dispenser of the bounties, could not fail to swallow up the influence of the State Governments, render them mere bodies politic, without practical utility in the estimation of the people, and finally become a consolidated Republic, and pass rapidly thence to a pecuniary despotism.

Take another view of this exercise of the power, and see if this consequence can be avoided. Taxation for distribution is the policy. The fund is to be expended upon internal improvements, roads, canals, and the like. All such works must be more or less local, and the peculiar condition of one State may render them of great service to its business, most important to its commerce, and, as a consequence of these and other advantages, the means of enhancing the value of its soil and other property in an important degree; while another State may be so situated as to present few facilities for such improvements. So between different classes of citizens, differently situated, in the same State. One class may be located with their property near the proposed improvements, and another class, with an equal amount of property, may be so remote, or otherwise so situated, that they will not only not receive positive benefit, but relative injury, from the proposed public work. Yet all are to be taxed, and in a legal sense equally taxed, for the fund to be distributed. He said in a legal sense equally taxed, because, although he did not propose, upon this occasion, to go into a disquisition upon that point, he thought it would be easy to show that the mode of taxation by duties upon imports, if carried to an extreme, and for purposes of expenditure such as this argument contemplates, not only might but must be most unequal, unjust, and oppressive.

Who are to be benefited in interest by the roads and canals to be constructed? The holders of property, of lands, of houses, of lots, and the trading and commercial men of the country directly. The laboring poor man indirectly and unimportantly, if at all. Take a case. A tax is imposed upon tea, coffee and sugar, for the purpose of raising a fund to construct improvements of this character, or, what is the same thing in principle and effect, to make up to the Treasury the deficiency of the land revenue taken from it for that purpose. A B is a man of property, an extensive land holder, a merchant, or trader, whose business and property are to be directly and materially benefited by the expenditure of the tax upon a canal, or railroad, and he pays the tax cheerfully, and seeks to have it raised. C D is a cartman, whose whole worldly effects are his horse, cart, and harness. The value of them cannot be materially increased by any road or canal, while their utility to him, and the business upon which he depends, may be destroyed by either. These two citizens have the same families to support. What will be their respective proportions of tax upon the articles named of tea, coffee and sugar? He was aware that it had been, at a former day, and perhaps might be with some now, fashionable to call these articles luxuries, and therefore legitimate objects of taxation, but in his understanding they had become, by the habits of our people, as truly necessities as any articles of importation. They were in common and constant use by all classes of our citizens, the wealthy unquestionably making a more free use of them than the poor and dependent. Still, in the case he had supposed, the amount of tax paid upon these articles would be nearly equal between the two families, while there would be no comparison between the amount of property of each, the amount of benefits to each to be derived from the prosecution of a system of internal improvements by canals, railroads, and the like, or between the taxes they would be compelled to pay for the construction of such works, if equally assessed upon property. What must be the consequence of the prosecution of such a policy through the taxing power of this Government thus indirectly exercised? Could it fail to divide the community into classes and localities? To induce him who was the owner of property to be benefited by the proposed improvements, to strive to increase the taxes upon all, and thus swell the fund for distribution, while he who had no property, and would reap comparatively little benefit, being compelled to pay a nearly equal amount of the tax with his rich neighbor, would oppose the policy, and feel himself oppressed by it? Would not the owner of property so situated as to receive little benefit, or relative injury, from such works, feel that the rule of equal taxation, applied to him, and to the man whose property and business were directly benefited, was unequal and unjust? In a direct assessment upon property the valuations would equalize the burdens. Not so when the tax should be indirect and equal, according to the necessities and conveniences of life consumed. Was it not apparent, from these brief suggestions, that such a policy must set the community at variance, and produce strifes the most dangerous to any well regulated society, those strifes which personal and private interests engender?

There was still another aspect in which this policy might be viewed, even more frightful and disturbing. If it was competent for Congress to direct the expenditure of the fund to be distributed to any extent, it could do so to every extent. If its powers could control the State Legislatures in their application of it, the same powers would enable Congress to apply it without the intervention of those Legislatures at all, not infringing upon the territory and jurisdiction of the State. If Congress could declare that the money should be devoted to the purposes of education, it could distribute it to the particular schools, or, per capita, upon the scholars taught. If this could be constitutionally done, the same power would extend to a distribution of money per capita to the whole population of the country for any specified purpose, or for the use of the recipients at pleasure. Establish this power in this Government, and then admit, what cannot be denied, that if Congress can raise money by imposfor distribution to the States or their citizens, it can as well raise it for that purpose by excise, direct taxation, or in any other way in which it can raise revenue at all, and see what a state of things may be produced by the practical application of this splendid policy. Push forward the interests to be enlisted, until the revenue from customs fails to satisfy them; try the excise, and it must soon also fail; and then come to a direct tax, to be levied upon all property by a fair valuation, and distributed per capita to the whole people, and we shall have a system of agrarianism, established under our Constitution and laws, more perfect than any which had come to his knowledge, devised by the most radical Loco Foco in the land. Gentlemen might say this was putting an extreme case and an improbable supposition. So he considered the proposition for distribution of any portion of the public revenues, in any form, and to any parties, other than for the legitimate expenditures of the common Government; and more especially to distribute a material portion of the necessary revenues of a deficient Treasury. If the latter was constitutional and lawful, he left it for those who could do so to show why the former was not equally so in principle, however much less wise it might be considered in practice. All these considerations had produced the most clear conviction in his mind that the power of distribution, in any form, ought not to exist, and, not being found in the Constitution among the enumerated and expressly granted powers, that Congress ought not to assume it from distant implication, or upon doubtful construction.

Another argument had been used in favor of this proposition, which he wished very briefly to notice. It was that the credit of the States was depressed; and it was our duty to aid in raising them again, and restoring their stocks and bonds to a current and par value. He differed from the gentleman upon the other side in relation to our duties touching the State debts and the State credits. In his opinion, our duties would be best discharged by attending to the business of this Government, and leaving the States to attend to theirs; by exercising the taxing powers given to us by the Constitution, to pay the debts and sustain the credit and faith and honor of the Union, and leaving the sovereign States to provide for their own debts, in their own time and way, and through their own powers of taxation. We seemed to forget that the constituency is the same in both cases. The people to be taxed in each State are the same, whether the tax be imposed by a law of Congress, or by the authority of the State, and the powers of each State to impose taxes upon its inhabitants, for its purposes, are as plenary as are ours to impose taxes upon the inhabitants of all the States, for the purposes of the common Government. He would be the last man to do any act intentionally to injure any State, or its credit; and might we not, by an interference with their debts and their credit, not entrusted to our care and keeping, actually inflict injury while intending to benefit them? Their stocks and bonds were said to be depressed in the foreign markets, and in the hands of foreign holders, but how came they so depressed, and by whom had the depression been produced? By these same foreign holders and purchasers. What are we told is the actual condition, at this time, of large amounts of these securities abroad? Not that they have been sold in the markets, even at depressed prices, or sold at all, but that they have been hypothecated for comparatively trifling advances, and under conditions of forfeiture which have already attached. He could not vouch for the amount of these securities so situated, but he spoke from public report, which had prevailed through the newspapers, and elsewhere, for many months, without contradiction which had met his notice, when he said that about a hundred millions in amount were supposed to be thus hypothecated, and that the average advances were said not materially to exceed 50 per cent. upon the par value. If we proceed, by our legislation and the application of our means, to raise these stocks, thus situated, thus voluntarily depressed by the holders, up to par, is there not danger that we shall stimulate their cupidity to perfect the forfeiture before the States can command the means to redeem their pledges, and thus, in effect, make fortunes for these holders of the hypothecated stocks, and throw into the current markets, against the States, debts double in amount to the considerations they will have received? If such should be a consequence of our interference, does any one doubt that the injured States would call upon Congress to pay that portion of their debts to which its gratuitous action shall have given force and value, without consideration to them? Let the States manage these matters themselves. They understand the terms upon which their securities are held at home and abroad, and their own interests in regard to them; nor are we at liberty to assume that our interference is necessary to protect their faith. The holders have taken the stocks at depressed prices by agreement, and equity between them and their debtors demands that the future regulation of the value of the securities should be left with them.

Another ground upon which this policy of distribution was urged in some portions of the country, if not here, was, that it would favor the protection of American industry and American interests, by calling for an increase of duties upon imports. He had addressed the Senate, a few days since, upon this point, and regretted to find that he had been so unfortunate as to be understood by very few, and entirely misunderstood by many. He would now briefly restate the substance of the argument he then intended to make, when he would yield the floor to the distinguished Senator [Mr. CLAY] who was to follow him.

In the minds of those who advocated the measure of distributing the proceeds of the public lands to the States, upon the ground above stated, he supposed the reasoning to be that, as the Treasury now requires all the revenue it derives, both from the customs and the lands, if the revenue from the lands be taken from it, that from the customs must be increased in a like amount, thus raising the rates of duty upon imports, and consequently adding to the protection afforded by the present laws. His effort was to show that this conclusion did not follow from the premises, as a necessary consequence, for these reasons.

A duty, whatever may be its rate, affords no protection, while the importer of the foreign product or fabric, against which the protection is required, holds sole and exclusive possession and control of the market. Such a duty may yield a rich revenue, and fill the Treasury, but until its operation commences to be exclusive and prohibitory upon the imported article, it affords no protection to the American competing interest. When it does commence to be exclusive and prohibitory, and thus begins to afford protection, by giving a portion of the market to the domestic interest, the necessary consequence must be a diminution of revenue from that duty in the same degree, and to the same extent, the rate of duty remaining unchanged. These seemed to him to be positions too plain to require illustration.

He then contended that to separate permanently from the Treasury a source of internal revenue so productive as that of the public lands, might endanger, instead of aiding, the protective policy, and his reasoning to support this conclusion was, that an increase of the rate of a duty might not increase, and might actually diminish, the amount of revenue derived from that duty, though the increase of the rate would increase the protection just as far as it should have the effect to diminish importation: that when the diminution of importation should be greater in the proportion than the increase of the rate of the duty, the revenue would be diminished, though the protection would be increased: that if then it should become necessary to increase the amount of revenue to be derived from this particular importation, the only way to accomplish that object would be to reduce the rate of the duty, and thus surrender the protection afforded to the necessity for revenue: that to avoid such a necessity, as far as possible, it was the true policy of the interests seeking protection, to foster and preserve, and not to squander or give away, every fair source of internal revenue, that the Treasury might be made, to some extent at least, independent of importations, and that some duties partially exclusive and prohibitory in their effects might be preserved in a permanent tariff, without producing an empty Treasury. That the policy now advocated, of making the Treasury exclusively dependent upon a revenue by impost, must place the protected interests in entire subjection to the necessity for revenue, and, therefore, make it impossible to establish any system of protection which would not be subject to be surrendered to that necessity, whenever the fluctuations of trade and the ever-varying changes of importations should interpose it. That Congress cannot compel, but only invite, importations, in any branch of trade, and that, therefore, when our Treasury shall be made solely dependent upon revenue from imposts, our system of protection may be placed more within the control of foreign interests than our own, as the former interests must control, to a great extent, our import trade, and may, to a very great extent, our revenues from that source. That, while we have sources of internal revenue from which we can supply our Treasury, we may, by countervailing legislation, counteract foreign policy hostile to our interests; but when we must have the revenue, we may not be able to adopt the countervailing measures required, consistently with that necessity: And that, the internal revenue from the lands being disposed of, the only means within the power of Congress to escape an entire dependence upon impost, were internal excise and direct taxation—means for raising revenue which no man could hope Congress would ever adopt merely to preserve the protective policy.

Such is a brief outline of the argument he offered to the Senate upon the former occasion referred to; and he would not go farther in a repetition of it now. He did not know that the views were sound, but he thought them worthy of mature consideration before this proposed disposition of the land revenue should be made, upon the ground of favoring protection. He could not so view its tendency, or believe that such would be its practical effects; and, as one favorable to the policy of protection, as incidental to the raising of the necessary revenue for the National Treasury, he should find cause for opposition to it on this ground.

SPEECH OF MR. CALHOUN.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

In Senate, January 30, 1841.—In reply to the speeches of Mr. WEBSTER and Mr. CLAY, on Mr. CRITTENDEN'S amendment to distribute the revenue from the public lands among the States.

MR. CALHOUN said no one who had attended to this debate could doubt that the cession of Virginia, on which the right to distribute the revenue from the public lands had heretofore been placed, was altogether too narrow to support that measure. The portion of the public domain ceded by her is small in amount, when compared with the whole, and by far the better portion of it had already been disposed of; leaving a residue altogether too inconsiderable to effect the object intended by the distribution. The other, and much the larger portion of the public domain, consisting of Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, and the entire region West of the Mississippi river, was purchased out of the common fund of the Union, and no construction which could be put on the deed of cession from Virginia could possibly apply to it. This was seen and felt by the two leading advocates of this amendment on the other side of the Chamber, [Mr. CLAY and Mr. WEBSTER,] and they accordingly endeavored to find some other ground on which to place the right, broad enough to support the whole; and found it, as they supposed, in the provision of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power to dispose of the territories and other property belonging to the United States. In this they both concurred, so far as the revenue derived from the lands was concerned. But the Senator from Massachusetts, with bolder views than his associate, extended the right of distributing, as I understood him, to the entire revenue—comprehending as well that received from taxes as from lands.

[Mr. WEBSTER interposed, and denied that he had said so.]

I stand corrected, and am happy to hear the denial of the gentleman. I had so understood him, and am grieved that he had so restricted the right as to exclude the revenue from taxes. But I cannot be mistaken in asserting that both of the Senators concur in regarding the power conferred in the provision referred to as having no limitation whatever but the discretion of Congress. If such be the true construction, it would, of course, give the right of making the proposed distribution; which presents the question, has Congress the right of disposing of the public domain, and all the other property belonging to the Union, and the revenue derived therefrom, as it pleases, without any constitutional restrictions whatever?

Before I proceed to discuss that question, it will be well to ascertain what is the extent and value of the property embraced. The public domain, as has been frequently stated in the course of the debate, embraces more than one thousand millions of acres; and the other property includes the public buildings, dock and navy yards, forts, arsenals, magazines, ships of war, cannon, arms of all descriptions, naval stores, and munitions of war. It is difficult to estimate the value of the whole. The public domain alone, according to the estimate of the gentlemen, (not mine,) at $1 25 per acre, is worth upwards of $1,200,000,000; and, including the value of the other property, the whole, at the lowest estimate, must far exceed $1,500,000,000, and probably would equal not less than $2,000,000,000. Such is the extent and value of the property over which the two Senators claim for Congress unlimited and absolute right to dispose of at its good will and pleasure. And the question recurs, have they such right? A graver question has never been presented for our consideration, whether we regard the principles, the amount of property, or the consequences involved.

Now, sir, in order to test the right, it is my intention to propound a few questions to the Senators, to which I hope they will give explicit answers. Suppose, then, in the progress of time, an administration should come in, (I make no allusion to the next,) which should think an established church indispensable to uphold the morals, the religion, and the political institutions of the country: would it have the right to select some one of the religious sects—say the Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Episcopalian, or Catholic—and erect it into a splendid hierarchy, by endowing it out of this ample fund?

[Mr. WEBSTER. The Constitution expressly prohibits it.]

I hear the answer with pleasure. It assigns the true reason. Here, then, we have a limitation in the Constitution, by the confession of the Senator; and, of course there is one restriction at least on the unlimited right which he and his friend claimed for Congress over this vast fund. Having made good this step, I proceed to take another.

Suppose, then, that such an Administration should undertake to colonize Africa, with the view of christianizing and civilizing it, and, for that purpose, should propose to vest this vast fund, or a portion of it, in the Colonization Society: would Congress have the right of doing so? Or, to take a still stronger case. Suppose a majority of Congress should become Abolitionists: would it have the right to distribute this vast sum among the various Abolition societies, to enable them to carry out their fanatical schemes? The Senator is silent. I did not anticipate an answer. He cannot say yes; and to say no, would be to surrender the whole ground. Nor can he say, as he did, that it is prohibited by the Constitution. I will relieve the Senator. I answer for him: Congress has no such right, and cannot exercise it without violation of the Constitution. But, why not? The answer is simple, but decisive;—because Congress has not the right to exercise any power, except what is expressly granted by the Constitution, or may be necessary to execute the granted powers, and that in question is neither granted, nor necessary to execute a granted power.

Having gained this important point, I next ask the Senators, would Congress have the right to appropriate the whole, or part of this vast fund, to be drawn directly from the Treasury, in payment of the principal or interest of the State bonds? And if not, (as they certainly would not, for the reason already assigned,) has it the right to give it to the States to be so applied? Can it do that indirectly by an agent, which it cannot constitutionally do directly by itself? If so, I would be glad to hear the reason. I might proceed and propound question after question, equally embarrassing; but abstain, lest I should exhaust the patience of the Senate.

But there is one question of a different character, which I must propound, and to which I would be glad to have the answers of the two ingenious and learned Senators. They are both agreed, as I now understand the Senator from Massachusetts, that the revenue from taxes can be applied only to the objects specifically enumerated in the Constitution, and in repudiating the general-welfare principle, as applied to the money power, as far as the revenue may be derived from that source. To this extent, they profess to be good State Rights Jeffersonian Republicans. Now, sir, I would be happy to be informed by either of the able Senators—I regret that one [Mr. CLAY] is not in his seat—by what political alchemy the revenue from taxes, by being vested in land or other property, can, when again turned into revenue by sales, be entirely freed from all the constitutional restrictions to which they were liable before the investment, according to their own confessions? A satisfactory explanation of so curious, and apparently incomprehensible a process, would be a treat.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] failing to find any argument to sustain the broad and unqualified right of distributing the revenue from the public lands as Congress might think proper, sought to establish it by precedent. For that purpose, he cited, as a precedent, the distribution of arms among the States; which he contended sanctioned also the distribution of the revenue from the lands among them. The Senator forgot that it is made the duty of Congress, under an express provision of the Constitution, "to provide for arming the militia;" and that the militia force belongs to the States, and not to the Union; and, of course, that, in distributing arms among the States with the view of arming them, Congress but fulfil a duty enjoined on them by the Constitution.

The palpable misconception, as I must consider it, into which the two Senators have fallen, in reference to this important question, originates, as I conceive, in overlooking other provisions of the Constitution. They seem not to advert to the fact that the lands belong to the United States—that is, to the State, in their united and Federal character; and that the Government, instead of being the absolute proprietor, is but an agent appointed to manage the joint concern. They overlook a still more important consideration—that the United States, in their united and Federal character, are restricted to the express grants of powers contained in the Constitution, which says that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people;" and, also, that the Congress of the United States, as the common agent, is restricted expressly, in the exercise of its powers, to the objects specified in the instrument, and passing such laws only as may be necessary and proper for carrying them into execution. It follows that Congress can have no right to make the proposed distribution, or use its powers to effect any other object, except such as are expressly authorized, without violating and transcending the limits prescribed by the Constitution.

It is thus the whole fabric erected by the arguments of the two Senators falls to the ground, by the giving way of the foundation on which they rest, except the small portion of lands embraced in the Virginia cession; which I will next proceed to show stands on ground not more solid. It will not be necessary, for that purpose, to travel over the arguments which I offered, when last up, against the right to make the distribution, attempted to be deduced from that cession, and which have been so much enlarged and strengthened by the able and lucid speech of the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT.] I propose simply to reply, in this connection, to the arguments of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] who I again have to regret is not in his place.

His first position was, that the resolution of the old Congress, which recommended to the States to cede the land to the Union, held out, as motives, the payment of the debt contracted in the Revolution, and the inducement it offered to the States to adopt the articles of Confederation. From this, he inferred that these constituted the sole objects of the cession. I admit that, if there was any ambiguity in the deeds of cession, as it respects the objects of the cession, a reference to the resolution which proposed it might be fairly made, in order to ascertain the intention of the parties; but that is not the case. The deeds are couched in the broadest and most comprehensive terms, and make an absolute cession of the lands to the United States, as a common fund, without limitation as to the objects.

But the argument on which he mainly relied was, that, although the cession is of the United States in their united and Federal character, to be administered by Congress as a common agent, the use is for the States in their separate and individual character. If the fact were so, the argument would be strong; but it happens to be the very reverse. It is expressly provided in the Virginia cession, that the land should be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of the States, as members of the Confederation or Federal alliance, and for no other use or purpose whatever. The Senator will not venture to deny that common is the very opposite of separate; and, of course, the distinction on which he so much relied, that the use was separate, falls to the ground.

His next position rested on the expression in the deed of cession, "according to their usual respective proportion in the general charge and expenditure," which has been bandied about so often, in this and former discussions on this subject, that I will not go over the argument again, as conclusive as I consider it, as I am sure the Senate must be surfeited to nausea with those words. I take higher ground, which I regard as conclusive, be their meaning what they may.

It will not be denied that the Constitution must override the deeds of cession, and that of Virginia among the rest, whenever they come in conflict; and that, for the plain reason that the parties to both were the same, and had of course a right, in adopting the Constitution, to change or modify the previous acts of cession as they pleased. Now, sir, I repeat, without fear of contradiction, that the Constitution, in superseding the old system of requisition on the States, as the mode of raising the common supplies of the Union, by the system of taxing the people directly, superseded this particular provision, which, all admit, had reference to the former system of requisition. The Senator himself in reality admits such to be the fact, by proposing to distribute the revenue from the lands according to federal numbers—the rule of imposing direct taxes under the Constitution; instead of the assessed value of improved lands—the rule of making requisitions under the old confederation. This provision, then, being thus superseded, the lands are left, as the property of the Union, for the common use of the States which compose it, freed from these disputed words, and without the semblance of a doubt; and the Constitution accordingly speaks of the public lands, in broad and unqualified terms, as belonging to the United States.

The last ground assumed by the Senator was, that as the lands are common property, it is competent for Congress, as the common agent, to divide their proceeds among the United States, as joint owners. It might be true in the case of individuals owning a joint farm, to be worked in common, as supposed by the Senator; but that is not analogous to the case of the United States, where there is a joint concern, for specific objects, with a common agent to carry it into effect, for the joint interest of the concern, without any authority to distribute the profits. In such a case, it would be contrary to the plainest dictates of reason, and the established principles of law, for the agent to undertake to apply to the separate and individual use of the partners, what was intended by them for the joint concern. It would be to make that separate which his principals intended to be common.

When I look, Mr. President, to what induced the States, and especially Virginia, to make this magnificent cession to the Union, and the high and patriotic motives urged by the old Congress to induce them to do it, and turn to what is now proposed, I am struck with the contrast, and the great mutation to which human affairs are subject. The great and patriotic men of former times regarded it as essential to the consummation of the Union, and the preservation of the public faith, that the lands should be ceded as a common fund; but now, men distinguished for their ability and influence, and who are about to assume the high trust of administering the Government, are striving, with all their might, (and that, too, when this fund is most needed,) to undo their holy work. Yes, sir; distribution and cession are the very reverse, in character and effect; the tendency of one is to union, and the other to disunion. The wisest of modern statesmen, and who had the keenest and deepest glance into futurity, (Edmund Burke,) truly said that the revenue is the State; to which I add, that to distribute the revenue, in a confederated community, among its members, is to dissolve the community—that is, with us, the Union; as time will prove, if ever this fatal measure should be adopted.

There is another contrast, not less striking. The States composing the old Confederation, in their extreme jealousy of power, adopted the system of requisition, as the means of supplying the common Treasury; but that proving insufficient, it was changed, with the adoption of the present Constitution, into the system of laying taxes directly on individuals. But, now, it is proposed to restore virtually the exploded system of requisition, but in the reverse order—requisitions of the States on the Union, instead of the Union on the States; and thereby reversing the relation which the wise and patriotic founders of our political institutions regarded as essential to liberty. They regarded it as a fundamental principle, that the people should grant the supplies to the Government, in order to keep it dependent on them. But, now, this is to be reversed; and the Government, in the shape of distribution, is to grant supplies to the people. How is this to be done? How can the Government, which, with all its legislation, does not produce a cent, grant supplies to those who are the producers of all? I will tell you; the supplies to be distributed to the States, are to be collected in a roundabout, concealed manner, under the plausible pretext of taxing luxuries, (wines and silks,) to be paid by the rich, or nobody, as we are told, to meet the requisitions of the Governments of the States, lest their constituents should turn them out for taxing them directly and openly. Yes: we are plainly told that the States have surrendered the right of taxing imports, the most easy and convenient mode of raising a revenue—that is, the most concealed and ingenious way to the pockets of the people; and that it is the duty of this Government, to which this convenient contrivance is intrusted, to raise supplies by its use, not only to meet its own wants, but also to meet those of the States. What monstrous and dangerous perversion!

If (continued Mr. CALHOUN) I have been successful in demonstrating the utter unconstitutionality of this dangerous scheme, as I trust I have, the Senate will not expect me to follow the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] in his excursive flights in favor of the expediency of this, his favorite and cherished scheme. If Congress has no right to adopt it, there is an end of the whole affair; but there is one of the good effects he imputes to it, that I cannot pass in silence. He asserted that it would finally settle the disputes and agitations growing out of questions connected with the public lands, by reconciling and harmonizing all conflicting interests, and restoring kind feelings in relation to them, between the old and new States. Such are his anticipations; but will they be realized? Let the tone with which the Senators from Missouri [Dr. LINN] and Arkansas [Mr. SAVIER] denounced his scheme, answer. Does he not know that every Senator from the new States, with the exception of those from Indiana, are opposed to his measure? Can he, in the face of such facts, really hope for a final settlement of the vexed question of the public lands, or a restoration of harmony between the old and new States in relation to them? On the contrary, will it not embitter the feelings on both sides? Can he expect that the new States would see with favor a mortgage laid on that portion of the public domain lying within their limits, for the security of the holders of State bonds? Such, virtually, would be the case, should the distribution be made. The holders would regard it as a pledge; and to withhold it, when once made, as a violation of faith.

Would it conciliate the staple States—the growers of rice, cotton, and tobacco—on which the tax to make good the deficiency caused by the distribution must principally fall? It is in vain you tell them that the duties on wines and silks would fall on the consumers, or on the producers of those articles abroad. They know, by woful experience, that it matters little to them whether the duty be laid on the export of the staples they produce, or the importation of products received in exchange; whether the duties be paid on their products going out of port, or the return cargo coming in. Viewing it in that light, the people of those States will regard the measure as a cunningly devised scheme to pay the debts of others at their expense.

Would it, I again ask, reconcile the States free from debt? Will they be satisfied to be taxed to pay the debts of the States which have been less cautious in their engagements than themselves? I ask the Senators from New Hampshire—would their State, happily free from all debt, be satisfied?

Instead of the final settlement of the question, or the restoration of harmony, it would unsettle the whole subject of the public lands, and throw the apple of discord among the States.

Having now said what I intended on the immediate question under consideration, I avail myself of the opportunity to reply to the objections which have been made to the proposition I offered, in an earlier stage of this discussion, to cede to the new States the lands lying within their respective limits, on just and equitable conditions. The Senate will recollect that the debate on that measure terminated unexpectedly, and without affording me an opportunity of answering the objections against it. As there will, probably, be no other opportunity of meeting them, I trust it will be a sufficient apology for doing so on this occasion.

I begin with what, to me, would be the most formidable objection: that, under the garb of a cession, the measure is, in fact, but a mode of distribution. I reply, as on a former occasion—prove it; and I shall renounce it at once and forever. But I cannot take assertion for proof, however boldly made. Until it is proved, I shall regard the charge of distribution, coming as it does from the open advocates of that measure, as originating in a conscious feeling that, so far from being popular, the scheme has no hold on the affections of the people. If they believed it to be popular, those who so warmly oppose cession would be the last to call it distribution.

It is next objected, that it is a gift of the lands to the new States. Be it so. I would infinitely rather make a gift of the whole, than to adopt the fatal policy of distribution; and if it should be necessary to defeat it, I would regard a surrender of the whole as a cheap sacrifice. I go farther: and hold, that if the lands, instead of being regarded as the property of the Union, should be regarded as the property of the States separately, the new States would have the best right to the portion within their limits. They possess, unquestionably, the eminent domain, which would have carried with it the property in the public lands within their borders respectively, had they not surrendered it, by special agreement, on their admission into the Union. But that agreement was with the United States, and the surrender of the property in the lands was to them; and it may be fairly questioned how far the agreement, on their admission, would be binding on them, should the revenue from the lands be perverted from the use of the United States to that of the States separately, as is proposed by this scheme of distribution.

But is the cession a gift? Does it propose a surrender of the land for nothing? Is 65 per cent. of the gross proceeds to be paid into the Treasury, nothing? Is it nothing to put an end to the angry and agitating debates which we witness, session after session, constantly increasing in violence? Nothing, to save the time, and labor, and expense of Congress? Nothing, to curtail one-fourth of the patronage of the Government, and that of the most dangerous character? Nothing, to raise the new States to a level with the old? Nothing, to remove this great disturbing cause which so injuriously influences our legislation? Is it nothing, finally, to substitute a system in lieu of the present, as far as the lands lying within the new States are concerned, which, in addition to all these considerations, proposes the only practical method of preventing the loss of the lands, and which, so far from a pecuniary loss, will bring more into the Treasury than the present system? I boldly assert that such would be the case; as I may well do now, as no one opposed to the measure has ventured to question the correctness of the calculation, or the data on which it rests.

But the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY] says it is a gift, because thirty-five per cent. is too high a compensation to the States for their expense and trouble in managing the land. He estimates the actual expense, all things included, at 24 per cent. on the gross receipts, and says that all beyond that is a gift to the States. He has ventured this assertion, with the report of the Committee on the Public Lands at the last session before him, containing, in detail, from the proper departments, an estimate of the expense, which, on a supposition that the average annual sale of the portion of the land in question would average two and a half millions, would amount to 22 per cent. The Senator has omitted all the expenses, except that of selling the lands, when, by turning to the tables, he will find that nearly one-third is yet to be surveyed and platted; that a large amount must be paid for extinguishing Indian titles, and removing Indians to the West. He also overlooks that the five per cent. fund is to be surrendered by those States, a sum, of itself, equal to double the amount which he has estimated as the entire expense to which the States would be subject.

To these large items must be added donations, which, instead of being made, as they have heretofore been, by Congress, are, if made by the States, to be paid for by them at the selling price of the land at the time, allowing them 35 per cent.; and also the sums spent on internal improvement which, with the exception of the portion spent on the Mississippi and Ohio, are to terminate; and, finally, the saving of expense in our legislation, and in the General Land Office, in consequence of the cession; all of which the Senator has omitted—omitted, notwithstanding they are to be found in the report before him, and to which he has referred in the debate. There, as I have stated, amount to 22 per cent. on the gross amount of the sales; to which the committee has added 13 per cent. making the 35—not as a gratuity, but on the ground of liberal compensation beyond mere expense and saving to this Government, as being right of itself, and necessary to ensure the hearty co-operation of the States, in carrying out a measure that would be highly beneficial to the whole Union, and which could not be successfully carried out without such co-operation on the part of the States. Not a cent has been proposed to be allowed, which could be avoided, with just regard to sound policy.

But the Senator was not content with holding out the difference of what he was pleased to regard the actual expense, and the 35 per cent. as a gift. He took stronger grounds, and pronounced it to be a gift of all the public lands, on the assumption that the cession would be extended to the States hereafter to come in, on their admission; and, next, to the Territories; and, finally, to the whole of the public domain. I will not undertake to reply to a mere assumption without proof, farther than to say, that every measure of sound policy may be in like manner condemned, if it is to be assumed that what we have wisely done, under all the circumstances of the case, may form a precedent for others to do under dissimilar circumstances, and without regard to the principle on which we acted. In proposing the measure I have, I yield to the necessity of remedying a great and growing evil, originating in the fact that this Government is the owner and administrator of a large portion of the territories of nine States of this Union, and which cannot be remedied so long as their ownership and administratorship continue. It is the number and influence of the States in which they exist, that give such magnitude and danger to the evil; and what we may do now, under such circumstances, cannot constitute a precedent, to be extended in the manner which the Senator supposes it will be. On the contrary, by adopting the measure, we would enlist the new States, now opposed to the old on almost all questions growing out of the public lands, to aid in vigilantly guarding the residue of the public domain.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] took different grounds. He insisted that cession necessarily implies gift; and therefore, as I suppose, the one I have proposed is a gift, in spite of the many valuable considerations inducing to it. I do not attach the same meaning to the word which he does; but, as I have no taste for verbal criticism, I have assented to the request of a friend, to change "cession" to "dispose of"—the words used in the Constitution, and which, on the authority of the two Senators, are of such comprehensive meaning as to confer on Congress unlimited power to do as they please with the public lands.

But it seems that, so soon as I had availed myself of this comprehensive term, it forthwith contracted to the narrowest limits. I was told the lands could not be disposed of to the States. Why not? They can be disposed of to individuals, and to companies of individuals, and why not to that company or community of individuals which constitutes a State? Can any good reason be assigned?

I am next told that we may dispose of them absolutely, but not conditionally. I again repeat the question—why not? What is it that limits our power? We can dispose of the lands to individuals on condition, of which there are striking instances in lands containing lead mines. They are leased for a term of years on condition that one-tenth of the lead be paid to the Government in kind. If this can be done for a term of years, what is to prevent it from being done forever, on the same condition? And, if so, why may we not prescribe the rules on which the mines shall be worked? If all this can be done in the case of individuals, what is to prevent it from disposing of the public lands to the States, on the conditions proposed, and to prescribe the rules to be observed by them in the sales and management—that is, to adopt the measure I have proposed?

It is next objected, that it is not a disposition of the lands, but merely a transfer of the administration of them to the States. I deny the fact. It is intended, and is in reality, a conditional disposition or sale to the States. But if it were otherwise, and as supposed, I ask, what is there to prevent Congress from disposing of the lands by an agency, or to employ the States as the agent, and prescribe the rules by which they shall be disposed of? I can see no valid objection to such arrangement; but do not deem it necessary to discuss the point, because the fact is not as is supposed.

Then follows the objection that it would create the relation of creditor and debtor between this Government and the States. Admit it to be the fact; I ask, is that relation more objectionable, or as much so, as that which now exists, of landlord and tenant, growing out of ownership and administration in this Government of so large a part of the domain of these States—a relation which is the parent of so many evils both to them and us? But, to put an end to the objection, I have, on the suggestion of some of the members from the new States, so modified my proposition as to provide that the sixty-five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales coming to the Government, shall be paid directly to its own officers—say the marshals in each of the States. Now, I ask the opponents of the measure to join me, and, by the cession, to put an end, in the only way it can be done, to the still more objectionable relation of landlord and tenant between this Government and the States.

It is further objected, that it would not settle the question. It is said, if we cede the lands, the next demand would be to relinquish that portion of the proceeds of their sales which is to be paid to the Government; that concession would have to follow concession, till the whole would be lost. This, sir, is the old answer which the advocates of existing abuses are ever ready to give those who complain. It is the answer of Lord North in the controversy which led to our Revolution. He refused to yield the disputed right of taxing the colonies, on the ground that to yield would not satisfy them. If taxation was surrendered, he said, it would not settle the question; that their next demand would be to surrender the right of regulating their commerce. The result of such blind obstinacy was the dismemberment of the British Empire.

There is not a feature which more strongly distinguishes the firm and enlightened statesman from the obstinate or weak, than that of knowing when it is proper to make concessions, as the means of avoiding, in the end, the humiliation of submission on the one hand, or the mortification of defeat on the other; and never was there an occasion, or a question, when it was more politic than at this time, and on this question. It may now be made with dignity. The question may now be adjusted on just and honorable terms; but, if it be delayed, the new States will decide it, in a few years, in their own way, without asking our leave, by their rapid relative increase in population and political weight.

They are now anxious for a fair adjustment; and we may satisfy them, without making any real sacrifice on our part; and it is doing injustice to them to suppose that, after soliciting a measure so liberal, and from which they would derive such advantages, they would suddenly turn round and condemn what they had solicited, and make the palpably unjust demand, that we should surrender the portion of the proceeds coming to the Government. There is nothing in their past history that would warrant such an imputation on their character.

It was next objected, that the measure was unequal; and to prove it so, the case of Ohio, which has but a small amount of public lands within its limits to be disposed of, was contrasted with that of Illinois, which has a large amount; and, because the portion of the proceeds to be allowed to the States (35 per cent. of the gross amount) would be small in the case of the former, when compared with that of the latter, the measure is pronounced unequal and unjust. If it were a scheme of distribution, as has been erroneously alleged, such might be the fact; but as, instead of that, it is a mere compensation or commission for trouble, expense, responsibilities to be incurred, and services rendered, so far from being unequal, because the amount to be received in the one case was not equal to that in the other, it is precisely the reverse. Equality of compensation for equal expense and service, is equal; but equality for unequal expense and service, would be glaringly unequal; and, had I proposed to allow Ohio the same amount of compensation for the expense and trouble of managing the small portion of the public domain in her limits, as that to be allowed to Illinois for the management of the large portion within hers, instead of allowing a compensation to each proportioned to their respective expenses and services, it would, so far from being equal, have been grossly unequal, and would have been so pronounced by those who now make this objection.

In this connection, I must say that I cannot but regret that the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN], in answer to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] on this alleged inequality between Ohio and Illinois, did not meet him, by denying the truth of his allegation, instead of the manner he did; which had, to say the least, the appearance of sustaining the side to which he is most opposed, against that to which he is less.

[Mr. ALLEN rose to explain. Mr. CALHOUN said he did not doubt that the Senator gave the true explanation of his vote, but did not think it was called for at the time, and that the effect was as he had stated.]

Another objection was, that it did not extend to the Territories. This objection had the advantage (what few others had) of being founded in fact, but was unfounded in reason. Had it been extended to them, it would have gone beyond the mischief, and would have been wholly improper. The evil, I repeat, originates in the fact of the Government being the owner and administrator of so large a portion of the domain of nine States of the Union, (being more than one-third of the whole;) and must increase, so long as it remains, with the increased number and relative weight of the new States. They will soon be increased to twelve, by the admission of the three Territories, with a corresponding increase of weight in the Government. The Territories, on the contrary, are without political weight; and, of course, with the object in view, it would have been preposterous to have included them.

As little force is there in the objection, that some of the States would not accept of the cession. It is possible that Ohio and Indiana might not; but not probable, as the amount of public land within their borders is inconsiderable. But what of that? Should it prove to be the case, what possible injury could result? The fact of not accepting would be proof conclusive that the evil to be removed acted with but little relative force in either; and that the old system might be left to go on quietly in both, until the land within their limits was all disposed of. But the case is very different in the other seven. In them, it is in active operation; and they would gladly accept of the cession, as the only remedy that can reach the disease, consistently with the interests of all concerned.

I come now to the final objection—that the land system is working well, and that we ought to adhere to the old maxim, "Let well enough alone." I say the final, as it is the last I recollect. If (as is possible—I took no notes) I have omitted to notice any objection made by the opponents of the measure, I call on them to name it now, that I may answer it before I proceed to notice the one just stated.

When I first addressed the Senate on this subject, at the opening of the discussion, I admitted that the system worked well at first, but I must limit the admission to its earliest stages. From the beginning, it contained within itself the seeds of mighty disorders, and of great evils to the country, if nothing should be done to avert them. If I do not greatly mistake the tendency of the system as it stands, it is to extinguish the Indian title far more rapidly than the demands of our increasing population require, and to disperse our population over a larger space than is desirable for the good of the country. That the former of these evils exists in reality, the proof is conclusive; and that it is already the cause of much difficulty and danger, and that both are rapidly on the increase, so as to threaten the loss of the lands themselves, I have, I trust, conclusively shown in my former remarks. It is sufficient here to repeat, in order to show that the Indian title has been too rapidly extinguished, that the Government has sold, from the beginning of the system, (now almost half a century,) but little more than eighty millions of acres; and that not less than twenty millions, probably, are held by large holders, who purchased on speculation to sell again; making the actual demand for land for settlement not exceeding, probably, sixty millions in that long period of time. But, during the same period, the Indian title has been extinguished to about three hundred and twenty millions of acres, of which about two hundred and twenty-six millions remain unsold—exceeding four-fold the demand for lands in consequence of the increase of our population. Such is the fact. To what cause is it to be attributed? I feel confident it will be principally found in the land system itself, which has been so indiscriminately praised during the discussion.

But, before I proceed to assign my reasons, it will be proper to pause and reflect on the influence that the occupation of the aborigines, whom we are so rapidly expelling, has had, through the mysterious dispensation of Providence, on the prosperrity and greatness of our country. They were precisely in the condition most favorable to that mode of settlement which was best calculated to secure liberty, civilization, and property. Had they been more numerous or powerful, the settlement of our country would either not have been made at all, or would have been by the immediate agency and superintendence of the Government, with a force not only sufficient to expel or subjugate the aborigines, (as in Mexico by the Spaniards, and Hindos by the English,) but also sufficient to keep the colonies in subjection. How great a change such a mode of settlement would have made in the destiny of our country, is not necessary to be explained on this occasion. But, as it was, they were not too strong to prevent settlement by hardy and enterprising emigrants, inspired, in some instances, with a holy zeal to preserve their religious faith in its purity; in others, by the love of adventure and gain; and in all, with a devotion to liberty. It is to settlements formed by individuals so influenced, and thrown, from the beginning, on their own resources almost exclusively, that we owe our enterprise, energy, love of liberty, and capacity for self-government.

But there is another consideration, not less important, connected with the occupancy and condition of the aborigines. Had they not existed at all, or been too weak to prevent our people from spreading out over the vast extent of the continent, without resistance, or resistance too feeble to keep them within moderate limits, in the rapid and wide outspread after game, pasturage, or choice spots on which to settle down, the far larger portion would have lost all the arts of civilized life, and become fierce herdsmen and barbarians, like our ancestors; and like them, in their frequent inundations over southern Asia and Europe, would have overflowed and desolated the civilized agricultural and commercial settlements along the coast, excepting such as might be protected by walls and fortifications.

It is to this fortunate combination of facts connected with the aboriginal population, that they were not strong enough to prevent settlements in the manner they were actually formed, while they were sufficiently strong to prevent the too rapid spread of our population over the continent, that we owe, in a great measure, our wonderful success. A change in either the one or the other would have changed entirely, in all probability, the destiny of our country.

The bearing of this digression on the point under consideration will be readily perceived. We have grown, indeed, to be so powerful, that the aborigines can no longer resist us by force, and when there is no danger that the arts of civilized life would be lost by the spreading out of our population; but the aboriginal population would not therefore cease to perform an important function in our future growth and prosperity, if properly treated. They are the land wardens or keepers of our public domain, until our growth and increase of population require it, as the means of new settlements. But till then, our interests, no less than justice to them, require that their occupancy should continue; and if the extinguishment of their title should continue to outrun the regular demand of our population for settlement, as rapidly in proportion hereafter, as it has heretofore, it is difficult to conceive the confusion and difficulty which must follow. Those we now experience are nothing to those which would come. That such must, however, prove to be the case, to a great extent, if our land system continue as it is, I hold to be certain. The cause, as I have said, is inherent in the system as it exists; and, if not corrected, will impel our population, by its necessary operation, from the States to the Territories, and from them to the Indian possessions; which I shall now proceed to explain.

The system, as it now stands, embraces three powerful causes, all of which conspire to produce these results: pre-emption, as proposed by this bill, before survey and sale; the auction system, under its actual operation; and a fixed minimum for all the lands, be the quality or the time which they have been offered for sale what they may. They act together, and jointly contribute to the results, I have attributed to them.

My friends from the new States, who are so much attached to pre-emption, as proposed by this bill, must excuse me for speaking my opinion freely of their favorite measure. The consequences involved are too important to keep silence.

What, then, is the pre-emption principle? and how does it operate as a part of the existing land system? It is neither more nor less than to say to every one, when the Indian title is extinguished to a new portion of the public domain, that you may go, and search, and take all the choice parts, the fertile spots, the favorable localities, the town sites, or whatever other advantages any portion may possess, at $1 25 per acre; and that not to be paid till the lands are offered at auction, which may be many years thereafter. What, then, is its operation, but to give pick and choice of the public domain to the active and enterprising, who are best acquainted with the tract of country to which the Indian title is extinguished, with the speculating capitalists, who may choose to associate with them? It is like spreading out a large table, having a few choice and costly dishes intermixed with ordinary fare, and opening the door to the strong, and the few that may be nearest to rush in and select the best dishes for themselves, before the others at a distance can enter and participate. And can we wonder, with such advantages, that there should be an active and powerful interest constantly at work to extinguish the titles of the Indians in rapid succession, without regard to the demand of our increasing population; to spread out table after table, that the may gorge their appetites on the choicest dishes, and slake their thirst with the most costly wines; leaving the ordinary fare, with the crumbs and bones, to the rest of the community?

But this is not all. After this picking and choosing, under the pre-emption, as it has heretofore operated, and which it is now proposed to make prospective and perpetual, comes the auction system, that is, the sales of the lands at vendue to the highest bidder. Nothing could be more just and equal, if fairly carried out; but it is notorious that the very opposite is the case under its actual operation. Instead of leaving the lands to be disposed of to the bids of individuals, according to their conception of the value of each tract, the whole is arranged beforehand, by combinations of powerful and wealthy individuals, to take the choice of the lands left by the pre-emptors, and to run down all individual competition, so that no one can obtain what he wants without joining them; and thus another powerful interest is united with the former, to extinguish the Indian title—to spread out another table.

The next features of the system so much lauded operates the same way—I refer to what is called the minimum price; that is, of fixing one invariable price of $1 25 an acre for all lands not sold at auction, without regard, as has been said, to quality, or the time it has been in market. The effect of this, with a quantity on hand to which the Indian title is extinguished so far exceeding the demand of the community, is to sink the value of all the unsold land which has not been offered at auction, to a price below the minimum, except a small portion of the best, which is annually purchased. Taking the aggregate of the whole of the lands in the new States, it would, according to its estimated present value by the Committee on the Public Lands, not be worth, on an average, more than 16½ cents per acre. The result is, that no one is willing to give the minimum for the inferior or less valuable portion. Hence comes that great and growing evil, of occupancy without purchasing; which threatens the loss of the public domain, unless arrested by some speedy and decisive remedy. It has already extended far beyond what is thought of by those who have not looked into the subject, and is still rapidly progressing. I have taken some pains to ascertain to what extent it has extended in two of the States—Illinois and Alabama. It is probable that there are not less than thirty thousand voters in those States, residing on public lands as mere occupants, without title. In a single Congressional district in Alabama, there are, by estimate, six thousand voters. But, as great as this evil is, it is not all. The fixed minimum price co-operates with the pre-emption and auction systems to impel emigrants, especially of the more wealthy class, to turn from the States to the Territories, where the land has been less culled over; and from the Territories to the Indian lands, for the same reason; thus urging forward our population farther and farther, and driving before them the Indian tribes, unmindful of the dispensation of a kind Providence, which placed them as a restraint on the too rapid dispersion of our population.

There is another and powerful cause co-operating to the same result, which must not be passed unnoticed. I refer to the vast expenditures in the last twelve or fifteen years, in holding treaties with the Indians, and in extinguishing their titles, including reservations, and removing them to the West; equaling, in some instances, the fee-simple value of the lands, and in many others not much less. These immense expenditures, amounting, in the period specified, I know not to how many millions, (not less, certainly, than forty or fifty,) have made such treaties a great money making affair, the profits of which have been divided between influential Indian chieftains and their white associates, and have greatly contributed not only to increase the force of the other causes in the too rapid extinguishment of Indian titles, but to diffuse widely the baneful spirit of speculation.

Such are the inherent defects of the system, and the results to which they have led, and must continue to lead, so long as it can find subjects on which to operate, if not remedied. The measure I have proposed would apply an efficient remedy, as far as the public lands in the new States are concerned. The combined action of graduation and pre-emption applied to lands which have been offered for sale, as provided for by the amendment I offered, would, in a few years, convert the occupants without title into freeholders; while, at the same time, it would tend powerfully to prevent the population of the new States from emigrating, and turn towards those the tide of emigration from the old States, and, to the same extent, counteract the too rapid spreading out of our population, and extinguishment of the titles of the Indians. But nothing can effectually remedy the defects of the system, but a radical change. What that ought to be, would require much reflection to determine satisfactorily; but it seems to me, on the best reflection I can give it, that if, in lieu of public sales at auction, a system of graduation and pre-emption had been introduced from the first, fixing a maximum price sufficiently high when the lands are first offered for sale, and descending gradually, at short intervals of one or two years, to the present minimum price, and then in the manner proposed in the measure which I have brought forward, giving the right of pre-emption at every stage, from first to last, to the settlers, it would have averted most of the evils incident to the present system, and, at the same time, have increased the revenue from the lands. It would have checked the spirit of speculation, concentrated our population within the proper limits, prevented the too rapid extinguishment of Indian titles, and terminated our ownership and administration of the lands in the new States, by disposing of them within a moderate period of time, and prevented most of the mischievous consequences which have been experienced. The introduction of such a change, or some such, founded on the same principles, in reference to lands not yet offered for sale in the Territories, and the portion of the public domain lying beyond, and to which the Indian title is not yet extinguished, would, in combination with the measure I have proposed, go far to restore the system to a healthy action, and put a stop to the farther progress of the evil, and remedy, in a great measure, those already caused. I throw out these suggestions for reflection, without intending to propose any other measure, except the one I have already.

At the conclusion of the debate, and just before the vote was taken on his proposition to dispose of the public lands to the new States in which they are situated, upon certain conditions, Mr. CALHOUN rose in his place, and read from Gales and Seaton's Register of Debates, in support of his position, the following extract from the speech of Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, in the Senate of the United States, in March, 1826, in reply to General Harrison, in Ohio; the subject of the Cumberland road being under consideration:

"Mr. Randolph again rose, and said: The gentleman is mistaken if he supposes that I begrudge the people from Ohio the lands within the body of Ohio. I wish that every new State had all the lands within the State, that, in the shape of receiverships and other ways, these States might not be brought under the influence of this ten miles square. In other words, I wish that all the patronage of the land office was in the hands of the individual States, and not in the hands of the General Government. I am the friend of State rights, and will cut down the patronage of this General Government, which has increased, is increasing, and must be diminished; or we, the States, shall be not only 'shorn of our beams,' sir, but 'abolished quite.'"

Mr. BENTON then rose, and read the following extract from a speech of Mr. Van Buren on the same subject, delivered in the Senate on the 18th of May, 1826:

"Mr. Van Buren said: The subject of the public lands was becoming daily more and more interesting, and would occupy much time in legislation. It extended the patronage of the Government over these States to a great extent; it subjected the States in which those lands were situated to an unwise and unprofitable dependence on the Federal Government. Mr. V. B. said he should vote for every bill on that subject, to enable them at some future day to act understandingly on it. No man could render the country a greater service than he who should devise some plan by which the United States might be relieved from the ownership of this property, by some equitable mode. He would vote for a proposition to vest the lands in the States in which they stood, on some just and equitable terms as related to the other States of the Confederacy. He hoped that, after having full information on the subject, they would be able to effect that great object. He believed that if those lands were disposed of at once to the several States, it would be satisfactory to all."

Mr. BENTON also read from the Senate Journal of May 20, 1826, the following motion, as having been submitted by Mr. Tazewell of Virginia to the effect as stated:

"Mr. Tazewell submitted the following motion:
"Resolved, That it is expedient for the United States to cede and surrender to the several States, within whose limits the same may be situated, all the right, title, and interest of the United States, to any lands lying and being within the boundaries of such States, respectively, upon such terms and conditions as may be consistent with the due observance of the public faith, and with the general interest of the United States."

On the subject of graduating the price of the public lands, Mr. Tazewell said, in 1828, in his place in the Senate:

"That he was pleased with the plan of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Benton] but he thought it ought to extend farther. He would wish to have the arrangement something like this: while the lands are at the highest minimum, one dollar, allow the actual settlers to have the pre-emption right at seventy-five cents; when they are at seventy-five cents, allow actual settlers to enter them at fifty cents, and so on down to the lowest. This, he thought, would be productive of a good effect, as it would be a continued encouragement to actual settlers, and give them an advantage over other purchasers."

After the reading of these extracts, the vote was taken on Mr. CALHOUN's proposition as submitted by Mr. YOUNG, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen and Tappan of Ohio, Anderson and Nicholson of Tennessee, Benton and Lion of Missouri, Calhoun of South Carolina, Clay and King of Alabama, Fulton and Sevier of Arkansas, Lumpkin of Georgia, Mouton and Nicholas of Louisiana, Norvell of Michigan, Pierce of New Hampshire, Roane of Virginia, Robinson and Young of Illinois, and Walker of Mississippi—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bates and Webster of Massachusetts, Bayard and Clayton of Delaware, Buchanan and Sturgeon of Pennsylvania, Clay and Crittenden of Kentucky, Dixon and Knight of Rhode Island, Graham and Mangum of North Carolina, Henderson of Mississippi, Hubbard of New Hampshire, Huntington and Smith of Connecticut, Ker and Merrick of Maryland, Phelps and Prentiss of Vermont, Porter of Michigan, Preston of South Carolina, Rives of Virginia, Ruger and Williams of Maine, Smith and White of Indiana, Southard and Wall of New Jersey, and Tallmadge and Wright of New York—31.

Of the eighteen Senators from the nine new States, fourteen voted for the amendment; and four, Messrs. SMITH and WHITE of Indiana, Mr. HENDERSON of Mississippi, and Mr. PORTER of Michigan, voted against it.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

26th CONGRESS AND 2d SESSION, JANUARY 30, 1841.

Submitted by Mr. YOUNG, of Illinois, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALHOUN's Land Bill, to dispose of the public lands to the new States in which they are situated.

Proposed by Mr. YOUNG as an amendment submitted by Mr. CARTER, to recommit, with certain instructions, the bill (S. 28) "to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system in favor of settlers on the public lands who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon," viz: Strike out all after the word "report," in the second line, and insert the following as an amendment to the original bill:

A provision to dispose of the public lands within the limits of the new States, to the following effect:

That all the public lands within the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Michigan, with the exceptions of the sites of fortifications, navy and dock yards, arsenals, magazines, and all other public buildings, shall, after the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, be disposed of to the States within the limits of which they are respectively situated, they having previously complied with the following conditions:

First. That the said States shall severally pass acts, to be irrevocable, that they will monthly, as the sales of the said lands shall progress, pay into the Treasury of the United States, at the most convenient places of deposit, and to such officer as may be appointed to receive the same, sixty-five per cent. on the gross amount of the sales of such lands, including, under sales grants, and donations by the States, estimating the lands at the selling price at the time of the grant or donation, on or before the first day of February of each succeeding year.

Secondly. That the minimum price, as now fixed by law, shall remain unchanged until the thirtieth day of June aforesaid; but, after that period, the price may be reduced by the States respectively, according to the following scale: all lands theretofore offered at public sale, and then remaining unsold ten years or upward, preceding the thirtieth day of June aforesaid, may be reduced by said States to a price not less than one dollar per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold fifteen years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, may thereafter be reduced by said States to a price not less than seventy-five cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold twenty years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, may then be reduced by said States to a price not less than fifty cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold twenty-five years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, may thereafter be reduced by said States to a price not less than twenty-five cents per acre; and all lands that may have been offered at public sale, and remaining unsold thirty years or upward, preceding the said thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-two, shall be ceded immediately to the States in which said lands are situated: Provided, That all lands which shall remain unsold after having been offered at public sale for ten years, and which do not come under the above provisions, shall be subject to the provisions of pre-emption, on graduation, and disposition aforesaid, at the respective periods of ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, and thirty years, after said sale, commencing from the expiration of ten years after the same have been offered at public sale.

Thirdly. That the lands shall be subject to the same legal subdivisions in the sale and survey as is now provided by law, reserving for each township and fractional township the sixteenth section, or the substitute, for the use of schools, as heretofore provided by law; and the land not yet offered for sale, shall be first offered by the State at public auction, except in cases of pre-emption, and be sold for cash only, in the manner now provided by law. And any land now or hereafter remaining unsold after the same shall have been offered at sale at public auction, shall be subject to entry for cash only, according to the graduation which may be fixed by the States respectively, under the provisions of this act; and that the acts of Congress which may be in force at the time of assenting to this act shall remain unchanged, except as modified by this act, unless with the assent of Congress: Provided, That any of said lands may, after they shall have become subject to private entry, be sold at the option of the purchaser, in quarter quarter sections, without any limitation whatever.

Fourth. This disposition of the public lands, together with the portion of the sales to be retained by the States respectively, under the provisions of this act, shall be in full of the five per cent. fund, or any part thereof, not already accrued to any State; and the said State shall be exclusively liable for all charges that may hereafter arise from the surveys, sales, and management of the public lands, and extinguishment of Indian title within the limits of said States, respectively.

Fifth. That, on a failure to comply with any of the above conditions, or a violation of the same, on the part of any of the said States, the cession herein made to the State failing to comply with or violating said conditions, shall be thereby rendered null and void; and all grants or titles thereafter made by said State, for any portion of the public lands within the limits of the same, ceded by this act, shall be, and are hereby declared to be, null and void, and of no effect whatever.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, upon every reduction in the prices of said lands, which shall take place by the graduating process of this bill, the Legislatures of the several States in which the lands are situated shall, at their discretion, have power to grant to the respective occupants or settlers up on any of said lands, rights of pre-emption at such graduated or reduced price; which rights shall extend to a period of ninety days from and after the dates at which the respective graduations shall take place; and any lands not taken up by the respective occupants or settlers within that period, shall be liable to be entered or purchased by any other person, until the next graduation or reduction in price shall take place, when it shall, if not previously purchased, be again subject to the right of pre-emption for ninety days, as before; and so on, from time to time, as said reductions shall take place.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the President of the United States shall be officially notified that any of the States aforesaid has passed an act in compliance with the above conditions, it shall be his duty, after the thirtieth day of June aforesaid, or forthwith after the passage of said act, if passed subsequent to that period, to adopt such measures as he shall think proper to close the land offices, including the surveying department, within the limits of said State; and that the commissions of all officers connected therewith shall expire on a day to be fixed by him, but which day shall not be beyond six months after the thirtieth day of June aforesaid, or, if subsequent thereto, from the day he received the official notification of the passage of said act.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That on such notification being made, the said State shall be relieved from all compacts, acts, or ordinances, imposing restrictions on the right of said State to tax any lands by her authority subsequent to the sale thereof, ceded by this act; and all maps, titles, records, books, documents, and papers, in the General Land Office at Washington, relative to said lands, or duplicates thereof, where the original cannot properly be transferred, shall be subject to the order and disposition of the Executive of said State, in such manner as the Legislature of said States may respectively appoint.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all lands of the United States within the limits of the State of Tennessee, with the exceptions enumerated in the first section of this act, shall be, and the same are hereby, ceded to said State.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the sixty-five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales, hereby secured to be paid to the United States, shall be set apart and exclusively applied to the gradual increase of the navy, and the erection of such fortifications for the general defence of the country, as Congress may by law hereafter order and direct.

SPEECH OF MR. REYNOLDS, OF ILLINOIS,

In the House of Representatives, February 5, 1841—In Committee of the Whole, on the Treasury note bill.

Mr. REYNOLDS addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Although I admire the eloquence of the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RAYNER,] who has just taken his seat, yet I cannot subscribe to the principles contained in many of his remarks. He observed he would have no confidence in the party to sustain and support the principles and doctrines of State rights, who would commit such political sins as they did in the case of the New Jersey election.

Whenever it becomes necessary to discuss political subjects from the stumps in Illinois, I take the New Jersey elections as my text, to demonstrate to the people that one party did right, and the other did wrong, in these elections. I charge no corruption in the action of this House; but to some of the actors in New Jersey I think at least a suspicion, tolerably well founded, might attach. That a majority of the votes in that election were given for the Democratic members, all admit. The Governor of New Jersey, like others, must have seen and known these facts; yet, nevertheless, he gave the certificate and seal to the party having the minority of votes. These being the facts before the House in the contested election, the decision was rendered in favor of the majority of votes, and the present members of New Jersey thereby obtained their seats. So soon as the present political excitement which arises out of other causes in the State of New Jersey subsides, and the people, in their cool and reflecting moments shall act on this case, they will give the same judgment in favor of the majority governing, as the House of Representatives did last session. I might ask in turn what would "State Rights" expect at the hands of a party who voted for a minority to govern? State and national rights both would be in a very precarious situation, if minorities govern majorities.

The great seal of New Jersey seemed to have with some as much power in this controversy as the philosopher's stone with its devotees. A seal without the majority ought to have no more virtue than the aforesaid "stone."

I will relate a case that took place in England, perhaps in feudal times. I state it, because almost all around me, and who are honoring me with their attention, more than I deserve, are lawyers.

It had been established in England, in a court of justice, and recorded, that a certain person was dead. Afterwards, it became necessary, on the trial of another cause in court, to prove the death of this person. The record, and the great seal attached to it, were produced in court; but lo and behold! at the trial the man who had been supposed to be dead, appeared in full life in open court. The question was, must the record or the man himself be believed?

Mr. Chairman, in our country (Illinois) we would rather believe the man than the record and seal. In New Jersey, perhaps with a party it might be otherwise.

FLORIDA WAR.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman [Mr. RAYNER] today, and the Whig party on all occasions, charge the Administration with remissness and want of energy and capacity in carrying on the Florida war.

It is often stated that "a few squaws and some miserable, starved Indians" hold out against all the power of the United States; "this is the unkindest cut of all." This is requiring a brave and efficient army, commanded by as courageous and gallant officers as ever existed, to conquer the elements themselves. It is extremely easy to live in gay and fashionable society in the city of Washington, and make speeches against the Florida war, rather than to be wet and hungry, and perhaps sick, hunting down the Indians in the swamps and hammocks of that country.

All classes of troops have been employed in this service at various times. Part of the regular army, with many of the gallant officers who have gained for themselves and country immortal honor in the late war with Great Britain, has been engaged in this service. They have exerted their accustomed bravery and energy, but without success, as they were opposed by insurmountable obstacles. Volunteer corps of citizen soldiers were also enlisted into this service, and the same result attended their efforts. The brave and meritorious Gentry of Missouri, with many other gallant men, were slain in these efforts.

Our troops in Florida were compelled to overcome enemies to which the Indian force was insignificant, and even contemptible. They were forced to war against the elements, the swamps, hammocks, and sickness of the country, and in the summer were constrained to yield the field to malignant disease against which human power cannot contend. Many of these brave men are now lingering out an existence made wretched by disease, contracted in this country in the war.

The great Napoleon himself, who was the prodigy of all human creation, and was at the head of the finest army the world ever saw, was also defeated in Russia by the elements. The puny power of man must yield to the laws of nature. No matter if the man be the greatest of his race, and has command over the greatest military nation that ever existed, as was the case with Bonaparte; yet he cannot war with success against the laws of Heaven.

It is doing the brave and gallant army of the United States great injustice to make these serious charges against them, without the least foundation whatever.

PROSCRIPTION.

The gentleman from North Carolina expresses no doubt the sentiments of the whole Whig party, that the diplomatic corps of our Government in Europe will be recalled, and others sent in their places.

Mr. Chairman, I know not if the Opposition party have changed their principles; but they have changed their expressions. Nothing was so horrid to them, last year, as "proscription for opinion's sake." Now, after the election, it seems to be with them the only true and orthodox doctrine. It is strange how victories will change expressions.

It was charged on the Administration that an army of office holders were supporting the Democratic party, and efforts were made in both Houses of Congress to deprive office holders from exercising the privileges of freemen; to disfranchise and gag them.

But the scene has changed. An army of office holders for the Harrison Administration are to be enlisted, and placed in power. I do not suppose any effort will be made to disfranchise or gag this new Federal army. Time will determine.

WEAK TREASURY.

Mr. Chairman, the Opposition party charge the Administration with misrule, and other words more criminal, for the want of money in the Treasury. Jeremiah, of olden times, would be ashamed of his lamentations were he here to hear the modern Whigs mourning over the distresses of the people, on account of a weak Treasury. O. K. Orful Kalamity. These crocodile tears generally flow from the eyes of those that wish to live on the work and labor of others, through the medium of the Treasury, and therefore think it a great crime in Government to be scarce of Treasury pap.

It is the proudest boast of a Republic to have a wealthy and happy people, and a weak Treasury. A deficit is better than a surplus. The amount of money which might be needed in the Treasury, is with the people, in useful operations. The people make more with it than the interest we pay on the Treasury notes, and the Government is more prudent and economical in expenditures when the Treasury is low.

TREASURY NOTES.

I am not at all opposed to the issue of Treasury notes under the circumstances of the case, and, I think, more than five millions would be preferable to that amount.

Some gentleman say it is unconstitutional to issue these notes, and that a loan is constitutional. This seems a nice distinction. The difference between a loan and the issue of Treasury notes might form an excellent subject for a critical discussion, in some of the learned colleges and seminaries. A professor of logic might test the talents of his pupils for acuteness and precision in ascertaining the difference. For all practical purposes the operation must be the same. The credit and responsibility of the Government is used in both cases, and in my opinion, the Constitution stands as fair for one mode as the other.

Some have most singular notions of the Constitution. They contend that it is constitutional in the crisis of a war to issue such notes, and in peace the Constitution knows no such power. It seems to me the Constitution remains the same stem and unchangeable instrument in war as well as in peace.

A sufficient amount of notes should be issued to improve the harbors around our coasts, and to complete our national works. It is economy and a saving to the Government to continue these works rather than to see them tumble into ruins, and the materials and implements destroyed. Among these national works I would expect to see completed the Cumberland road, which is a work my constituents also would be extremely well pleased to see finished.

I have the utmost confidence in the talents and integrity of the Hon. Mr. Jones of Virginia, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. He is not warped astray by party prejudice, but is firm to the true interest and honor of the country, and such amount of Treasury notes as he deems necessary and proper for the present wants of the Government, I will sustain. The whole amount is but trifling when compared with the wealth and great resources of the country.

PROSPERITY OF THE COUNTRY.

Mr. Chairman, I will be permitted to exhibit a small portion of the resources of the people.

I do this for various considerations, which I will make known before I close my remarks.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury exhibits an excess of exports over the imports of the last year of $26,766,059.

The Secretary further says:

"The excess of exports is not only more than ever was known before, but quite three fold greater."

This is proof that cannot be controverted, that the substantial wealth and resources of the nation have increased last year more than in any former year. Does this look like distress?

In the whole region of the Northwest, and other sections of the Union, the products of an industrious and virtuous people are astonishing, and would not obtain our belief, if they were not taken from official and correct data.

In the State of Illinois, taken from the census, we find the people in that State have the last year on hand the following products:

Wheat	-	-	-	2,302,956 bushels
Corn	-	-	-	19,626,904 "
Oats	-	-	-	3,795,500 "
Potatoes	-	-	-	1,566,000 "
Neat cattle	-	-	-	164,961
Hogs	-	-	-	1,258,184
Sheep	-	-	-	337,157
Coal	-	-	-	3,546,000 bushels
Salt	-	-	-	20,000 "
Lead	-	-	-	336,157 pounds

It is stated in documents, which I presume are correct, that the value of property in the State of Indiana assessed for taxation for the year 1841, amounts to the sum of $132,548,137. I have no data to exhibit the products of this State this year; but no doubt they are greatly increased since the last.

"At Cleveland, Ohio, independent of the supplies by wagon, the receipts of wheat by the canal this year are near two millions two hundred thousand bushels, and one half a million barrels of flour.

"There arrived at Cleveland, in 1840, on the Ohio canal 290,233,820 pounds of produce, being an increase of 94,117,553 upon the previous year. The increase of wheat and flour is equal to 463,766 barrels.

"TOLEDO, Ohio.—The amount of flour and wheat shipped at this port is equal to 67,000 barrels. Seven years ago the place was not in existence, and the country around was a wilderness, and until 1837 was dependent upon Western New York for bread stuffs.

"The business between the city of St. Louis, Missouri, and Boston and New York this year, according to the St. Louis Gazette, is $6,000,000."

When the Chicago canal is finished, which will be soon, the transportation of merchandize to this city will be mostly by it and the Erie canal. As the city of New York is intimately connected with the Northwest in commerce, and no doubt has increased in the same ratio, I will state the value of real estate in the city this year, and the estimated amount of taxes for 1841:

Value of real estate,	$187,000,000
Amount of tax for the support of the city,	1,553,000
"Cotton exported from New Orleans in the years 1838-39 and 1839-40, ending 30th September, (from Hazard's Register:)
Total in 1838-39	550,817 bales.
" 1839-40	954,191 "
Increase	373,374 "
"Exports of sugar from New Orleans in 1839-40:
Total—Hogsheads	45,611
Barrels	6,978
"Cotton at Mobile, Alabama, (from Mobile Letter Sheet:)
Cotton in 1839	252,240 bales.
" 1840	446,042 "
Increase	193,802 "

Is this ruin and distress?

I hope it will be no offence to the people in this city, who complain so much of hard times, to recite from the Intelligencer, a paper which is orthodox with them, the increase of houses in Washington. We must conclude from this improvement that other valuable and lasting improvements are progressing in the same proportion. If the banks had been overflowing the city with irredeemable shinplasters, these improvements would not have been made:

"The number of new buildings erected in the city of Washington during the year 1840 were as follows:

BRICK DWELLINGS.
Three story	-	-	15

Mr. Chairman, I will not trouble the committee with any more details of facts, showing the increase of wealth and improvements throughout the country as this will be a sample for the whole Union.

The increasing and productive wealth of the country must form a solid basis on which to issue the amount of Treasury notes mentioned in the bill, and moreover it must also silence all unfavorable and senseless clamors about the distress, ruin, and bankruptcy of the country. Is the city of Washington ruined and distressed with 207 new buildings erected last year? Can any reasonable man believe that Illinois, with all her products, is about to be ruined? Can distress be the consequence of such unparalleled increase of wealth? It will be a distress and ruin of a singular character.

PAPER CURRENCY AND IDLERS.

I pretend not that bank notes are as plenty as in some former years: but I presume no one will contend that they are the substantial wealth of the country. They are uncertain, fluctuating, and only the shadow of the substance. Are they to be compared with the substantial products and improvements of the nation?

I will exhibit the amount of paper in circulation for several years, which will show that it is the banks, and not the country, that has produced the embarrassment with some part of the community:

January 1, 1820	$4 863,344
" 1830	61,323,898
" 1834	94,839,570
" 1835	103,692,495
" 1836	140,301,038
" 1837	149,185,890

"	1838	116,138,910
"	1839	135,170,995
"	1840	106,968,572

The above table exhibits the deficit of paper circulation in some years, which is the cause of the imaginary distress so much complained of by some people. Even if it were such cause as to produce general distress, the Government cannot control it. It is a matter with the State banks, with which the General Government has no power to interfere. Can the misdeeds of the banks be visited on the Government?

These cries of hard times and lamentations for relief generally proceed from people who will not exercise any industrious avocation to make a living, and who have nothing to live on. They are generally people sitting on boxes at store doors whittling pine sticks, and doing nothing for a livelihood except kicking the boxes with their heels. In the summer they seek the shade, in winter they bask in the sun at the sides of the houses, and in both seasons never cease crying "change, change—the hard times have ruined us—Tip and Ty for ever."

SPECULATION.

It is often charged on the Administration that the Democratic party are senseless and deaf to the distresses of the people. Their hearts are too cold to relieve the sufferings of the community. That some people are embarrassed in trade and speculations, I have no doubt. At the time when the bank circulation was almost one hundred and fifty millions of dollars, this induced many persons to embark in trade and speculations; and when the banks curtailed the circulation down to about one hundred and six millions, many of these land traders and speculators, by imprudence and extravagance, became embarrassed, and some ruined. For these unfortunate men, the Democratic party have good feelings and sympathies, nevertheless. How can the Government relieve them? The Government possesses no magic power to make money out of nothing. If the Government relieve these embarrassed men, it must be done by taxing the industry, prudence, and economy of another portion of the community to pay their debts. Can this be tolerated in a Government of equal rights? Is it rich for one people to pay the debts of another? These fluctuations in the paper currency were not caused by the Government. Congress cannot interfere in State institutions. These banks suspended when the Government was in full communion with them. Both the Government and banks sat together at the same political communion table—the banks feasting on the public deposits, and the Government using their paper. But the banks committed adultery, and the Government divorced them. The Government never did, and do not yet, entirely refuse their notes, when they are paid in specie.

SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

It is strange, in the course of this discussion, how the Secretary of the Treasury has been abused. Almost every word known in the English language to express fraud, hypocrisy, and imposition, has been used against him. Is this a generous or noble bearing towards a man or a party that are defeated? We were overpowered, not by principle, but by numbers, and we were disposed to legislate for the good of the country, without political excitement. But we were forced into this political discussion. The honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] commenced the fire in this House, which was followed up by heavy artillery on the same side. What could we do other than to combat it with facts and the truth? Was it right to let unfounded assertions go out to the world to impose them on the people as the truth? Will a generous people be satisfied to see an efficient and meritorious officer abused and condemned for doing his duty? The law makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to make a report each year to the President, and for the performance of this duty, he is condemned almost as a criminal. In after times, when reason regains her empire amongst men, and party rancor is silenced, this officer will be esteemed as an able and efficient financier, doing great service to the country, with honor to himself.

It is extremely difficult to regulate the fiscal concerns of this nation, extended as it is, over such an immense territory. The operations of the Secretary have embraced the extraordinary sum of three hundred and sixty millions of dollars, and extended over nearly two million square miles. The fluctuation of the currency, in that time has also been a great source of annoyance and difficulty. "Last, though not least," was the suspension of specie payments. This left the Treasury without a dollar of available funds as often as it occurred. Was not this an alarming crisis in the country? The public money all locked up in banks, whose notes could not be received by the Government, as they were not redeemable in specie. This misconduct of the banks caused this calamity, and yet the Administration and Secretary are condemned for it. And even now the Secretary is visited with the severest denunciations for doing what the law compelled him to do.

Under the law and Constitution, could he do otherwise than to refuse to receive notes which were not redeemable in specie? Could he, by law, deposit the funds of Government in non-specie-paying banks? With all these disadvantages and difficulties in the currency, the country, under the present Administration, has flourished in an unexampled degree.

Mr. Woodbury, in his report, says, he has been connected with the Treasury from six to seven years.

"During this term, there has occurred much to evince the great fiscal power, as well as the prosperity of the Union. Some reverses have, at times, overtaken the rashness displayed by parts of the community in certain branches of business, and have extended their adverse influences to the revenue dependent on them. But the period and country, as a whole, have been almost unexampled in prosperous developments."

Again he says:

"It has enabled the Treasury to meet the current expenditures of the Government, as well as the extraordinary ones by Indian wars, treaties, and other costly measures, and without imposing any new taxes or high tariff, and without any new funded debt whatever, but extinguishing considerable remains of the old one, and paying the interest on that assumed for this District, to save the unprecedented surplus of more than twenty-eight millions of dollars, and to deposit the same with the States for safekeeping, until needed by the General Government."

Moreover he adds:

"That besides the recorded evidence of the prosperity of the country, it is gratifying, that the Treasury, without the aid of the United States Bank, has been able to make its vast collections, transfers, and payments, with promptitude, and, in most cases, with specie or its equivalent."

These statements of facts, together with those I have already presented to the committee, will establish this truth beyond contradiction—that the real and substantial wealth and improvement of the country have been advanced in an unparalleled degree during the last year. At no period since our national existence has the country so much right to rejoice as during the last year at her prosperity and improvement in all things that conduce to the substantial and permanent happiness of man. Where is the distress and ruin so much complained of? And where is the cause of so much abuse against an able and talented officer, who has labored so faithfully and so efficiently in the duties of his office for the permanent and general welfare of the nation?

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. Chairman, the subject of the public domain was introduced into this discussion, which, of all other subjects, is the most interesting to the people in Illinois, whom I represent. Were I able to pass these two measures—the prospective pre-emption and the proper graduation of the price—I should consider it the best public act of my life, and which would be the most gratifying to me. I should consider it, also, the most glorious act of any one's life to procure farms and homes for thousands of poor and honest families, and this, too, without injury to the public. We would then see the new States crowded with hardy, industrious farmers, on their own soil, able and willing to sustain the Government in any crisis, whether in war or peace.

The journals of both Houses of Congress, and other public documents, will prove, to the satisfaction of all mankind, that one party in the United States are friendly to these measures, and the other, with some exceptions, are hostile to them. The Democratic party, with that enlightened liberality of sentiment and those enlarged views of public policy which have characterized them from the commencement of the Government to the present time, have taken the lead on this subject, and are disposed to provide every poor man with a farm and home for himself and family.

The Presidents, Gen. Jackson and Mr. Van Buren, both recommended this policy, and the friends of the people have joined heart and hand with them in their recommendations.

The Secretary of the Treasury has likewise stated that the graduation would increase the revenue and the prospective pre-emption policy cannot injure it; as the present pre-emption law will not expire before the bill now before the House would take effect, if it were passed into a law.

I am not only friendly to these measures, but would be pleased, also, to see passed the cession act, granting the whole public lands to the States where they lie, on some fair and equitable principles. Then this bone of contention, this heartburning between the old and new States, would cease. The country then would be settled and improved by a virtuous and enterprising population, which is the foundation of the wealth and strength of all nations. A revenue could then be raised from this population tenfold greater and more certain than the present, arising from sales of the public lands. This revenue is uncertain, and is paid in with no good feelings from the new States.

ALIENS.

It has been seriously contended that the benefits of the pre-emption laws should not be extended to aliens, and a vote in the Senate has been taken on the subject. Since the commencement of the present land system, the uniform practice has been to sell the public domain to aliens as well as to citizens of the United States. As far as I am informed, no inconvenience has occurred from this policy.

The State laws of Illinois not only permit aliens to purchase and hold lands in the State, but also permit the same to descend to their heirs, as if they were native citizens of the United States.

During the debate on this interesting subject—the public domain—an extraordinary opinion has been expressed, and some argument advanced to sustain it, that an alien, under the laws and Constitution of the United States, has no right to vote for members of Congress. This sentiment, emanating from such high source, and being so directly adverse to the practice with us in Illinois, since the formation of our Government in 1818, I deem it my duty to give to the subject such consideration as it seems to merit.

The Hon. Mr. CLAY of Kentucky says, as reported in the Intelligencer:

"The right to vote implies citizenship necessarily, essentially, although the converse of the proposition does not apply. Then comes the State authority; but the State has no power to confer the elective franchise on any foreigner, who is not a constituent portion of the people of the State—who is not a member of our political community—who is not one of the people of the United States."

And again:

"If a State constitution declares that aliens may vote, then their vote may affect the composition of the House of Representatives or of the Senate; and so eventually the question might come into their bodies in judging, as they respectively have a right to judge, of the qualifications of persons returned as members of the two Houses."

I deny that the General Government have any power to regulate or prescribe the qualifications of electors for members of Congress. That power to regulate and prescribe the qualifications of electors has been confided to the State Governments, and none other can exercise it.

If this were not the system of our Government, that harmony and dependence on the same people with the same qualifications which is necessary and proper, would not exist. If the General Government had the power to prescribe the qualifications of voters, this would give it a distinct and separate existence, from the people of the State Governments, which the uniform practice since our national existence, and the forms of our Governments, in my opinion, do not sanction. The General Government, by this rule, would be able to crush the State Governments and establish throughout the Territories of the United States a central omnipotent power. The rights of the States would be destroyed by the undue influence of the National Government.

If the General Government possess this power to prescribe the qualifications of electors, it might require each voter to be the owners of lands to such amount that few only could vote for members of Congress. It might require also other qualifications, such as education, or perhaps, certain religion.

If the qualifications of electors were permitted to be different for each Government, in the same proportion would the two Governments be different in their composition and character, and the General Government possessing the greater power, would, in time, destroy the others.

The Democratic doctrines contained in the celebrated Virginia and Kentucky resolutions, the productions of the two great statesmen, Jefferson and Madison, would be prostrated to the dust.

These evils, in my judgment, the Constitution intended to prevent and avoid. It intended, as it said, that the foundation of each Government should be based on the same people, professing the same qualifications as electors in both Governments.

The second section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States contains the following, to wit:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States; and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

This language and expression would appear manifest to a plain common man. "To have the qualifications requisite for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature," cannot mean that the electors shall have other and further qualifications to enable them to vote for members of Congress. We are prohibited from giving the General Government more power than is given by a fair and reasonable interpretation of the Constitution. The 10th article in the amendment of the Constitution says:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

The above article does not require the "citizens" of the United States to choose members of Congress every second year. The Representatives shall be chosen "by the people of the several States."

The people of a State, ex vi termini, does not necessarily mean that they are citizens of the United States. I am satisfied that "the people of a state," and the citizens of the United States, have different significations, and so it was considered by the framers of the Constitution. Indians and negroes are, while residents of a State, people of the State. They are people, although they may not be citizens of the United States. Aliens may very properly be termed part of the "people of the State," when they reside within the State—hold land in it, and are subject to all the burdens of taxation, military duty, &c. like other people.

"The people of the State" must be understood to refer to those residing within the limits of the State, and excluding those living without from exercising the elective franchise for members of Congress in a different State from which they reside. This is the only restraint imposed on the States by the Federal Constitution. The "people" voting for members of Congress must reside within the States where their votes are given.

The following provision in the Constitution of the United States, under the second section of the first article above alluded to, will sustain the position I have taken.

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included in this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons."

In the above extract the words "the whole number of free persons" are used, and the word "citizen" is not mentioned at all; so that the conclusion must be correct, that the Constitution did not intend to circumscribe the action of State Governments to the qualification of citizenship for the electors. "Free persons" are the basis to which the "three fifths" were to be added, and are likewise the basis on which both the State and Federal Governments are founded.

If the framers of the Constitution had intended to have used the word "citizen" in place of "the people of the States" and "free persons," or to have attached the qualification of citizenship to the elector, they would have done so, as they had in the same instrument authorized the naturalization of aliens, and regulated the extent of citizenship.

The provision in the Constitution, that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," does not authorize either House to alter or change the qualifications of electors.

The House is to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, according to the laws and Constitution of the State where the election was had. There is no power given in this expression to add to or diminish the qualifications of voters, and, in all the contested elections, so far as I have examined them, the House has not pretended to exercise this power.

The Constitution of the State of Illinois, in the 27th section of the 2d article, prescribes the qualifications of electors in these words:

"In all elections, all white male inhabitants above the age of twenty-one years, having resided in the State six months next preceding the election, shall enjoy the right of an elector; but no person shall be entitled to vote except in the county and district in which he shall actually reside at the time of the election."

There cannot be any language more plain and explicit than the above. It needs no commentary. It speaks for itself, and speaks a language that cannot be misunderstood.

If an alien be permitted to vote under the Constitution of a State, this does not make him a citizen of the United States. I pretend not that a State can naturalize aliens, and make them citizens of the United States. The elective franchise is quite as similar from citizenship. A person may enjoy one, or the other, or both, and in some cases neither; as the people of color in Illinois do not vote and are not citizens.

It has been the uniform practice under the Constitution of the United States, since its adoption, so far as my knowledge extends, for the several States to prescribe the qualifications of the electors within each State respectively; and I believe almost every State in the Union possesses some difference in their respective qualifications of electors. They differ, some in the property qualification, some in time of residence, some in color, some in citizenship, and alienage, &c.

This marked difference, and great variety in the qualifications of electors in the several States of this Union, establish the true and correct exposition of our Constitution on this subject. Heretofore, in many of the States, and in some at the present time, free people of color exercise the elective franchise. This practice is authorized by the State Governments; and I have never heard of any contested election being before this House on that ground. If Congress had the power to change the laws and Constitution of a State on this subject, it would be a subject more likely to call for the speedy action of Congress, than perhaps any other. Yet it remains for the States to regulate, under the Constitution, as it may seem just and proper. Within a few years, Tennessee has changed her Constitution, so that people of color do not now vote in that State, and perhaps other States have also amended their Constitutions, so that this class of people do not vote.

These amendments of the State Constitutions demonstrate that the States have exclusive power over this subject, and that it is left with them to correct the evil, if it be one. It also proves, the States having exclusive power, that the General Government has none over the subject; and the right of the Government has never been attempted to be exercised in preventing those amendments of State constitutions on this or any other subject. In 1st Littell's reports, p. 334, the Supreme Court of Kentucky decides:

"The negroes and mulattoes are, almost every where, considered and treated as a degraded race of people; inasmuch so, that, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, they cannot become citizens of the United States."

This is a decision I consider directly in point, and it is a decision of an enlightened and intelligent court.

If free negroes and mulattoes have the power to exercise the elective franchise, and are not at the same time citizens of the United States, it must be true with others, that they may exercise the same franchise before they are naturalized citizens.

If this House, judging on a contested election, were to annul and abrogate the Constitution of the State of Illinois, in this clause, or in any other, it would be a revolution in the Government, and a destruction of the present system.

A joint resolution passed in the Congress of the United States, admitting the State of Illinois into the Union "on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever." The subject of the State Constitution of Illinois was before the Congress, and the principles therein contained were examined and agreed to. After this public and solemn act, can Congress recede from it, and annul and change any part of the Constitution? I know of no power, Supreme Court of the United States or other tribunal, that can take cognizance of a State Constitution and decide against it, when such Constitution is "Republican," and the State is admitted into the Union.

The honorable member [Mr. CLAY of Kentucky] says that, if a State Constitution permits aliens to vote, such vote may affect the "composition of the House of Representatives, or the Senate." This is true, that such vote will affect the House and the Senate, and such was the intention of the framers of our Government.

The General Government is not based on the masses of the people throughout the Union, without connection with the States. It is a Government formed by the union of the people of the several States, and not by the general union of the people throughout the territorial limits of the United States. The people of each State, separate and apart from the others, vote for the President of the United States; and the Legislatures of the respective States elect Senators to the Senate of the United States. These are the actions of the States distinct from each other, and in the same manner do they act in their respective component parts of the General Government.

The States, separate and apart from each other, form this part of the General Government, and in the same manner do they act in their respective component parts as States in the selection of members to the House of Representatives. The people of each State, in their State capacity, apart from the others, compose the Government of the United States, which its name indicates.

The people of each State, acting distinct and independent from the others, may prescribe and regulate the composition of the House in any manner, which will, in their judgment, conduce the most to their happiness. This was the political compact made at the formation of our Government, and no one party can now alter or change it. The character of the House may satisfy one section of the Union, when it is quite unsatisfactory to another; yet it is constitutional. Abolition petitions, for example, presented from one section of the Union to the Congress of the United States, are not satisfactory to another; yet this will not form any cause on which to exclude the votes of Abolitionists for members of Congress. If it be an evil to permit aliens to vote, which I do not believe, the community where it exists will be the most conversant with it, more immediately affected by it, and will sooner than all others correct it.

Mr. Chairman, representing a district in Illinois, where the practice for aliens to vote has prevailed since the formation of our Government, and believing, as the people do, that it is right and constitutional, I deemed it my duty to give to the subject some such consideration as I have expressed.

RESOURCES OF ILLINOIS, AND THE STATE DEBT.

Mr. Chairman, the State debt of Illinois and the resources to pay it are subjects of the greatest importance not only to the people of the State, but to many in Europe as well as in America.

For the State of Illinois, I apprehend no danger. The resources of the State are great, and every year they are becoming more developed and more available. Some of the annual products of labor in Illinois, I have already stated, and to which may be added twelve or fifteen million acres of land subject to taxation. The great fertility of soil and extent of the State are known to all. The increase of population, I believe, for some years past, has been unrivalled. The census of 1830 showed the population to be about one hundred and fifty-seven thousand; and it is in 1840 almost half a million. I have no hesitation in saying the census of 1850 will exhibit at least one million of souls in Illinois. There is no interior State in the Union, so far from the ocean, that has such facilities for the transportation of her products to market as the State of Illinois possesses.

The resources of Illinois are incalculable, and will, when properly developed and made available, reduce the present State debt into insignificance.

Possessing these physical resources, Illinois has also an honest, industrious, and intelligent population to sustain and support the honor and character of the State at all hazards.

The Chief Magistrate of the State, in his late message to the General Assembly, possessing that noble and patriotic feeling which actuates all honest and patriotic men, and expressing a fac simile of the sentiments of the State, says:

"A failure to meet promptly a single one of her engagements, would inevitably throw around her future operations, difficulties that would prove destructive to her character and interest, and in a great degree, paralyze her energies.

"Although there may be but one opinion among our citizens, that the money for which we are indebted has been injudiciously appropriated, still their virtue and patriotism—their high sense of honor and justice, imperiously forbid delinquency in its payments. I am clearly convinced that they would look upon no calamity which might befall them, so great and humiliating as that which would strip them of their reputation for punctuality and probity in their engagements. When a State loses sight of these paramount considerations in her public policy, when she ceases to hold integrity up to the world, as the polar star of her legislation—when she becomes careless of her standing among the communities around her, she will settle down in hopeless degradation, and become the scorn and contempt of the world. Strongly impressed with these sentiments, I have convoked you."

Nothing can be more honorable and patriotic than the above recommendation to the Legislature. I hope the members of the General Assembly will take fire at the holy zeal of Governor Carlin for the honor and interest of the State; and make ample provision for the punctual payment of interest on the State debt.

This debt itself is not so great as is supposed without examination. The whole debt for the canal which is already contracted and may hereafter be contracted to complete it, cannot injure the State. The amount at present is $3,950,000, and perhaps it will require a similar sum to complete it. This work will take two or three years to finish, and when completed, will not only pay the interest on the debt, but produce a considerable revenue to the State. This is the most important work in the Union, or perhaps in the world. It connects a more extensive region of fertile country in commerce, than any other improvement on earth. All the waters of the valley of the Mississippi are connected by it with the Lakes, St. Lawrence and the various facilities of commerce in the State of New York.

The country is becoming so densely populated, and the improvements of the same so much advanced, whose interests it will be to use this canal, that it will be a source of revenue to the State so soon as it is completed.

It is ninety-seven miles long, sixty feet wide at the top water mark, and the water in it six feet deep, commencing at Chicago, on Lake Michigan, and terminating at Peru, the head of navigation on the Illinois river.

I may add that about two hundred and seventy thousand acres of land, which were granted by the General Government to the State for the construction of this canal, remain yet unsold, and will, when the canal is finished, produce an amount of money that will go far towards liquidating the whole debt. For the sale of part of these lands the sum of $1,117,654 is now due the canal.

The total bank debt is $3,100,000. This amount is in operation in the banks of the State, and yields a dividend of six or eight per cent; so that in fact that is not a debt, but rather an income to the State.

The internal improvement debt is $3,187,000 for the sale of stock for railroad and river improvements. There are various other items of indebtedness, which, added to the above sum, swells it to $5,345,000. The railroad iron amounts to half a million, which is unsold. There are upwards of forty thousand acres of land appertaining to this fund, and other property and buildings, so that the debt of the State, on which interest must be paid, may be placed at about $4,000,000. Not many of the roads on which the above sum was expended are completed, so that, as to the present time, the State will receive no great benefit from them. The State debt to the school fund is near $800,000, and the sum to the banks of the State, which constitute the whole State debt. The domestic debt, for which the State has issued no bonds, will not press on her at this crisis for the interest, so that the only debt for which the State stands bound to provide for the permanent payment of interest, is that of $4,000,000 for the railroad system.

The canal debt, and that for the banks, and some others, are not computed in the four millions of dollars for which the State is bound to pay interest. All the others are for works which either will sustain themselves, or not press the payment of interest at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, having resided in Illinois from my early youth to the present time, and thereby being identified with the people in all our common interests and feelings, I would be derelict to myself and the people were I to remain silent and hear the character of my country assailed for the non-performance of her engagements. I therefore make the above unvarnished statement in the performance of my duty to the people. The public is hereby enabled to form a correct judgment on this subject, which is my only object.

NOTE.—Since the above speech was delivered, the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois has decided that aliens are entitled to vote.

SPEECH OF MR. WELLER,

OF OHIO.

In the House of Representatives, February 3, 1841—
On the Treasury Note bill.

Mr. WELLER addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: In rising to address the committee at this late hour in the debate, I can scarcely hope to say any thing that will be worthy of their serious consideration. My object, however, is not so much to discuss the immediate question before the committee, as to allude briefly to some of the various topics which gentlemen of the Whig party have introduced into this debate.

The question upon which we are now called to vote, is, whether or no we will authorize the Secretary to issue five millions of Treasury notes, to supply a temporary deficiency in the revenue. The Secretary, who is by law placed at the head of the finances of the Government, has, in the discharge of his official duties, presented a report, in which he informs us that it will be necessary, in order to meet all the demands against the Government promptly when presented, that a debt should be contracted to the amount of five millions of dollars; not for the purpose of supplying a permanent deficiency in the Treasury, but for the purpose of anticipating the revenue. In other words, he estimates that the receipts into the Treasury will, during the whole year, be amply sufficient to defray all the necessary expenditures of the Government; but that, in consequence of the limited receipts during the first quarter, and the great demands against the Treasury at that time, there will not be enough to meet all the liabilities as they fall due. The reason of this is obvious, and is satisfactorily explained in the report—the larger portion of the revenue will come into the Treasury towards the close of the fiscal year, whilst the heaviest demands will be made at a much earlier period. The use by the Government of its own credit, in the form of Treasury notes, is deemed the cheapest, as well as the most convenient, way of meeting this state of affairs, and has been resorted to at various times in the history of our Government. In the report before me, the Secretary sets down the whole means of the Government, for the year 1841, at $24,723,473, and estimates the ordinary expenses at $19,250,000; to this last sum is to be added $4,500,000 for the redemption of Treasury notes, and the further sum of $149,200 on account of the funded debts, chiefly for the cities of this District: making, in all, $23,899,200. So that there will be, at the close of the year, should Congress confine the appropriations to the estimates, after all payments whatever, a balance of $524,273 in the Treasury. Here, then, is the official report, made by the Secretary under the responsibilities of his oath, exhibiting the fiscal situation of the Government. That officer has all the data in his possession necessary to enable him to communicate the truth to Congress. He has done so: and yet we find gentlemen on this floor making a systematic effort to induce the country to believe that there is a permanent deficiency in the revenue; that the Government is deeply involved in debt; and that no reliance is to be placed in the report. Now, Mr. Chairman, why is it that the leaders of the Whig party here are laboring so assiduously to produce the impression that the Government is in debt? The reason is apparent to every man who has paid any attention to the movements of that party. They desire to make this a pretext for an extraordinary session of Congress; and then, by resorting to a loan, create a national debt, and thus lay the foundation for the establishment of a National Bank. That class of politicians who believe that a national debt "is a national blessing," has not yet become extinct. They know that the Bank of England (and from that country they borrow many of their political dogmas) would soon totter, and crumble to the ground; if it were not for the enormous debt of that country; they know, too, that a National Bank cannot be sustained in this Government without a national debt; and hence their efforts, on all occasions, to produce a necessity for one.

I have been considerably amused at the contrariety of opinion amongst the learned Whigs who have addressed the committee on this branch of the subject. They all agree that there is a permanent deficiency in the revenue, and yet differ widely as to the amount of that deficiency. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] declares that the deficiency will amount to from seven to ten millions of dollars! The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] thinks it will be some fifteen millions! The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] says about twelve or fifteen millions. While the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD], out-ciphering the whole of them, puts it at not less than forty millions! Now, sir, whatever confidence I may have in the mathematical learning and ability of the gentlemen, yet I prefer, in a case of this kind, relying on the report of the Secretary, who, from his position as the fiscal officer of the Government, is enabled to look over the whole ground, and give us the true condition of our finances; he must, certainly, understand the resources of the Government, the sum that will probably be received in the Treasury, and the amount necessary to a proper administration of its affairs. This bill is founded on that report; and we, who are now in the majority here, are not only willing, but anxious, to provide the necessary means to enable those who are soon to take charge of the Government, to meet all the demands against the Treasury, and preserve the public credit inviolate. Although the Administration we have supported has been defeated and overthrown, yet our interest in the Government does not cease on the 4th March next. No, sir; the same love of country—the same ardent desire to perpetuate the liberties transmitted to us by our ancestors, that actuated us in by-gone years, still animates our bosoms; and, although displaced from office, we still cherish our institutions, and wish that they may be so administered as to promote the interests and advance the happiness of the people. As I know these to be my own feelings, so I believe them to be the sentiments of the party to which I belong.

Several gentlemen of the Opposition, high in the confidence of the Whig party, have, during the present debate, advocated the establishment of a National Bank, as not only constitutional, but as absolutely necessary to a proper administration of the fiscal affairs of the Government. I have no disposition to anticipate this question, by entering into a discussion of its merits at the present time; but when it is submitted, as it probably will be at the next session of Congress, as a distinct proposition for action, I trust I will be ready to meet it. In the mean time, however, I may remark, that it is now before the country, as one of the prominent measures of those who are soon to come into power; and, as such, demands the serious consideration of the American people. Upon this subject, permit me to say, I stand where Thomas Jefferson, the great apostle of American Democracy, stood in 1791; and deny the constitutional power to create such an institution. This, sir, is my position, and no human power shall drive me from it. As long as I retain a seat in the public councils, as long as my constituents honor me with their confidence, you may rest assured that no institution which exists by a violation of the Constitution, and which, in its practical operations, is calculated to swallow up the sovereignty of the States and the rights of the individual citizen, will receive my countenance or support. But, sir, although invited by gentlemen on the other side, I do not intend to debate this subject now, but merely to mark it as one of the measures of the new Administration.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, that the leaders on the other side have attempted, by their ingenuity in the use of figures, to make us believe that there was a permanent deficiency in the revenue. If such be the fact, (which is by no means admitted,) how comes it that we have a proposition in the other end of the Capitol (the Senate) to divide the proceeds of the public lands amongst the States? If the Treasury is, as you allege, already bankrupt, why increase that deficiency, by cutting off the revenue arising from the public domain? Sir, this is a new plan for replenishing a deficient Treasury, and deserves to be ranked amongst the greatest discoveries of the age. You have said that there was a "permanent deficiency" in the Treasury; and, in order to make this true, you propose to give a portion of the revenue to the States! But, sir, I deny the power, under the Constitution, to distribute this money amongst the States, as has been contended for by gentlemen on the other side of the House. Congress has no power to levy taxes on the people, to collect money for distribution among the States. No gentleman in this House dare rise in his place, and assert the constitutional right of Congress to divide the revenue collected under your tariff laws amongst the States. The money arising from the sales of the public lands goes into the Treasury, constitutes a part of the revenue of the Government, and is liable to all the restrictions imposed by the Constitution upon any part of the public treasure. If you can distribute any portion, you can distribute the whole. But, gentlemen tell us, this money arises from the sale of the lands belonging to the Government, and that the Constitution declares that Congress shall have power to dispose of the territory belonging to the United States. If, under this section, you claim the power to sell the public domain, and distribute the proceeds to the States, you can levy taxes on the people, purchase land, sell it, and divide the proceeds. Now, it is a well settled rule in law, that you shall not be permitted to do indirectly, what you are not allowed to do directly; so that, in my humble judgment, the admission that Congress had not the constitutional power to distribute the money collected by means of a tariff, is a surrender of the question, and an acknowledgment of the unconstitutionality of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands.

But, sir, this distribution act, so far as it goes, is intended to be an assumption of the State debts; its effect will be to enhance the value of the State bonds, some of which are now worth only sixty cents on the dollar. These bonds, to the amount of more than two hundred millions, are now held by the British bankers and brokers; and you propose, by assuming the debt, to enhance the value in their hands; thus giving them at once some seventy or eighty millions of dollars! Many of the States have run perfectly wild in their schemes of internal improvements, and have contracted debts abroad, which you now propose to pay by imposing additional burdens (for you must increase your tariff if you divide the land revenue) upon the people of the non-indebted as well as the indebted States. It was boldly charged on the Whigs during the late canvass, that, if they succeeded, the British bankers would have cause to rejoice; for a bill providing, in some shape or form, for the assumption of the State debts, would be passed. It was charged that these bankers were exciting the influence which their money gave them to defeat the present Administration. They held upwards of two hundred millions of our stocks; and it is unreasonable to suppose they would remain inactive, when their pecuniary interest, to so great an extent, was involved in the contest. I do not intend to say that a sufficient number of votes were actually purchased to change the result—(although, under the pipe-laying system, which has recently obtained in many parts of the country, much was doubtless used in this way)—but that its corrupting influence was seen and felt, in the printing and distribution of the various publications made by the Whigs, misrepresenting the acts and traducing the character of the present Chief Magistrate, and in the getting up of idle shows and pageantries. That foreigners did interfere in our elections is proved by the numerous publications which have recently been made. It is unnecessary for me to read them; for they have already been submitted to the people, and have doubtless received, as they merited, their serious consideration. I present, however, one extract from an English paper, showing the feeling of the people of that country against the Democracy of this:

"The election of General Harrison to the Presidency of the United States is an event deeply interesting to England."

"Mr. Van Buren was the deadly enemy of Great Britain. He stimulated the various crusades against paper money. He headed the conspiracies that were formed for the purpose of defrauding English creditors out of the debts due them by America. He was the abettor of treason in Canada. He prompted resistance to the just claims of England in reference to the Northeast boundary question."

"The sympathies of General Harrison point, we believe, in a direction the reverse of that to which the prejudices of Mr. Van Buren inclined."

"The election of General Harrison is, in short, a result on which England may congratulate herself."

This extract is taken from the "London Morning Chronicle," and is, in my opinion, the highest compliment that could be paid to Mr. Van Buren. To be abused and denounced by the monarchists of England, is the strongest evidence of his attachment to our free institutions. But, sir, I have no disposition to pursue this subject farther.

Some gentlemen, seeing the dilemma in which they were about to be placed by the distribution act, have sought to relieve themselves by a proposition to levy a duty on wines, silks, &c. and thus, by the imposition of new taxes on the people, supply the vacuum produced in the Treasury by the withdrawal of the land revenue; so that, in order to have money for distribution to the States, you must increase the burdens on the people. This is not, in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the proper time for the adjustment of this question; but when the tariff comes before us for revision, it can be discussed. In the meanwhile, let us husband our resources for an economical expenditure; and, if duties are to be levied on these articles, let it be taken off, in a corresponding degree, from the necessities of life, in order that the laboring man (who, after all, is compelled to pay this duty,) may be relieved as far as possible from taxation. But I have no disposition to debate this question now.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD] notwithstanding he declares there is a "permanent deficiency" in the revenue of some forty millions, charges the Democratic party with "niggardly parsimony" in the Administration of the Government; and hopes that, under General Harrison's auspices, the various harbors, fortifications, and other works which, he alleges, we have neglected, will be liberally attended to! Instead of reducing the expenditures of the Government, as the Secretary recommends, he is for increasing them; and this, I suppose, is his plan for diminishing his deficit of forty millions in the revenue. But, sir, we are charged with a "niggardly parsimony." Before the election, the Whig orators in every part of the country denounced, in tones of thunder, the Administration, for having increased the expenses of the Government. Notwithstanding the expenditures last year (1840) were some ten millions less than in 1838, yet we were told the public money was squandered. Now that the election is over, instead of extravagance, we have the cry of "parsimony." Let the people mark this! The gentleman from New York also said (if I understood him) that the furniture in the President's House was unfit for the dwelling of a gentleman. This, Mr. Chairman, was the unkindest cut of all. Immediately preceding the adjournment of the last session of Congress, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OGLE] made a speech commenting on all the articles of furniture in the President's House, from the garret to the cellar, and from the parlor to the kitchen, and attempted to show that Mr. Van Buren was living in the style and fashion of a king, rather than of a Republican President. That speech was sent out by thousands—yea, millions—and constituted the political capital of the grogshop politicians and small-beer orators of that party throughout the country. But the object has been attained. The election is over, and the "gold spoon" humbug explodes. From the course you are now pursuing, the people will be enabled to see how much honesty characterized your conduct preceding the election.

There is another subject, introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] to which I beg leave to refer. I allude to the "prospective pre-emption law," which, I rejoice to learn, was passed by the Democratic party in the Senate on yesterday, and is now in this House for its action. It has been denounced here as a "humbug, designed to catch votes;" and gentlemen have volunteered the assertion that we did not desire its passage. Now, sir, what is this bill? It is simply a proposition to give the settler upon the public lands the right of pre-emption; and differs only from the laws heretofore passed, in the fact that it is prospective in its operation. It does not propose to give the public domain to the settler, but to allow him to take that portion on which he has settled and built a log cabin, at the Government price, within a limited period. It is a measure for the benefit of the poor man, for the humble tenants of the log-cabins; for those who may be driven by poverty from the older States, and who may go with no bank-bills, perhaps, in their pockets, but with strong arms and honest hearts, to hunt for themselves and their families a home in the far West. Sir, if this were a measure for the advancement of the pecuniary interest of speculators or bankers, it would not meet with the opposition it does from Whig gentlemen. Although loud in their professions of attachment to the poor man, when office is to be obtained, in their legislation little regard is paid to his interests. Gentlemen have denounced these settlers as "lawless squatters" and "land pirates," and told us that the United States marshal ought to be sent with a military force to dispossess them. Sir, if a banker (as is the practice every day) swindles the community out of millions, the act goes unwhipt of justice; but if a poor man settles down on the public land, and endeavors, by his industry and frugality, to procure a livelihood for his children, you would raise a military force to turn him off, and deprive him of the little improvement he had made. This may be Whig policy and Whig justice; but, I venture the assertion, the American people are not prepared for such doctrine. In the estimation of these Whig orators, to cut down a few trees in a dense and almost unbroken forest belonging to the Government, for the purpose of cultivating a few acres of corn, is a most heinous offence; whilst they suffer the bankers to violate the laws, make sport of their legislation, acquire wealth by their villainies, and ride in proud triumph over the ruin and deolation of the laboring man. Sir, there is a point beyond which forbearance ceases to a virtue; and the time will come when this great money power, which is eating out the substance of the people, must be checked by year legislation, or the land will be deluged in blood. The day of retribution is at hand, and we be to that legislator who seeks to aggrandize the few by the oppression of the many.

The pre-emption bill is a favorite measure with me, and enlists all the sympathies of my nature. It affords me the most sincere pleasure to do all in my power to advance the interest of the hardy and enterprising emigrant, who, abandoning the home of his fathers, the worn-out, worm-eaten land of his nativity, has taken up his abode in the rich valleys of the far West. Sir, I would rather be recognised as the champion of such men, than hold the highest office within the gift of my country. Let these men have the encouragement of the Government—the promise that, within a limited period, they shall be permitted, at your present price, to purchase the land on which they reside; and, with their industry and enterprise, the rude cabin will soon give way to the comfortable dwelling, and the wilderness be made “to bloom and blossom as the rose.” By the passage of this act, many, in the old States of this Union, who now feel, from day to day, the cutting lash of penury and want, and who have families growing up around them, without the ability to supply them with even the necessities of life, would emigrate to the West, settle down on your lands, and soon surround themselves with all the comforts of life. In this way you would not only contribute to their happiness, but in making them the owners of the soil, increase and strengthen their attachment to the Union; and thus lay the foundation for the permanent prosperity of the country broad and deep in the affections of the people. I would, for my own part, much rather make a gift of the public domain to bona fide settlers; who would improve the country, than to see it falling at the Government price into the hands of speculators.

One word more on this point. If gentlemen regard this pre-emption bill as an “electioneering” measure, what, I ask, do they think of the distribution act? That is a measure which has been hawked about by a distinguished Senator [Mr. CLAY] for a number of years, and has constituted a large portion of his political capital; a measure, through the influence of which he hopes to reach the goal of his ambition—the Presidency. If the pre-emption bill which has passed the Senate passes this House, (and I know it will not be the fault of the Democracy if it does not,) and the price of the public lands is graduated, many portions of the country, now considered unproductive and valueless, will soon be settled and under cultivation. A considerable part of the public domain has been in market for some twenty or thirty years; and, if the price of this were reduced and graduated, much of it might be sold; and thus the Treasury replenished, without a resort to additional taxes on the people. This policy has been adopted by some of the States in disposing of their lands, and ought to be pursued by the General Government.

Much has been said by the different gentlemen who have addressed the committee in relation to the policy of the next Administration. Whilst gentlemen tell us that General Harrison stood fairly committed before the public upon all the various questions in which the people are interested, we find them here differing widely as to the measures he will recommend, or the policy he will adopt. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] hopes and believes that liberal appropriations will be made, the “niggardly parsimony” of the present Administration abandoned, and a National Bank established. We are also told, by those high in the confidence of the President elect, that the proceeds of the public lands will be distributed amongst the States, and an additional tariff levied on certain articles, to make up the deficiency in the Treasury. Other gentlemen of the same party have denounced these measures, and declared such would not be the policy of General Harrison. The eloquent gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE], who has long stood before the country as one of the ablest champions of the Whig cause, has denounced, in unmeasured terms, an increase of the expenditures of the Government, the project for a duty on wines and silks, and the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. Well, sir, here stand members of the same party differing in every thing, as to the course of the next Administration. Now, does not every one see that if, as has been alleged,

General Harrison's views were well known to the country, this contrariety of opinion would not exist. I have no disposition to speak harshly of the man who has been selected by my countrymen to preside over the destinies of this Republic. Notwithstanding the manner in which he comes in, he ought to have a fair trial. If, as his friends declared before the election would be the case, his measures are in accordance with those which governed the Administration of Jefferson—if he adheres to the good old Republican doctrines taught by our fathers—I will not be found arrayed against him. But if, on the contrary, he proves a latitudinarian in his construction of the Constitution—if, under his auspices, a National Bank is created, and a national debt saddled upon the people, to carry on a splendid system of internal improvement, thus making the States the mere stipendiaries of the General Government—if the public money is to be taken from the hands of public officers, where the framers of the Constitution intended it should be, and given to bankers, to increase their dividends and enhance the value of their stock—then, sir, I will oppose his administration boldly and fearlessly, and to the fullest extent of my humble abilities. The Democratic principles, which I believe to be inseparably connected with the prosperity of the country, shall not be sacrificed, if I have the power to avert it.

We have, during this debate, had the novel spectacle of Whig members debating the question, whether or no we will have a special session of Congress this summer. The Constitution gives the President alone the power to convene Congress, should he deem it necessary. This House has no control whatever over the subject, and yet it has been warmly discussed by gentlemen in the Opposition. I understand that a caucus, consisting of the Whig Senators, has been held, at which it was determined that a special session should be called.

Here, Mr. JENIFER of Maryland, rose, and after disclaiming any knowledge of such a caucus, asked for the authority on which the declaration was made.

Mr. WELLER responded that he made the assertion on the authority of the Whig papers in New York and Philadelphia; in one of which the names of the Senators in attendance were given. He was not aware that the Senator thus named had authorized a denial of the correctness of the report.

Mr. JENIFER asked Mr. WELLER whether he believed all he read in Whig papers?

Mr. WELLER replied that he was not generally in the habit of placing much confidence on them; but that, when they undertook to give the movements of their party-leaders, he supposed they might be depended on.

It is then settled, Mr. Chairman, so far as the advisers of the President are concerned, that we must have a special session of Congress. And for what purpose? If our country were about to be involved in a war, and it were important to make preparations for defending our rights, an extraordinary session might be necessary and proper; but why call us from our homes, at an expense of some three or four hundred thousand dollars to the people? I know of no other reason than because you are anxious to repeal the act commonly called the “Sub-Treasury bill. In the late canvass the banks freely expended their money to elevate the Whig orators to office; and now they are impatient for their remuneration; they have complied with their part of the contract, and expect you to comply with yours, by giving them the use and custody of the public money. They are unwilling to trust you until the annual session of Congress. Yes, sir; the banks have issued their edicts to you, and you have issued yours to the President elect, demanding a special session of Congress, in order that the “Sub-Treasury” may be repealed, and the public money be again given to a favored few to advance their interests. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANE] said that this act had “carried darkness and gloom into every avenue of life,” and has repeated to this House a speech about the removal of the deposits, the specie circular, the Bank of the United States, &c. I have no doubt, sir, that speech was frequently recited to his constituents at home during the late election, and received from them much more attention than it met with here. We were told some years ago, when the patriot of the Hermitage was a candidate for the Presidency, that “war, pestilence, and famine” were preferable to the rule of a military chieftain; and another distinguished Senator, who is soon to be in the cabinet, in depicting the ruin that must ensue from the removal of the deposits, declared that our “canals would be a solitude, and our lakes a desert waste of waters.” But, sir, that military chieftain was elected; and neither “war,” “pestilence,” nor “famine,” overspread the land; but, on the contrary, so ably did he administer the Government, that we now find these men the most devoted supporters of military chieftains. The public deposits were not restored, nor were our canals made a “solitude;” but, on the contrary, the commerce of the country increased, and the people continued prosperous and happy. But I have no inclination to review the acts of General Jackson's administration; they have been passed upon by the American people, and now constitute a part of our national history. He who believes he can divert public attention from the profligate acts of the banks, and make them believe that the mere fact of the Government taking care of its own money, by means of the “Sub-Treasury” law, has produced the present low prices of labor and produce, and the general embarrassment in the business of the country, has much mistaken the intelligence of the people. The time for such arguments (if arguments they can be called) has gone by. It may have done well enough, during a heated canvass, to advance such doctrines; but the time for reasoning has returned, and the sober judgment of the people is now directed to the true cause of their difficulties.

We have, Mr. Chairman, just passed through one of the most violent contests ever witnessed in our country. The fires of party strife were kindled in the valleys and on the hill-tops; the whole republic was converted into an amphitheatre, in which political gladiators met in fierce combat and battle array. The successful party, by low appeals to the prejudices of the people—by shows and parades of the most disgusting character—called into action all the worst passions of the human heart, and made enemies, bitter and irreconcilable, of those whom nature designed for friends. Sir, I need not remind you of the foolish processions, the vulgar songs, and the various shows, which entered into and constituted the capital stock of our opponents in the late canvass. They are still fresh in your recollection, and, I trust, for the honor of our common country, will never again be repeated. Such scenes were insulting to the intelligence of the people, and well calculated to undermine the foundation of our free institutions. But, sir, the election is over; and we have assembled here as legislators, for the purpose of enacting such laws as may be deemed necessary to promote the welfare of our constituents. I expected that the excitement connected with that election had subsided, and that we should meet in this Hall as friends—as Americans jointly interested in the perpetuity of the Republic, and anxious to do all in our power to brighten, to strengthen, and to extend the chain of our federal Union. I did hope that a conciliatory spirit would prevail, and that the rude conflicts through which we have passed would not be renewed; that oil would be poured upon the troubled waters; that our victorious opponents would act in the spirit that becomes a generous foe, and not, in tones of exultation, taunt us with our defeat, and continue to denounce us as violators of the Constitution, and enemies to the Republic. In all this I have been mistaken. Before the election we were told that, in the event the Whig party succeeded, we should have “an era of good feeling;” that every thing would be done to repress that violent party spirit which has at times threatened the permanency of our institutions. But, sir, the general tone of the Whig members in this debate has been any thing else than pacific. Notwithstanding the public mind demands repose, they have determined there shall be no peace; that this Republic shall again be convulsed, and the fires of party rekindled. During this discussion, the party to which I am proud to belong has been denounced with unusu-acrimony. Well, sir, if this is the course our high-minded opponents intend to pursue, I, for one, am ready for the contest—yes, sir, ready for the fight, come when and where it may; and I shall only cease my exertions when the last spark of American Democracy has been extinguished.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANE] has vauntingly told us that "Loco Focoism was dead, without the hope of a resurrection." If, by the term "Loco Foco," he means the friends of the present Administration known as the Democratic party, let me assure him that he is much mistaken. It is true we have been defeated, but not annihilated. Let him not suppose that we have given up in despair, and intend to fold our arms, and quietly submit to Federal rule. No, sir, we are not disheartened; there is much in the present indicative of a glorious "resurrection" to the Democracy. Already the seeds of disunion are sown in your own ranks, and although you now boast of the strength and power of the giant, you will soon be as weak and harmless as the child in its mother's lap. Hitherto you have had nothing to do but oppose. Now you are placed in the majority, having the responsibility of the Government resting upon you, and you will be compelled to act. That action will exhibit the contrariety of opinion amongst you, and engender a feeling which will eventually lead to a dismemberment of your party. Upon all the great questions introduced in this debate, we have found you differing widely. The log cabins and coon skin banners which you used so successfully in the late contest, will not avail you now. No vulgar songs nor idle shows can divert public attention from your acts. You have promised retrenchment and reform. You have promised to restore the business of the country, reform the currency, and raise the price of labor and produce; and these promises you are expected to redeem. I do not mean, sir, that I expect you to redeem them, (for I am confident you will not,) but the thousands of honest men who voted for General Harrison expect it. Lay not, then, the flattering unction to your soul that Democracy is dead. We who have enjoyed her cheering sunshine will not abandon her now, when enveloped in the clouds of adversity and defeat. To me she is more attractive than in the days of her proudest triumph. Yes, sir, Democracy still lives; founded upon the eternal and immutable principles of truth, though crushed to the earth, it will rise again. Sir, it is a noble sentiment—a sentiment that liberalizes the feelings, expands the heart, and makes man what God intended he should be—his noblest work. Let no Democrat despond, but once more let us rally to the support of our favorite cause. Let us fling out our banner to the winds of Heaven, and inscribe upon its ample folds "uncompromising hostility to a National Bank, and to every law which violates an equality of political rights." Under this banner we will rally with the patriotic enthusiasm, the indomitable energy, and the unflinching perseverance which characterized our fathers when they shook off the yoke of colonial bondage. And if, after all our efforts, this fair Republic becomes the abiding place of an aristocracy as cruel, as insolent, and oppressive as that which curses the older nations of the earth—if, after a temporary prosperity, it sinks down into a moneyed despotism, and our countrymen are compelled to wear the clanking, galling chains of tyranny, we can stand before high heaven, and, with pure consciences, declare that we have discharged our duty.

THE BANKRUPT BILL.

REMARKS OF MR. WRIGHT,
OF NEW YORK.

In Senate, Monday, February 8, 1841.—The Bankrupt bill being under consideration, and the resolution of Mr. HUBBARD to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to so amend it as to include banks and other trading incorporations, being the question before the Senate—

Mr. WRIGHT did not rise, as his friend [Mr. SEVIER] had observed, to make a speech, but the rather, as he was sometimes called upon to do, to a templan explanation of his own course in reference to the bill then before the Senate. Before he proceeded, he would make another remark, and that was that the opinions of Mr. Van Buren, whether favorable or unfavorable, to the proposition under discussion, were only to him the opinions of a friend, whom he respected and admired; but they had nothing to do here, either on the one side or the other, and therefore he should not feel called upon to read from them as authority for his course. He made the remark because he had observed that, to settle what seemed to be a sort of controversy among his friends, they had reference to the opinions of the President, formerly expressed against including banks and other incorporations in the provisions of a bankrupt law, and, at a later period, in favor of including them; for he believed he did the President no injustice, when he said he had changed opinion upon this point, and had frankly expressed that change. This, however, was immaterial to him. He respected the opinions of others, and especially those of the President, as much as any man, and gave them as much weight, and still he endeavored to make up his own mind on all questions upon which he was compelled to act.

He desired now the indulgence of the Senate, while he gave a brief history of the present agitation of this great question of a bankrupt law, which he was compelled to give, to justify his own course and his own action in the matter.

The subject of a bankrupt law had, upon various occasions, occupied the public mind, and claimed the attention of Congress; but the present agitation, so far as his knowledge extended, commenced during the summer and fall of 1839. In any event, the proposition for a bankrupt law first made its appearance in Congress, since he had been a member, during the last session, and the evidences were then abundant that the public mind was becoming awake to some national legislation under the constitutional provision upon that subject. Indeed, he himself received, almost daily, during a large portion of that session, petitions, numerous and respectfully signed, praying Congress to pass a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

He presented such petitions almost daily, as a recurrence to the proceedings of the Senate would show, all of which were drawn almost, if not exactly, in the words of the Constitution of the United States, their prayer being for the passage of a "uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States," without a reference to a single feature which such a law, in the opinion of the petitioners, should take.

Early in those proceedings, as one of those manifestations of public sentiment which, coming from such a source, and relating to such a subject, have ever a strong influence on his mind and action, was a meeting of merchants of the city of New York, at the Exchange in that city, making an appeal to Congress to pass such a law. He (Mr. WRIGHT) did not fail then to see that any bankrupt law must affect the solvent merchants more sensibly than any other interest in this country, except the solvent banks; and his heart rejoiced that the solvent merchants believed it was expedient for Congress to exercise that high power, and to pass a bankrupt law, at a crisis such as then existed. The grant of the power in the Constitution is express and full, but upon one single occasion only, during the existence of our Government, has it been called into exercise, and then for a brief period, and with unsatisfactory results; though we have experienced frequent and severe revulsions in trade, extensive and mischievous derangements of our currency, and periods of wide-spread and deplorable insolvency. The unpublished history of that meeting at the Exchange in the city of New York told him a further fact; that that meeting responded to the sentiment that, if a bankrupt law was to be passed, the banking institutions of the country should be included in its operation, though the resolutions adopted contained no such expression. A gentleman well known to the Senate, and well known to this whole country, (he alluded to a late Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Benjamin F. Butler,) addressed that meeting for hours on that point, and his sentiments were responded to with enthusiasm by the members of the meeting—a meeting comprising a body of merchants of the city of New York—of the bankers—of the brokers—of the traders—indeed, of the business men of all professions and classes, equal in intelligence, in enterprise, in wealth, in all which constituted them competent judges of the proper provisions of a bankrupt law, to any other body of men which could have been assembled in that great city, or at any other commercial point in the country.

Another material step, for he passed but lightly over these subjects, was that the proceedings of that meeting of the merchants and others of that city were, by its order, transmitted to the Legislature of the State of New York, with a respectful request that the Legislature would signify to the representatives of the State in the two Houses of Congress, its opinion on this important subject. The Legislature did pass resolutions in one of its branches, in the precise language of the petitions in favor of a bankrupt law, which had passed through his hands, and which he had before described. In the other branch of the Legislature the form of the resolutions was changed, and they were made to express—he spoke from recollection merely, for he had them not before him—a wish that Congress should exercise its constitutional power to pass a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies of natural persons throughout the United States. That amendment was adopted in the popular branch of the Legislature, but it remains to this day, a question of fact whether that alteration of the legislative resolutions was ever concurred in by the other branch.

He (Mr. WRIGHT) only mentioned this to show that the moment the question of the form of a bill, and especially of the inclusion or exclusion of corporations was agitated any where, it became a question of difficulty; not to express a disrespectful sentiment of the State, or of either branch of its Legislature. Any such expression would be not less a violation of his feelings than of his duty, and he begged to be distinctly understood upon this point. He simply desired, by the reference, to illustrate the difference between general expressions in favor of a bankrupt law, and minute legislative action upon a bankrupt law, such as was now called for from the members of the Senate.

The resolutions came here in the form last mentioned by him, and they were, in that form, presented by his honorable colleague to this body.

A reference to these facts was material to him, as going to account for his action upon the subject, at the last session. Following in the general and open course indicated by these various expressions of the public sentiment and public wish, not a voice was raised from his State, so far as he knew, against the passage of "the bankrupt bill," so called, or in reference to its form and features, until a bill, or rather several bills, had been presented to this body, and the appropriate committee of the body had entered upon the consideration of the delicate subject. Indeed very few expressions even of doubt and fear, and still a less number indicating a distinct friendship for, or opposition to, particular provisions in such a law, until after the report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate had reported, and their propositions had been given to the public.

Among the first of these manifestations of opinion, to which it would be admitted he ought to yield great deference, when expressed upon such a subject, was a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, from which body he had presented a memorial to this body this morning upon the same subject. That memorial, not touching the subject of corporations, stated certain distinct features which the Chamber supposed ought to be incorporated in a bankrupt law. While the bill was under consideration in the Senate, he made his best efforts—and they were humble, and to some extent unsuccessful—to give to the form and features thus recommended. He succeeded, as he had already said, to some extent, and to some extent he did not succeed; but his success went so far as to convince himself, with his very imperfect knowledge of the matter, that the bill came within the most material of the recommendations of the Chamber, and when the question came up on the engrossment, he voted for it.

After he had done so, and upon the evening of the same day, a very respectable committee—and he thought he ought to mention that every member of that committee was a political opponent of his,) arrived here from that Chamber of Commerce, and he was surprised to find them instantly and strongly remonstrating against the bill which the Senate had formed, and against his vote in its favor. Now he had not—if it was his duty to have done so—the firmness to change that vote, and he told the committee at once, that he could not change it. He voted for the final passage of the bill which did pass the Senate and was sent to the House during the last session.

That bill, however, did not become a law. Hence time had been allowed for the public mind to act upon that particular form of a bankrupt law. It had done so to some extent, as the various documents upon the files of the Senate in relation to it and to the general subject would show, but he yet feared that action had been much too limited to afford a sure guide to safe legislation.

To return however to his own experience as to the results from that action of the public mind, so far as it had acted. He took his seat here again at the present session of Congress; and what had been his duty to his constituents, during the period they had been assembled? To present scarcely a petition in favor of a bankrupt law, and a very large number of remonstrances against the passage of such a law as passed the Senate at its last session. He knew that petitions and remonstrances, as a general remark, were very doubtful authority, but the source from which they came might usually be more relied on than the mere names subscribed. In that sense, without desiring to be tedious to the Senate, he would state that he, on the 5th of January, presented remonstrances of this character from the city of New York, signed by 205 merchants and mercantile firms; and in consequence of the controversy which grew out of the question as to the real or fictitious character of the petitioners for and against a bankrupt law, last year, the course adopted this year by these remonstrants had been that every man who signed a remonstrance, put his name, and business, and street, and number thereto; and in every instance where one had been transmitted to him, it had been with the injunction that he would move to have it printed with the names. That he had invariably done, and he had intended in every case to return to the city some two or three of the printed copies, that an investigation in reference to its weight and force, and to the property, standing, and character of the signers, might be made, where alone such investigation could be properly made. With the strictest intention to perform this duty fully, there were several of the remonstrances which had either escaped his notice among the printed documents, or had not yet reached our tables from the printing office.

The remonstrances here spoken of were not remonstrances against a bankrupt law with proper and safe provisions in the judgment of the remonstrants; but against such a bankrupt law as that which passed the Senate at its last session; accompanying an opposition to that bill with an expression of the further opinion, that the present short session will not allow to Congress sufficient time, from its other indispensable duties, to digest and pass such a bankrupt law as the great interests of the country require, in case any such law is to be passed.

To such remonstrances he found, from the printed documents, there were 324 signatures of individuals and firms; and he was informed, from sources to which he could give the highest credit, that these constitute, so far as they go, a body of merchants and business men of the city of New York, equal to any other like number of men of that city. He spoke now, of course, of the solvent merchants, solvent traders, and solvent houses.

There was another class of remonstrants from that city, and these might embrace the names of some of those in the documents to which he had referred, amounting to one hundred and sixty-eight individuals and firms who speak this simple language: "We the undersigned, beseech your honorable body, if it is found to be expedient to pass a uniform bankrupt law, that banks and all other trading corporations be subjected to its operation." On looking over these memorials, as well as the letters which accompany them—for he could not speak from personal acquaintance, that being very limited among the merchants of New York—they embraced a very large body of the most important trading houses in that city. Such, then, and he had confined himself to the city of New York, after the lapse of time from the last adjournment of Congress to this period, was the evidence in reference, not the expediency of passing a bankrupt law, but to its form and character.

In addition to those, and he did not design to protract these remarks, he had received remonstrances from the interior trading towns in the State. He had one from the city of Albany, which he had examined carefully, having an extensive personal acquaintance with the business men of that city, and he could say that he knew but few business houses of that city, or business men in trade, whose names were not subscribed to the paper, which was clear and strong in its terms, and decidedly against any action at the present session. He had others from the town of Utica, one of the largest interior trading towns of the State; and a very few days ago he had presented a similar one from the county of Seneca. Some of these remonstrances were solely against any bankrupt law which should be retroactive under any circumstances and as to any interests, while others were more general in expressed views, but averse to hasty action.

From these expressions of the present public feeling, it would be seen that the creditor interest—that interest which was to be the most materially affected, separate from the debtor interest—had now commenced to speak, the debtor interest having been extensively moved and heard at the last session.

These were his evidences of the wishes of his constituents upon all sides of the great question, very briefly stated; and he begged that he might not be misunderstood. He did not mean to say, or to pretend to know, what were in fact the wishes of his constituents in the matter; but he did say, and he took the responsibility of saying it, that he had never been able to make himself believe that the power conferred upon Congress in this matter, by the Constitution, was a mere power to pass an insolvent law—that it was a power intended to be exercised simply for the discharge of the debtor from his contract, exclusive of the creditor interest. His opinion had ever been, that if it was demanded that they should pass a bankrupt law, the law should be framed upon a fair understanding of the terms. He said nothing now of the application of such a law to any particular classes of men, or to any specified branches of business. Those were points which had been fully discussed at the last session, and upon which the opinion of the present Senate had been very clearly and decidedly expressed. The terms, "bankrupt law," to the mind of every lawyer, apply more emphatically to the security of the creditor than to the exemption of the debtor. They were now called upon to interfere with existing contracts, and to absolve a class of the community who—and he spoke not disparagingly—had contracted debts which they could not pay. There were certainly two sides to such questions, setting aside the constitutional points that might arise. The creditor has rights, as well as the debtor. The creditor has an equal right to call upon Congress to secure his interests, and to protect him from frauds, with the right of the honest debtor to make a similar call to be discharged from his contracts.

He had shown, then, that so far as the expression of opinion of the solvent men, of the business men, of the men who were now sustaining and carrying on the business of the country, could be ascertained in his own State (New York,) it was that the bill which passed the Senate at the last session would be an unsafe law; that it looked too strongly to the interest of the debtor, or rather to the exemption of the debtor, and too little to the security of the rights and property of the creditor. Such, after time for examination and reflection, seemed to him to be the opinion which had been pronounced.

Again, and it may have had more influence on his action and feeling than it should, he had the reiterated expression of men of standing and character, and of as much business importance in the city of New York as any men of that city, that the passage even of the bill for which he had voted at the last session, would be an infliction upon that city infinitely more severe than the sweeping fire of December, 1835, and that the passage of such a bill would be inevitably more destructive to the solvent men of that city, and the business of the city, than that dreadful conflagration. He (Mr. Wright) could not say how much truth there was in this: he could only say that the assertions came from authority which he ought to respect, and connected with which there was no political feeling or association to give them strength with him, for the authors of the assertions were men, he was sorry to say, who had never acted politically with him.

Thus far his principal object had been to show the evidences from his own constituents upon which he had been called to act in this responsible legislation. At the last session those evidences of public opinion seemed to him to take a very different bearing from those exhibited at the present, and hence he had been induced, but a few days since, to express the opinion that, at this late period in our short session, and in the backward state of the public bills which must be passed, there was no hope of maturing a bankrupt bill, which could meet the approbation of both Houses, and become a law; that if such a bill should again pass this body, the other branch of Congress could not even consider, much less pass it; that the bill of the last session was much more imperfect in the judgment of those classes of our citizens most interested in the subject, than he had supposed it to be when he gave it his vote, and should receive material modifications before it ought again to pass this body; that these must occupy the time of the Senate for several days, if attempted to be matured, and must therefore render final action upon the bill in the other House still more hopeless; and that, believing for these reasons that any time of the Senate spent upon it would be lost, he was willing to vote for the postponement of the whole subject.

The pleasure of the Senate was to consider the bill, and hence these remarks from him, and they were not designed to protract discussion.

A few words, and a very few, on the question of including banks and other trading corporations. He begged the Senate not to understand him as intending to enter into a labored constitutional argument upon that important point. He was not capable of doing so then—he had not studied the question sufficiently. If that were not so, it was not his intention to take the time for such an argument now, but to throw out a few suggestions which seemed to him to be plain and practical, for the consideration of gentlemen on all sides. He had learned from business men, what he had believed himself, that the principal moving cause for a bankrupt law had been the action of the banking institutions—that in the time of fullness and expansion, from 1835 to 1837, they had forced out credits, which had been most active agents in producing the bankruptcies now appealing to Congress for a liberation from embarrassment. He (Mr. Wright) admitted to the full extent the right of the States of the Union to charter incorporations for banking, and so far as he knew, to any other extent, always confined, of course, within the constitutional sphere which the State had chosen to prescribe. Under this admission, when the Legislature of a State had exercised the power, what had it created? He cared not whether the State owned the stock of the incorporation, or individuals—it made no manner of difference in his view of the question. What, then, had been created? A body, in the language of the law, "politic and corporate"—a person capable of contracting and of being contracted with—a person capable of suing and of being sued—in other words, a legal fiction which, in a business sense, has the capacity of a freeman and a citizen of the State. That was all. Take the Bank of Alabama, and it was exclusively a State institution—for the honorable Senator (Mr. CLAY of Alabama) said, undoubtedly truly, that the State was the sole owner of the stock. Suppose a suit is to be instituted in the courts of the State for the benefit of the Bank of Alabama, does the State of Alabama bring the suit? No. But this artificial existence, this banking incorporation, created by the sovereign authority of the State, brings it. Again, suppose the Bank in default, and, by a citizen of that or any other State a suit is to be brought; was it against the State of Alabama? And would execution issue to be satisfied by the State in its sovereign capacity, or against the property of that State, properly speaking, as separate from its property in the bank? Certainly not. The execution would act upon the incorporation, and that alone—upon the legal fiction, as to its personal action, and upon the corporate property, and that only, as to its effective operation.

Suppose the bankrupt law be made to act on that fiction. Would it put the sovereign State of Alabama under a commission of bankruptcy? No: but it would put the person of its creation, its legal fiction, into bankruptcy. That seemed to him to be the effect, and the only effect, of the inclusion of State corporations. His friend from Arkansas, [Mr. SEVIER,] had made a strong argument upon this point; but was it pertinent? The State itself might become bankrupt; but the State was not placed within the jurisdiction of Congress. It was sovereign, and not, in any sense as such, subject to the legislation of Congress. It was not to the States that this power was sought to be extended, but to the artificial creations of the States, to the "persons" which, in a legal sense, and for business purposes, they assume to create, and make material and practical agents in the transaction of the common affairs of the community. The power of Congress to pass a bankrupt law reaching by its provisions and its action the business, and credit, and contracts of every trading man in the country, was not questioned; and were gentlemen prepared to contend that these artificial "persons" which the States could create, were superior, and entitled to exemptions and privileges not granted to freemen, to the persons created by the Great Creator of all things?

The honorable Senators to whose remarks he was more particularly replying, [Mr. CLAY of Alabama, and Mr. SEVIER of Arkansas,] must believe that he had peculiar reasons at this time to feel kindly towards their respective States, and to respect all their sovereign rights. Still he could not rate them, in creative power, above the Sovereign of the universe. He could not concede to them, or to the "persons" of their creation, a superiority so vast, and so inconsistent with his feelings as a man, and his rights as a freeman. The corporations existing by State authority are mere legal existences, the creations of the State; and are they superior in moral and legal privileges, to the honorable Senators who represent those States here? And if this Government is likely to exercise a power tyrannical and unjust over those honorable Senators, is it less objectionable than when exercised over those legal fictions of their respective States? over artificial persons which the State may create, with attributes and powers not different in nature and character, however different in extent and compass? What are these corporations? Nothing but business institutions, business "persons," like a freeman; and so far from carrying any power to the extent against them to which it can be carried against either of the Senators or either of the freemen of their respective States, it was beyond the ingenuity of human power to exercise coercion on a fiction. The property of the corporation may be taken, and so may the property of the natural man; but when his property is consumed, coercion may be exercised over his person. The States of the honorable Senators could do this to any extent; but when a power expressly granted to this Government over the trade, and credit, and business of the country, is called into exercise, are we to be told that the legal fictions of the States are to be exempted from its operation, while the creations of God, the natural persons of the country, are expressly subject to it? He could not induce his mind to admit the preposterous idea in theory, or to assent to it in practice.

What was the law of his own State (New York) in relation to its own corporations? It was a bankrupt law upon its banks, and nothing less. It was that, when any bank, chartered by its authority, shall suspend specie payments for the period of ten days, its affairs and effects shall be handed over to honest men, receivers appointed by the authorities of the State, to close it up, and do justice to its creditors. What had kept the banks of New York, in a sound condition, while the banks in the Middle, Southern, and Southwestern States had been involved, and in a state of suspension, for the last year and a half? Nothing, in the judgment of any reflecting man, acquainted with the various State laws, but that provision of the law of the State which visited effective bankruptcy upon every defaulting bank.

Had the sovereignty of his State exempted its banks from that provision? Not at all. It mattered not who held the stock—whether the State or individuals—the liabilities, in either case, went not beyond the stock held and paid in full, and under the law, the defaulting corporations were wound up for the benefit of the persons interested in them. Were the States, in their sovereign character, touched by such a proceeding? His own State was yet a stockholder in many of its banks, but were they, therefore, exempted from the bankrupt provisions of its laws? Why exempt them? When the State brought herself to the position of a bank stockholder, she placed that interest in subjection to the same law and the same equity to which a similar interest, in the hands of the citizens, would be subject in like circumstances. It should be so, and the sovereignty of the State should furnish no exemption for the rotten insolvent banking institutions of her creation.

The sovereignty of the State was not touched by the process. It was but a few years since, that one of the banks, in his own State, in which the State was a stockholder, was wound up in this manner. Still the Chancellor of the State, one of its own agents and servants, as readily issued an injunction against that bank, and delivered its affairs and effects into the hands and charge of a receiver, as if the State had had no interest in it. And what was the consequence? Every dollar of the stock, the interest of the State, proved to have been sunk and lost. Was the sovereignty of the State lost or impaired by that proceeding? Were its pride, its credit, its great and essential interests, impaired and prostrated, because one of the banks of its creation had proved to have been grossly mismanaged, and to be perfectly insolvent? Or because it had been unwise enough to invest the money of its people in such an institution? If consequences such as these had followed the winding up of the rotten bank to which he referred, neither the State nor her people had yet to realize those fatal injuries. If then a bankrupt law of the State itself, operating upon the corporations of its creation, did not impair its sovereignty, injure its credit, or jeopard the interests of its people, even where the State itself was a stockholder, why should such fearful apprehensions be entertained, where the bankrupt law is one passed by Congress, in pursuance of its expressly granted constitutional power? He was wholly unable to answer the inquiry, nor was he able to perceive the slightest difference, either in principle or effect, whether the stock of the incorporation, to be made subject to the bankrupt law, was the property of the State chartering the company, of its citizens, or of strangers to both.

There was no question about the power of Congress to pass a uniform bankrupt law; and to what could it apply? Need he say to all interests of the same grade and character? When, then, a sovereign State creates an incorporation for banking purposes, was this corporate banker to be exempted from the liabilities to which the private banker of the State must unquestionably be made subject? Must the corporate banking power be subject to the provisions of a bankrupt law, when the stock is held by the citizens of the State, and not when the stock is held by the State itself? The liability of the stockholder does not go, in either case, beyond the stock itself? No other property than that of the corporation can be touched by the proceedings in bankruptcy. The State, therefore, when a stockholder, cannot be affected in its sovereignty, its credit, its property, beyond the mere stock owned; and where is the ground of exemption, in either case, which an individual might not claim with equal force and justice?

The individual of wealth, who might be a stockholder in the same bank, could be no further affected by a subjection of the bank to the provisions of a bankrupt law, in the worst possible event, than the loss of his stock. His general credit as an individual would not be destroyed, because an incorporation in which he might happen to hold stock became bankrupt. The only influence upon him, or his credit, would be his ability or not to lose his corporate stock. So precisely with a State holding stock in its own incorporations. The existence of the State as such, and its other property, and its credit, are as distinct from the corporation in which it may hold stock, as are those of the individual in the case supposed. There does not seem, therefore, to be any reason for exempting the corporation from the provisions of a bankrupt law in the one case, which do not prevail with equal force in the other, nor any reasons of justice, or of business expediency, in either, which would not equally exempt every private banker and individual trader.

Was the principle, then, upon which the exemption was attempted to be sustained, that of State sovereignty, sufficiently well settled and clear to warrant the conclusion contended for? He thought not.

His impression was, that in England Sovereignty itself was subject to bankruptcy, under the English law, if it chose to invest property in particular interests; in trading, merchandising, banking, etc. and was just as liable to be proceeded against as a subject. That, he believed, was a well settled principle of English law. The crown was not protection, if its wearer embarked his interests in trading or commercial enterprises. Was the case different in regard to a State? He could conceive no difference.

These few brief suggestions he threw out for the consideration of members, in determining the question of the power of Congress to embrace banks, and other trading corporations, in the provisions of a bankrupt law.

But he would make another suggestion. It was said Congress could not include the corporations as debtors, and still the bill before the Senate contained express provisions to include them as creditors, and to give them all the powers and privileges of other creditors under a bankrupt law.

Now is it so, that, under the constitutional powers granted, Congress can give to these institutions the benefits of a bankrupt law as creditors, and not subject them to the debtor responsibilities of the same law. Were they, as members of Congress, so to construe their powers, and so to practise upon them? The banks have a credit or interest, at this moment, vastly greater in amount than any other similar interest existing in the country, and he was ready to admit that the influence of a bankrupt law upon the outstanding debts of these institutions might be fearful—might be destructive. He would not, however, enter upon that consideration now, as he had touched upon it at the last session. Still he could not admit, great as was the interest involved, that these institutions were to enjoy the summary exercise of the creditor power under a bankrupt law, and not be subject to the corresponding debtor liabilities; that they were to be permitted to put the whole community under a commission of bankruptcy, and not to be the subjects of such commission themselves. More especially he could not consent to this practical exercise of our constitutional powers now. What is the news of the day? Why that the banks, not singly, but in battalions, are failing to redeem their obligations, and to hold themselves liable to comply with their contracts and promises. Hence it was peculiarly proper, as well as necessary, that they should, by law, be put under a commission of bankruptcy for the benefit of their creditors, and he should find the utmost difficulty, in the present aspect of affairs in the country, and with his present views of the powers and duties of Congress in the matter, to vote for any bankrupt law which should not include banks and trading corporations within its provisions as debtors as well as creditors.

26TH CONG....2ND SESS.

Treasury Note Bill—Mr. Duncan.

H. of Reps.

SPEECH OF MR. DUNCAN,

OF OHIO,

In the House of Representatives, January 25th and 26th, 1841.—In Committee of the Whole, on the Treasury note bill.

Mr. DUNCAN addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Whether the present measure is viewed with reference to its expediency or its constitutionality, it would seem fruitless to spend much time in its discussion. That it is constitutional, we have the highest authority; we have the Constitution before us, and we see that it contains no prohibition—neither does the measure effect any of the reserved rights to the States, or to the people—neither does it subvert or threaten any principle of liberty, or the overthrow of any free institution. As to all these, it is perfectly harmless; so that its adoption will violate no principle which it is our duty to maintain. It will be harmless. Such has been the practice of providing means for the Government from its beginning. General Washington signed and approved a bill to authorize the issue of Treasury notes. So other Administrations, as well as this, have exercised the power of issuing Treasury notes. It is a policy which has ever been exercised as a function of the Government. But constitutional objections are in bad time and taste from the Federal party of this House, who have ever claimed the right to draw the Constitution over any measure which they might think "necessary and proper;" a party who can, and do, make the Constitution mean one thing at one time, and another thing at another time, just as party purposes and pecuniary advantages may be secured or advanced. Sir, no Federal crocodile whining, here or elsewhere, against the constitutionality of this measure, is going to lead me into a general constitutional defence of it. There is no sincerity in the objection with those who make it. But next, is this measure expedient? I answer, it is expedient if it is necessary. If the Government wants means, there are but two ways of supplying that want. We must either authorize the Secretary to issue Treasury notes to the amount of the means wanted, or authorize him to obtain a loan for the same. Here, as on every thing else, political, pecuniary, and financial, the two parties are divided. The Democratic party are in favor of using the credit of the Government in the plan of Treasury notes to the amount of what may be necessary to supply the deficit in the revenue; that is, we think the Government should do as a prudent and economical individual would do, if he found himself short of means in the liquidation of a claim for work done him; he would give his obligation, if it would answer the purpose, and satisfy his creditor, until he could avail himself of the means to discharge the demand. Such is the situation of the Government at this time.

The Secretary of the Treasury informs us—and the Committee of Ways and Means sustain him—that there were will be a deficit in the receipts of the Government for the first quarter, owing to the inequality of the collection of revenue, as well as in the inequality of the expenditures, and the object of this bill is to supply that deficit, as well as to provide for the present year against any and all contingencies that may arise, either from a revolution in trade, and a diminution in revenue on imposts thereby, or a bank panic with which this country may again be prostrated, as it has so often been. That there will be, I say, a deficit for the first quarter, there is no doubt. I will read a part of the Secretary's annual report, which I will also make a part of my printed remarks. This report will exhibit the financial condition of the Government at this time, and the probable receipts of the Government for this year, as well as the expenditures called for by the various Departments. This document will be read with high satisfaction by every friend of this Administration who has heard it vilified and slandered for its profligacy and extravagance by the demagogues and reckless office seekers, who have been too successful in overthrowing the Democratic party and an Administration of the people's choice. But now for the Secretary's estimates. He says that—"It may be stated, from the data in possession of this department, that the receipts, under the existing laws, will probably be as follows:

From customs	$19,000,000
From lands	3,500,000
From miscellaneous	80,000
Add the expected balance in the Treasury, available on the 1st of January next	1,580,855

The aggregate of ordinary means for the next year would then be 24,160,855

There will be nothing more, either of principal or interest, due from banks, which is likely to be made available, except about 220,000

A power will exist, under the act of 31st March, 1840, to issue Treasury notes till a year from its passage expires, but not to make the whole emission outstanding at any one time exceed five millions of dollars

This will furnish additional means, equal to the computed amount which can be issued at the close of the present year, being about 342,618

Hence, there may be added, from these several sources, so much as to make the whole means for the next year 24,723,473

On the other hand, the expenditures for 1841, for ordinary purposes, if Congress make no reduction in the appropriations requested by the different Departments, are estimated at 19,250,000

This would leave a balance in the Treasury, at the close of the year, equal to 5,473,473

But certain payments must also be made on account of the funded and unfunded debt, unless Congress authorize contracts to be formed for extending the time of their payment. Thus, there will be required—

On account of the funded debt, chiefly for the cities of this District	$149,200
For the redemption of Treasury notes, if all the others be issued which can be under the present law, as then the amount returned within A. D. 1841 will probably not exceed	4,500,000
	4,649,200

Estimated balance in the Treasury at the close of the next year, after all payments whatever $824,273

It is seen by this report, and the estimates as calculated, that there will be a balance in the Treasury at the end of the year, of $824,273, and but for the present deficit in the Treasury, no issue of Treasury notes would be necessary. Could the expenditures of the whole year be equally divided to each quarter, the anticipated receipt of the year would be ample; but it frequently happens that the heaviest expenditures fall upon quarters of the year when the receipts of revenue are the lightest. Hence the necessity of providing means against contingencies.

It will be seen by the application of the Natchez Bank, to have suspended by action of Congress the collection of a claim which the Government has upon that institution, that the Treasury will be minus in the present quarter the amount of that claim, from the Treasurer's report. The claim is, I believe, $180,000. If the collection of this claim should be postponed, it will add to the necessity of the issue of Treasury notes. Then we see that means must be raised. The condition of the Treasury requires it. The honor, justice, and obligations of the Government demand it. How, again I ask, is the means to be raised? We, the Democracy, say, by the issue of Treasury notes, which is a safe and convenient method. It is speedy. It is done at once, without trouble and without cost or expense. The Federalists are opposed to this way. They are for making a loan. And where can we borrow the money?—from the banks? No: they are unable to pay their own debts. Their rag promises will not serve the purposes of Government. Where next will we go? To private capitalists? It is doubtful whether such an amount could be procured from them in this country, nor would capitalists be willing to withdraw their money from hands where it is secure, to lend it for so short a time as the Government shall want it. Where next shall we go? To European capitalists? We owe them a little too much already, as we have seen by the influence which they wielded of late in our domestic and political institutions. Besides, if we were disposed to sink our nation and our people farther in degradation and vassalage to the moneyed aristocracy of the London Exchange by making a foreign loan, there is not time to accomplish it to meet the wants of the Government. The Treasury wants the money now. It is now means are wanted; wanted for the pensioners; wanted for the army; and wanted for the civil officers of your Government, here and elsewhere. But a national debt is a darling object with the Federal party. They have long since adopted the English maxim, that "a national debt is a national blessing." And if that debt could be commenced under a Democratic Administration, they would enjoy all the benefits that would accrue to Federal Aristocracy without the political odium of having contracted it. But, sir, I think we will leave the exercise of that policy to the coming Administration. It shall have both the party benefits and the responsibility. And now, sir, having briefly shown that present means are wanted to enable the Government to fulfil its engagements for the present quarter, and having expressed my opinion in favor of the issue of Treasury notes for that purpose, in preference to obtaining a loan, and thereby commencing the establishment of a national debt, which I consider a national curse, I might conclude my speech, but for certain charges and assertions which have been made in the course of this debate by gentlemen of the Opposition, which I feel bound to respond to in part. I will present those charges and assertions, and respond to them as I present them.

The Secretary of the Treasury informs us, by his report, that the Government has promptly met every demand which has been presented upon the Treasury during the last year. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] says that is not the fact. He tells us that the Government is largely indebted, and that the Treasury Department has been postponing, through various other Departments, the just claims and demands settled and authorized by law to be paid, and that even the admitted claims and wages of the laborers upon our public buildings, works, and fortifications, have been postponed until the first of April next. Now, sir, I deny all of this, and pronounce every word of it destitute of foundation; and I assert, that the Government has met every claim which it was bound to pay, or had the right to pay. The gentleman referred us to Indian treaties and other claims which have been admitted and acknowledged as due, but he forgot to tell us that those are funded debts; and the Treasury can make no payments, except as authorized by law, but what have been made, and are now authorized to be made, without new legislation upon those claims. But let us look to the postponements which the gentleman presented as evidence of the violation of good faith on the part of the Government. I have often, heretofore, made an "April fool" of myself by examining into charges made here against the Administration. I have also examined this charge, and find myself more fooled than ever.

After the gentleman told us of fifty instances of postponed claims which he had heard of, (and all of which he believed,) he presented one, the evidence of which, he informed us, was on a piece of paper which he held in his hand, but refused to give us the name of the individual who vouched for its truth. That claim is represented to be nineteen dollars. He further stated that claims for labor done on the public buildings in this place were postponed, and a reduction ordered of the amount first stipulated to be paid. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] rose and added a fact of the same kind to the list of postponements. He said that he had seen circulars issued by authority, informing those who had labored and were laboring on Old Point, that there would be a reduction on the amount stipulated to be paid, and a postponement of payment until the first of next April, and that he had used and exposed that circular in the recent canvass. Now, sir, charges of this character constituted no small part of the gentleman's two days' speech, [Mr. BARNARD.] Well, what does this amount to? I addressed the following communication to the Secretary of the Treasury:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

January 23 1841.

SIR: In a part of your annual report, you say that the Treasury has promptly met every demand made upon it during the last year, or until the date of your report. This has been contradicted by several of the Opposition members. It is asserted here, and made a matter of complaint, and no small abuse, that payments for labor done on the public buildings in this place have been postponed until the first of April next; and that the amount of stipulated wages would be reduced. If such is the fact, will you have the goodness to inform me, and give me the reasons for such postponement and reduction.

Yours, with respect,

A. DUNCAN.

To the Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Here is his answer:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 23, 1841.

SIR: In reply to your inquiries of this date, whether payments for labor on the public buildings in this city have been postponed until the 1st of April next, or the amount of wages proposed to be reduced, and, if so, the reasons therefore, I have the honor to submit the following statement:

All the labor on these buildings, carried on under the immediate charge of the Commissioners, has been paid for as soon as done, so far as my knowledge extends. So has that performed by contractors, it is presumed; as all the requisitions for money to pay them have been promptly met.

But, in a case of necessity, since the appropriation was exhausted, and during the present month, I understand that the Committee on Public Buildings of the House of Representatives have, on application of the workmen, advised the Superintendent of the Public Buildings to permit some of the laborers to work on some of the stone till the new appropriation pass; and I presume that he has acquiesced in the advice. The Board of Commissioners, however, has not interfered in this case; nor has this Department, nor has either of them, proposed any reduction in wages.

Respectfully,

LEVI WOODBURY.

Hon. ALEXANDER DUNCAN.

P. S. To obviate any mistake, I would add, that there is a claim by some workmen for lost time, under a resolution to indemnify them, passed by Congress at the last session: but this is not for work done, but rather for inability to obtain work; and as no appropriation has yet been made to pay the claim, of course it has not been and cannot be paid till Congress think proper to make one.

L. W.

I addressed a similar communication to the Secretary of War, in relation to the suspensions of payment for labor done at Old Point, and here is his answer.

WAR OFFICE, January 23, 1841.

SIR: You are aware, that at the last session of Congress the military appropriation bill contained a provision, authorizing the President to suspend the expenditure of certain amounts therein appropriated, if, in his opinion, the condition of the Treasury required it. After the adjournment, the Secretary of the Treasury signified that he should avail himself of the authority vested in him by this clause, and suspend these expenditures. This was accordingly done; but upon an assurance from Mr. Woodbury, that the Treasury would be in a more flourishing condition at the end of the year 1840, or at farthest by April, 1841, I authorized the officers charged with those works, which, from their nature, would have been seriously injured by entire suspension, to carry them on on a reduced scale, provided the contractors and workmen would consent, without any additional charge upon the Government, to wait for payment until the first of January, or the first of April. No reduction is to be made upon the amount stipulated to be paid. The President removed the order suspending these payments and prohibiting the continuance of the works late in October last: but the season was too far advanced to renew them advantageously—and it would still have been inconvenient to the Treasury to anticipate the payments promised for the 1st January. Upon the passage of the Treasury bill now under consideration, these payments and others for arrears due for militia and subsistence in Florida will be made. I have no doubt the Secretary of the Treasury would have been able to meet all these demands, if the receipts had been simultaneous with them; but there are portions of the year when the disbursements are necessarily large and the receipts small. The Treasury, to be free from embarrassment, must always have five millions surplus to go and come upon.

Very truly yours,

J. R. POINSETT.

Hon. ALEXANDER DUNCAN.

So it will be found in all cases where payments have been suspended. The appropriations run out, and the workmen are permitted to go on with the work, upon the condition that they will wait for their pay until Congress shall make an appropriation. It is matter of choice and preference with them. So it is with temporary clerks, who are paid from the contingent fund. The fund runs out, and clerks of this description can receive no pay, until Congress appropriates money. Still the clerks go on to perform their work, upon their own responsibility, and at their own risk. If Congress should make no appropriation, they, as in the case of the laborers on public works, would receive no pay; and this is what constitutes the suspensions of payment which the gentleman alludes to, and out of which he has manufactured such frauds on the side of the Government; and such distress on the part of the poor workmen.

I would not have troubled the committee with this expose, only that I am desirous of showing to the country how little reliance is to be placed on charges made upon the Administration by a party, whose control of the Government is to be perpetuated by the same system of misrepresentation, falsehood, and slander, which has brought them into power.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] indulged in both abuse and sarcasm of the War Department, for what he calls the sedentary militia in Florida. He derided such an organization as worse than worthless. He treated it as the evidence of imbecility on the part of the Executive and the War Department. This is a strange note with what we heard last fall during the election campaign. Then we were told by every Whig speaker, from the political negotiator with the shavers, stockjobbers, Shylocks, and brokers of the London Exchange, (Daniel Webster,) down to the most sniffing Whig whiff of political mimicry, that the Executive was about to overset the liberties of this country by a military despotism. The weak and the silly, from one end of the Union to the other, were thrown into alarm and consternation, weepings and wailings, by the note of military despotism. The President was organizing an army of two hundred thousand men to seize upon the liberties of this people. The wife was to be deprived of her husband—the parent of his son—and the sister of her brother: all were to be pressed into the service of the President, and marched, and whipped, and shot, as the rules of war and the laws of despotism might dictate. But now the President and the War Department are found with what? wielding the sceptre of despotism with an army of two hundred thousand men, with the sword in one hand and the purse in the other (Independent Treasury?) No; he is now found struggling in a complicated war with a savage enemy, to maintain the honor of the nation, and the safety and peace of its citizens, with a sedentary army of five hundred militia, whose pay is six dollars per month, without the power to increase the number or augment the pay; and he derided, abused, and taunted, and his Administration denounced because of imbecility. The abuse which the gentleman drew from this organization of "sedentary militia" induced me to investigate the subject. I opened a correspondence with the Secretary of War, and here are the papers with which I have been furnished. They are the letters between the Secretary of War and Brevet Gen. Read, commander in Florida, which show the whole system of organization, and the motives and objects to be effected by it. I will ask the Clerk to read these papers, beginning at the one marked A and so proceed. [The Clerk read.] I regret, said Mr. D. that the number and length of those letters will prevent me from giving them a place in my printed remarks, which would make comment upon them unnecessary. I will now briefly explain the object and the system.

The organization is called "infantry for neighborhood defence in Florida." In the summer of 1838, Mr. Poinsett recommended such an organization of the settlers who had been driven from their farms by the Indians. I need not inform members here that families who were driven from their farms in Florida were furnished rations by a law of Congress. The Secretary of War conceived and adopted the plan of organizing such persons for "fireside" defence. The object was double, and the result has been double. The object was to form a military defence, and the improvement of the country. The result has been, that this organization (about five hundred in number) has superseded the same number of mounted men, which would have been required, in addition to the regular force in Florida; and it has been found, by actual calculation, that this organization has cost but one-sixth of the same number of mounted men. Another result has been, that the Government has been saved from vast expense, which it would have incurred by the transportation of grain and forage for the support of troops and horses, which, to a great extent, has been supplied by the cultivation which this system has encouraged and secured.

The duties and privileges which this organization imposes and secures are: for a part of those embraced in it to cultivate their farms, while a part are patrolling and scouting from post to post; they are changed at the end of given intervals. It is a rule of this organization, that no person is to be ordered more than twenty miles from his farm: and this is what gentlemen deride and condemn, as making the whole system weak and ridiculous; but without such a rule, the whole system would fail, or rather it never have been established, and one of the leading objects (viz: the cultivation of the farms) would be defeated—for the militia could not cultivate their farms, if they were ordered a greater distance than twenty miles from them, at frequent intervals.

It is supposed that this organization has been as beneficial in point of military defence, as the same number of mounted men would have been for the same time. It is reasonable to suppose so, for a higher interest stimulates them. They defend their farms and their firesides, as well as their country. So much for the President's sedentary militia, so much the subject of Whig derision.

Prior to the overthrow of this Administration, and to effect that purpose, this land was filled with howlings and lamentations about its extravagance and profligacy. Extravagant appropriations for harbors, fortifications, national defences, public buildings, canals, roads, and every species of improvements, were paraded to expose the extravagance of the Administration. But how has the note changed! We have heard Whig gentlemen, for the last week, exhaust their mental and physical powers in denouncing the Administration for (in their own language) its niggardliness and penuriousness. It is charged with having driven out insufficient appropriations, and the dilapidated and decaying condition of the public works and fortifications is now paraded to expose the penurious, and miserable, selfish, and narrow policy of this Administration, "to save its popularity, and secure its re-election." How will such notes meet the ear of the public, whose heads are yet ringing with the peals of extravagance, ruin and profligacy? Gentlemen may reconcile these conflicting charges with a community whom they have so basely abused and misled. It is no duty of mine.

But while on the charges of extravagance before the election, and of penuriousness since the election, I ask to present some figures and facts which I extract from official reports, which are as true in politics and finance as the book of worship is in divinity.

I read from the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, Executive documents, 1st session 25th Congress; vol. 2d for 1839–40, Doc. No. 17, page 9, and Doc. No. 3 for this session, page 2.

These documents show that the expenditures for the year 1835 were $17,573,141 56

1836 "	30,868,164 04
1837 "	37,265,037 15
1838 "	39,455,438 34

These aggregates include all the heavy expenditures of the Indian wars, Indian treaties, Indian removals, interest and principle, paid on funded debts, redemption of Treasury notes, and border difficulties that occurred since 1835, in the years to which the amount is annexed. So do the expenditures of 1839. Here is a table showing more particularly the expenses of that year, as reported in Doc. No. 3, 2d session 26th Congress, page 21:

EXPENDITURES FOR 1839.
Civil, miscellaneous, and foreign interest	$4,918,187 58
course	-
Military	14,256,860 34
Naval	6,225,002 75
	$25,410,050 67
Public debt, including interest on Holland debt	93,251 17
Treasury notes redeemed, including interest	11,101,111 02
Trust funds	1,010,523 29

It is seen by this table that the whole expenditures for 1839 were $37,614,936 15, including the redemption of Treasury notes and the trust funds; but deduct these, which is proper to be done, for they were debts of another year—I say deduct them, and the expenditures of 1839, will be but $25,410,050 67. Now, let us look to the aggregate expenditures of 1840. The expenditures were, in the entire year, $22,489,349 51; and such has been the policy of the Administration, and such its retrenchments, that $19,000,000 will cover the expenses for the present year, (1841); so says the Secretary of the Treasury, and such are the estimates from data furnished by all the Departments. I have presented these figures and facts for the benefit of those who may read me. I desire that the people may have these facts, to put in contrast with the charges of extravagance with which the Administration was denounced through every Bank-bought corrupted organ in the land, and every Federal demagogue that could conceive a falsehood, or express the conceptions of another. It will be seen that the Administration has succeeded in reducing the expenditures of the Government from $39,000,000 per annum to $19,000,000; and, still strange to say, one of the reasons of its overthrow was the charge of extravagance and profligacy. It is difficult to say which is most criminal, the foul spirit that propagated such slanders, or the wilful stupidity that makes them available.

But, sir, in order to benight the public mind, and to pave the way for every species of profligacy that the coming Administration may be guilty of, it is boldly asserted on this floor that this Government is now indebted to the amount of $30,000,000, and that a loan ought forthwith to be contracted, and the debt settled. Why, Mr. Speaker, what is not the man prepared to say who will make such an assertion? But as no evidence or statistics has been or can be produced to sustain the assertion, I shall satisfy myself with meeting it with a direct and unqualified denial, and shall class it with the numerous falsehoods and slanders, which, as I before said, have been but too successful.

There may be some unexpended appropriation at the expiration of this Administration. There always has been, and always will be at the expiration of every administration. Those may be called floating unexpended appropriations. They pass from year to year, as well as from administration to administration.

There were demands of this character to the amount of ten or twelve millions fell upon this Administration, when it came into power. There will not, perhaps, be one-fourth of that amount transferred to the coming administration. I know of none at this moment. I do not now speak of Indian annuities, Indian treaties, and the Holland claim on this District, assumed by the General Government; they are funded debts, and no administration can pay them off, without farther legislation. The Government never was clearer of debt and embarrassment than it is at this moment. It never was in a situation since its first organization, to manage and conduct its functions with more ease and less expense in proportion to its magnitude, than it is at this time. The country is fast overcoming the embarrassment and calamities brought upon it by the frauds and mismanagement of the banking institutions—trade and commerce are reviving—our commercial debt, which grew out of overtrading and overbanking is paid, and we have a fair promise of a bountiful harvest of revenue from imposts and land sales. The Florida war may be said to be at an end. The Indians, we are told, are daily coming in and surrendering themselves, their arms, and their wives and children. Our border difficulties, it is believed, will be settled without further difficulty. The Federal party come into power in peace and plenty, out of debt, and with the comfortable sum of about five millions in advance, which this bill will furnish, to commence operations. What a contrast! How did Mr. Van Buren find the Government and the country when he came into office? The Florida war raging, one of the most complicated, expensive, and difficult wars that this Government has encountered, owing to the nature of the enemy, the character of the climate which was its seat, and the advantages the face of the country gave the enemy—border difficulties of the most complex character—the surplus revenue squandered, or what was the same, deposited with the States (better far that it had been thrown into the Potomac)—nine hundred banks, with three-fourths of all the newspapers, united to paralyze all his movements and overthrow his administration. Add to these the bank suspensions, which left him without a dollar in the Treasury, and the suspension of commerce, which stopped up the channels of revenue—and all this in two months after his inauguration. All this before he had time to perform the first official act. But more of this hereafter.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] told us that this Administration had issued $25,000,000 of Treasury notes from its beginning to this time; and that it would now owe every dollar of that amount if it (the Administration) had not seized upon the Government property and made forced sales, at great sacrifices, for their redemption. I asked the gentleman, at the time, to inform us what property the Government had seized on, what it had sold that was not its right and its duty to sell. The gentleman promised us the information, but that was all; he did not give it; and, what is worse, he cannot. I meet that charge with a direct denial. It is groundless in all its parts, and I defy him, or any other man, to sustain it.

It is somewhat amusing to hear and see the exultation manifested and expressed by the Federal party at the overthrow of the Democracy. "The expiring Administration!" "The successful party!" "The defunct party!" "The prostrated Administration!" "The party coming into power;" and such expressions of unbridled exultation is the beginning, the middle, and the ending, of every Whig speech we hear. Well, poor fellows, I do not blame them. They have been in political exile for forty years. A gentleman tells me that they owned the Government four years within that time. True; but that was no Administration, within the meaning of our Constitution or our political language: it was an interregnum of that time: it was a Federal interregnum of the Government, in violation of the spirit of the Constitution, and in open defiance of the will of the people and the majesty of our political institutions. No man can call that an Administration, without violence and political profanity. Yes, sir, the Federal party have been in banishment for forty years. For forty years they have been rowing up "Salt river"—bareheaded and barebacked—on half rations, and now that they are restored to the Federal days of '98, they have a right to exult. I would do so if I were in their place. The more than a hundred thousand lean, long, lank, hungry, and wolfish office seekers who are now thronging, and who are to throng this city, to seize the "spoils of victory," bearing in their features and aspect evidence of worse than Siberian poverty, speaks poorly for the country they have left. If the inhabitants from "the head waters of Salt river" are fairly represented by those who are now flocking here for the spoils, I would judge it to be either a poor country, or the inhabitants to live by the ragged promises of banks without capital, or subjects to swindle. If I were capable of advising my friends, my advice would be to keep clear of the Salt river country. I would advise them to give the Federalists another "shake." The result of this election is but a triumph over men; it is no triumph over principle. There was no issue of principle made in the contest. It will be no violation of the fundamental principle, which every Democrat holds sacred, viz: "that the voice of the people is the supreme law of the land," to disregard the result of this election only as a triumph of men. Every Democrat is at liberty to stand to his principles and the measures which have characterized his party. It is an anomaly in politics and in government, that an administration should be overthrown upon no principle.

It is equally strange that an Administration should come into power upon no principle; but such is the fact. I have said that it was an anomaly; not quite, there have been some such instances. When and while the Jews were enjoying the daily manifestations of the living God, under the administration of Moses, they deserted the one, and surrendered the other, and betook themselves to idolatry; anon made a golden calf, and they did it divine honors; not that they were to receive higher benefits, but they wanted a change. That word change has ever been a potent word. It was the word change in the mouth of Hannu and his demagogical adherents, that overthrew Hannibal, and, with him, sank the Republic of Carthage. It was the word change, in connection with the golden bribes of Persia, that subverted the Grecian liberties and the Grecian Republics. That word change, and Persian gold, did what the arms of Persia was unable to do. So, too, the word change, and British gold, may do what the arms of England could not do. They may subvert the liberties of this people, and overthrow this Republic. That word change, and the British moneyed influence, have accomplished one step: they have made one successful effort. They have overthrown as pure and upright an Administration as ever administered this Government. They have defeated the re-election of a President, and as sound, as pure, and as talented a patriot as ever filled the Executive of this Government or any other—one who has administered the Government upon the same Democratic principles, and in support of the same measures, by which this, in the short space of half a century, has grown to be a mighty Republic—and one, too, who was elected by an overwhelming majority of the American freemen to carry out the very measures which have characterized and marked every official act of his. His Administration has been honest, faithful, able, economical and patriotic, and his avowal of principle, as well as the party who sustained him, open, fearless, and candid—avowing at all times and in all places the principles and measures which should guide and govern him and them. And how was this honest expose met? Why, the Federal candidate positively refused to present any "expression of principle for the public eye," or to give any pledge to support or repudiate any measure, and even denied the right and the propriety to ask him for a pledge. Here is an extract from a speech delivered at Fort Meigs, as reported in a paper friendly to his election. In that speech he says:

"I will now, fellow-citizens, give you my reasons for having refused to give pledges and opinions more freely than I have done since my nomination to the Presidency. Many of the statements published upon this subject are by no means correct. But it is true that it is my opinion that no pledge should be given by an individual while in nomination for any office in the gift of the people."

I could present numerous instances in which General Harrison was called upon through the most respectable mediums, and from the most patriotic motives, to give his views on the great leading measures which interested the country, in every instance of which he declined giving answers "for the public eye." I am too fast. General Harrison did give one pledge. He stated, I believe, at various times, in many places, and in the presence of assembled multitudes, that he believed a National Bank unconstitutional. He believed that Congress has not the constitutional power to establish a National Bank. He has also pledged himself, in the midst of assembled thousands, to veto no bill that Congress may pass. He is now the President elect of this Republic. On the 4th of March next, at the threshold of his official duties, he will mount the eastern portico of this Capitol, and with lips pressed to the Holy Evangelists, or with uplifted hand before assembled thousands, to whom he is responsible here, and in the presence of Almighty God and his Eternal Throne, to whom he is responsible, and before which he is answerable hereafter, he will swear to support the Constitution of the United States. Now, suppose Congress should pass, during his administration, a bill to incorporate a National Bank, and, to become a law, it shall require his approval and signature, what will be the condition of that poor old man? He stands pledged to approve and sign a bill which he has said is in violation of the Constitution which he has sworn to maintain? I say, what will be his situation in a moral and conscientious view, to say nothing of the political obligations he is under to maintain the Constitution in the exercise of the veto power, which is a part of the obligations of the Executive, and was intended by the framers of the Constitution to preserve it from the innovations and violations which General Harrison says, himself, would be made upon it by the establishment of a National Bank?

I know of no Whig candidate whose election in the late canvass turned on principles. In a Republican Government, it is a fundamental right of the people to demand of the candidate who is asking suffrage at their hands, what are his principles, and upon what terms he will administer the office which he seeks; and it is a political duty, on the part of a candidate, to answer, and to answer sincerely. That right and that duty were both violated in the late elections.

How, I ask again, were the fearless and honest expose of principles, on the part of the Democracy, met? Way, sir, by drunken orgies, that would have disgraced a bacchanalian feast—by empty unmeaning pageants—ridiculous displays of log cabins, beset in coon skins, fox tails, old gards, empty barrels, shot pouches, and snapping turtles; and by other displays unworthy of the age, disgraceful to any people, and an insult to every understanding of morality and decency. Or, in the language of my poet:

And what are the principles 'bout which you prate?
I answer, log cabins and pickerei bait;
Hard cider, old muskets, and racoons, and rags,
Black wool and broad seals, and tow saddle-bags,
Corn dodgers and skunk skins, with pitch forks and poles,
Old hats that were made but to stop up the holes;
Pack saddles and gourds, empty hoppers and lye,
And catfish and gingerbread made in a pie:
Pothooks and kettles, with scythes and wash tub,
Old sickles and cornstalks, and axes to grub,
Oh! who could have dreamt that a nation so wise,
Would have stopped up their ears and plucked out their eyes;
Would have swallowed such falsehood, so plain and so foul,
That would disgust and sicken a toad eating owl?

It is disgraceful to the American intelligence to say that the elections were carried by such displays, in the entire absence of avowed principles. We must look for some other influence, by which the whole power and force of the American Democracy have been overthrown. There was a combination of circumstances and factions brought together, and made to bear on the Administration, which never has been before and it is hoped never will be again. First of the factions. Those factions were bound together by no principle or tie, save their hostility to the Democratic party, and to Democratic principles. The Abolitionist and the slave holder, the bank man and the anti-bank man—the high tariffite, and the anti-tariffite—the distributionist, and the anti-distributionist—the assumptionist, and the anti-assumptionist, though all antipodes to each other, were united against the Democracy, all rallied under their different banners to the standard of Federalism. Change! change! was their watchword. The cry and the echo of change never was permitted to die on the ear, midst all the conflict and din of battle—not a change of measures nor of principle, but a change of men. As my poet says:

"The Federalists came and they wanted 'change,'
Oh! 'change,' the Abolitionists caught it.
That Tariffites wanted it isn't strange,
But change for the Ancis, who would have thought it?
They wanted change, and change they have got,
But a change for the better? 'I reckon not."

Second, of the circumstances. But to explain them would require more time than the limits of a speech will permit. It would require not only a financial and commercial history of our own country, but a history of our relations with other countries. It is sufficient to say, that under the high tariff banking and credit system, a rage for speculation was engendered, which was only equalled by the fatal embarrassments in which it involved the people, the States, and the General Government. The people became involved in a large commercial debt. The States became involved for loans obtained for internal improvements, to near two hundred millions of dollars to foreign capitalists. The country was overspread with upwards of nine hundred incorporated banking institutions, a large portion of whose capital was and is owned by capitalists in London, Paris and Amsterdam.

Before I take my seat, I will explain the process by which all our pecuniary and commercial embarrassments were brought upon us by that extended credit, banking and internal improvement system; but it is at this moment my object to expose the circumstances and influences which were brought to bear upon the recent elections. It is well known that this Administration and the Democratic party were, and are now, opposed to the contracting of further foreign loans, and to the privileges which the present system of banking bestows upon those institutions and their stockholders. It is well known that State stocks in the European markets have been gradually falling since the revolution and bank commercial suspensions in 1837, until they are not worth more than sixty or sixty-five cents on the dollar. It is also well known that one of the means by which those stocks would be raised to par value, would be by getting the General Government to assume the State debts. It is well known, too, that this Administration was opposed to that policy. The restrictions and securities which the Administration and its supporters were imposing upon the banks, dismayed bank stockholders, both at home and abroad. They saw in the re-election of Mr. Van Buren and his supporters the overthrow of their swindling system, and the downfall of their corrupt institutions.

It was to avoid a catastrophe so fatal to the gambling and stockjobbing interests, that united the bankers and stockholders of both Europe and this country against the re-election of the present Administration, and rallied all the power and influence which a control of two hundred millions of State debts, twice that amount of bank capital, and perhaps four times that amount of bank loans, gave them over the people. The idea that British capital, British gold, and British influence, controlled the recent elections, is scouted by the Federal party here, and denounced as a slander upon the freemen of this country. Sir, it is honorable to suppose the American people incapable of bribery or being bribed. It is not charged that they were bribed directly, nor was it necessary that they should be. There were easier and cheaper methods of bringing British influence and British capital to operate upon the people and the elections. That such influences were brought to bear, no one having a regard for truth, and acquainted with the facts, will deny. I hold in my hand the evidence—evidence conclusive—evidence which carries conviction with it.

It is well known that Daniel Webster went to England. It has been publicly and privately reported, and I believe never contradicted, that he went upon means to the amount of near or about sixty thousand dollars, furnished by the traders, bankers, merchants, and stockjobbers of the Eastern cities. What he went for, none but those in the secret know; but, to use a Yankee phrase, we can guess. It was to restore confidence in the ability and faith of the States to redeem their bonds—to the end that more loans might be obtained, and to assure the stockholders that the States were constitutionally and legally bound to liquidate their bonds. A kind of notion was prevailing that the States had no power to issue bills of credit, and that the State bonds were bills of credit, and therefore unconstitutional and illegal, and that subsequent State Legislatures might so consider them, and might refuse to provide for their payment. While fagging with the stockjobbers and bankers of London exchange, I do not know what promises he made them, that if Mr. Van Buren's Administration could be overthrown, the General Government would assume the payment of the States bonds, and a national bank be established, but I do know when he came home, "change," "change," was the word. I know, too, that no election by the Federal party ever was conducted with so much expense or money and sacrifice of time, though the piteous howls of panic, ruin, and distress, were made to time with "change, change, change." I do not know from whence the means were drawn that supported all the fool Federal fandanges that disgraced this country, our Republican institutions, and the elective franchise. I do not know whether they were furnished by British banks in this country or British banks in England. I do not know whether they were furnished by British American, or American British stockjobbers and gamblers. I know the means were furnished from some source other than private and individual donations; and now for the evidence. I will not read all I have. I have not time to read all the correspondence which shows the London Exchange interest felt, and interference exercised in the American elections last fall and summer. Here is a part. It is a resolution adopted at a meeting of the stockjobbers in London:

"To send to the Legislatures of the States, agents who should press the said Legislatures to appropriate funds to reduce the amount of their scrip, and establish sinking funds to secure the remainder."

So we have had British bank and stockjobbing agents to superintend our Legislatures, and in order that the Legislatures should be of the proper cast, such as would be more likely to carry out the views of the stockjobbing herd, it is fair to presume that these agents were wire workers in the elections. What American will not feel humbled when he reflects that our legislative halls are beset with British agents, demanding legislation in behalf of foreign interests. This is the influence which sprung the question of Federal assumption of State debts, and it seems, while the people of the United States, or all except the Federal fugle masters, were kept in perfect ignorance of General Harrison's views of the great questions of public interest, the stockjobbers and owners understood him well.

Here is an extract from a London paper.

"The London Morning Post, of June 3d, in speaking of a report of Mr. Kendall and several other members of the American Cabinet had resigned, says:

"By the election of General Harrison, the Whig candidate, and the rejection of Mr. Van Buren, the return of the Government to a sound and rational system of banking will follow as a matter of course; and possibly the United States Bank may once more find itself under the protection of a proper charter. The rejection of Mr. Van Buren will be decisive of the fate of the Sub Treasury scheme. That insane piece of legislation will be most assuredly knocked on the head, and we shall no longer hear of pet banks, and the thousand other absurdities with which it is associated.

"We rejoice in the downfall of the VISIONARY UNDERTAKINGS OF THE RADICAL SPIRITS AND POLITICAL ECONOMICAL COXCOMBS, WHETHER THEY BE OF THE OLD WORLD OR THE NEW, and may, accordingly, congratulate the Americans on the prospects they have of getting rid of such quacks as Van Buren, 'Van' Jackson, and Mr. Amos Kendall.

"Whether the resignation takes place or not, there seems to be no doubt that THE WHOLE CREW OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY will, in the month of November at the latest, be relieved from the cares of office."

Here is more of the same. Both these extracts are from high-toned, full-blooded, red-mouthed, English Tory papers:

The Liverpool Standard of September 4th, encourages the owners of American stocks in England with the following words:

"There can be very little doubt that, in spite of Government influence, General Harrison will be elected President."

From the Liverpool Standard, September 4, 1840.

"At present, Great Britain exercises a POWERFUL INFLUENCE over the social, political, and fiscal affairs of the United States. The dependence of the planters in the South, and the commercial men in the North, upon the British market, necessarily superinduces a desire for peace on their part, while it gives this country a large amount of control over the public decisions of those bodies. The ultra Republicans of the States do not relish this control. They see that it interposes a BARRIER AGAINST THE WORKING OUT OF THEIR DEMOCRATIC PRINCIPLES."

It will be seen by these extracts that the London brokers had the advantage of the American Democracy. They knew precisely by what rule of arithmetic to calculate if General Harrison should succeed in his election. If his election was secured, they could calculate their Bank and State stocks by multiplication; but if Mr. Van Buren should succeed, the rule of subtraction would apply. Such is virtually the language of the following letters. Here they are:

[Per Great Western]

LONDON, June 3, 1840.
Sir: We refer to our last, of May 15, and have now the pleasure of acknowledging the receipt of your esteemed letter of 17th April. The box with the coupons of the bonds in our possession has also reached us within these few days; the contents have not yet been examined, but we have no doubt of these being found correct.

We assure you that we are not unmindful of your anxious wish either to realize your bonds at a satisfactory price, or to receive an advance upon them, but we regret to say this is still out of our power; there are hardly any transactions in American securities, even in the most current stocks; and as to the introduction of any new stock in the market, we should not consider it either advisable or even creditable, nor can we as yet foretell the period when a material improvement may be expected. We should, consequently, in making an advance, lock up our capital for an indefinite period, and for this, we confess, the value of money is too great at present. THE ATTENTION OF OUR CAPITALISTS AND OTHERS ENGAGED IN AMERICAN AFFAIRS IS NOW TURNED TO YOUR INTERNAL POLITICS, AND IF THE PROSPECTS FOR YOUR NEXT PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION HELD OUT BY THE LAST ACCOUNTS SHOULD BE REALIZED, THIS CIRCUMSTANCE WILL CONTRIBUTE MORE THAN ANY OTHER TO RESTORE GENERAL CONFIDENCE. The payments of the dividends on Pennsylvania stock has produced a good effect, but even now the stock (which a few years ago was preferred to all others, and sold as high as 120 0-0.) can be purchased at from 75 to 78 0-0, which will show you what could be expected for Missouri bonds. Indiana dollar stock has been sold at 66 0-0, Illinois 6 per cent. stock at 74 0-0, but even at these rates no large sales should be effected.

We remain, respectfully, sir,

Your obedient servants,

FRED. HUTH & CO.

JOHN SMITH, esq.

President of the Bank of the State of Missouri, St. Louis.

This was the first letter; here is the second. It promises some consolation to the State of Missouri should the Democratic Administration be overthrown. The stockjobbers were harking up the wrong tree when they wrote these letters. They supposed they were talking to those who were willing to sell their birthright for a mess of porridge; those who were willing to barter off their principles and their institutions for the ass's load of gold. But here is the second letter:

(Per Great Western.)

LONDON, September 11, 1840.

DEAR SIR: We have duly received your favors of July 9, from St. Louis, and July 29, from New York, and must regret we still continue unable to meet your wishes as regards a sale of your bonds, or a loan on the security of them. The war with which we are threatened by France again diverts the attention of our capitalists from permanent investments, and all American securities appear quite forgotten. Indiana 5 per cent. dollar stock was offered to us at 67½ 0-0; and Missouri, being less known, could not even be sold in less proportion. IF, HOWEVER, YOUR ELECTIONS FOR THE PRESIDENCY SHOULD HAVE THE RESULT NOW ANTICIPATED, IT IS VERY PROBABLE THAT AN IMPULSE WOULD BE GIVEN TO ALL STATE STOCKS, AND THE MOMENT MAY THEN ARRIVE WHEN YOUR BONDS CAN BE INTRODUCED UNDER FAVORABLE AUSTIN, though not at the limit you have fixed, whilst Illinois 6 per cent. sterling bonds can be purchased so much lower; the price asked at present for this latter stock is 87 0-0, being nearly 10 0-0 under your limit. AFTER YOU HAVE WAITED SO LONG, WE THINK IT WOULD BE A PITY TO RECALL THE BONDS WITHOUT SEEING WHAT EFFECT A CHANGE IN YOUR EXECUTIVE WILL PRODUCE, IN WHICH POINT WE MAY EXPECT TO FORM A FAIR JUDGMENT ABOUT THE BEGINNING OF NEXT YEAR. If, however, you wish the bonds, or a portion of them, to be returned, please give us your instructions and they will be punctually followed.

We remain respectfully, dear sir,

Your obedient servants,

FREDERICK HUTH & CO.

JOHN SMITH, Esq. President of the Bank of the State of Missouri, St. Louis.

Missouri, by her Legislature, met this insolence in the proper spirit—in the spirit worthy of a free State and of freemen—worthy the imitation of other States and other freemen. Her bonds were recalled, and their arrogance denounced and rebuked. But the election is over—Mr. Van Buren is defeated, and General Harrison is elected. Hear the congratulations! The frantic joy of the money changers and rag barons of this country hardly excelled that of the moneyed aristocracy of England. I read from the London Morning Chronicle, a full-blooded Tory paper:

MONEY MARKET AND CITY NEWS.

WEDNESDAY, December 10.—The election of General Harrison to the Presidential chair of the United States is an event of great importance to the commercial interests of America and Great Britain. A new system of financial policy will be propounded by the cabinet of the United States, and, if successful, the change will be felt throughout Europe. On this country it will act, however, most immediately, and to the greatest extent. We have deep interests at stake, therefore, in asking our transatlantic brethren not to go ahead too fast, nor too far, but to use their success with prudence.

The measures which will form the leading features of discussion, when Congress assembles, are likely to be: 1st. The adjustment of the currency; 2d. The bankruptcy law; 3d. The general land distribution bill; and, 4th. The tariff. The first named of these important questions will lead to lengthened discussion. It is of vital interest to the future prosperity of the Union, and ought not to be decided without full and mature deliberation. A rash or inconsiderate step might not only overturn the new Government, but lead to disastrous convulsions in the money market. The Government, however, are vested by the Constitution of the United States with special powers "to coin money, and regulate the value thereof," so that their powers to establish a uniform national currency cannot be successfully disputed. Mr. Webster was the leading expounder of the views of the new administration party on this subject; and as he predicted that it would lead to the success of one system of Government, and to the overthrow of another, it is from his views that we are to look for the nature of the measures which will be brought forward. If his opinions be adopted by General Harrison, the new Federal Government will not only propound a basis for a national paper currency, payable in gold and silver, but also for a National Bank. The latter measure would meet with powerful opposition, and we hear that the Whig party are not all of one way of thinking about it. The same may be said regarding the general bankruptcy bill. It would never do to legislate for behoof of the debtor only, as was proposed by the bill of last session. Any measure, to deserve success, should be even-handed, and apply both to debtor and creditor. It is considered likely that Mr. Clay will be successful in carrying a measure for the distribution of the public lands belonging to the general body of the Republic, and at the disposal of Congress. It has been proposed by Mr. Clay that these lands should be sold under the provisions of a special law, and the proceeds divided among the various States on fixed principles, according to their representation in Congress. A bill for that purpose formerly passed the Legislature, but General Jackson did not permit it to become a law, having allowed it to drop without giving his Presidential sanction, but it is understood that General Harrison will readily approve, if it be sent up to him by the Senate. The passing of such a measure would afford the various States powerful aid in completing their schemes of internal improvement. But, then, whatever is given to the revenue of the different States, is withdrawn from the revenue of the Union.

It is supposed that a change of the tariff will be strenuously mooted by the manufacturing States who are desirous for heavier protecting duties, but they will meet with vehement opposition from the exporting interests, and we trust that free principles of trade will still prevail in Congress.

I shall trouble you with no more extracts. If what I have read are not sufficient to establish the fact that British capital and British influence were brought to bear on the recent elections, no amount of evidence would avail.

But permit me to discharge a duty to a large majority of the American people by saying again that they are incapable of being bribed, or turned from the support of our Democratic institutions by any direct attempts of foreign influence or money. It will be asked how has this influence been brought to bear? I answer, by indirect means. Such is the hold that foreign capitalists have upon our credit and monetary institutions, that, by a combination with those with whom they are connected and associated in this country, having an identity of interest, they can say to the banks suspend, and they suspend—expand, and they expand—contract, and they contract—resume, and they resume. All these they can do, and have done. And what is the effect? It is to make money scarce or plenty at their will; to raise or lower the price of produce and labor; to suspend or progress with public works and improvements, as may best advance their interests. The unsuspecting laborer who only seeks to maintain himself by honest economy and industry, does not understand the cause of those expansions and contractions which at one time give him ample compensation, and high hopes for his labor, and at another sink him into poverty and nakedness. He looks around him with astonishment and surprise for the causes of those changes which so effect him and his interests. He is told that it is by the mismanagement of the ruling powers, and he is admonished, as he values his own pecuniary interests, to change the Administration. Now look at the number of banks in this country, the amount of bank capital, the number of bank officers, of bank directors, and bank stockholders, ninety-nine in a hundred of whom are opposed to the Democratic party—look also to the fact that foreign capitalists own a vast portion of all the bank stock in this country, and are, like their associates here, opposed in principle and policy to this Administration, and every thing like democracy. Again, look at the wide-spread influence that the banks and the capitalists can and have exercised on the elections through all the mediums, and the more than ten thousand channels of moneyed agencies that control the value of every thing that is the subject of pecuniary value; and deny, in the spirit of truth if you can, that foreign influence has controlled the elections. I say again, that foreign capital has controlled and is now controlling the elective franchise, the ballot box, and the institutions of this country, not by direct bribery, but by secret moneyed influences, more dangerous to the liberties of this country, and more subversive of our Republican institutions than the artillery and the boy-net of England or all other military powers on earth combined.

I may name another circumstance, which was used to overthrow the Administration; and so far as it was successful, I regret to say it was disgraceful to American intelligence, and dishonorable to American patriotism. I allude to "Mr. Van Buren's standing army of two hundred thousand men!" It will be remembered, and the journals show the fact, that during the short session of the Twenty-fifth Congress, a resolution was passed, requesting the Secretary of War to report to the next Congress a plan of reorganizing the militia. That request was made with reference to our border difficulties, and some other difficulties which might grow out of them. The Secretary of War, in conformity to the duty imposed on him by that resolution, reported a plan of reorganization. It was submitted to Congress, and differed but little from the plan submitted to Congress by General Knox, in General Washington's administration, was passed by Congress, and approved by General Washington, and is now a law, and has been, from that time to this. In whatever Mr. Poinsett's plan differed from the present law, that difference made his plan less exceptionable? Comment on Mr. Poinsett's plan is unnecessary with those who deal in justice and truth. But comment on it with those who deal in falsehood and slander would be worse than idle. It is sufficient to say that the measure never was acted on by Congress. It never was presented to the President officially, nor did he sanction it; but, on the contrary, disapproved some of its provisions, and pronounced others unconstitutional. But still that plan, through the whole canvass, was urged upon the people by the political demagogues and the Bank pensioned presses, as "Mr. Van Buren's standing army;" a thing which had no existence; a thing that was among the things that never were. But it was urged, too, that the object in taking the census and the statistics, was to ascertain the number of men the country could furnish to the constant supply of that army, and the amount of property which could be taxed for its support, when the records show the fact, that the resolution which provided for taking the statistics, was introduced by a Whig member, [RICE GARLAND,] the object of which was to furnish data and useful information as to the worth of the nation, without reference to the subject, or thought, of taxation. I believe every member of the House supported that resolution. And this is briefly the story of Mr. Van Buren's standing army of 200,000 men. I only name the subject to invite those who may have been influenced by that charge upon the Administration, to examine the charge and see how basely they have been imposed upon. But how ungrateful and unkind was it to charge Mr. Van Buren with an intention to overthrow the liberties of the country and establish a military despotism. Of all men, we have the least to fear from him. He has been tried, and he has been found true and faithful. The whole history of his life, civil, political, and official, constitutes the surest guarantee of his attachments to, and his support of, free institutions and Republican principles. But if any thing more were wanted, we have it in the fact that Congress, at the close of the long session, 25th Congress, with a view to defend our Maine boundary, placed at the disposal of the President ten millions of dollars, and authority to raise fifty thousand volunteers. That was putting the sword and the purse truly in the hands of the President. Well, how did he use this tremendous military engine, thus surrendered to him? Did he wield the purse and the sword to the overthrow of our Republican institutions? Did he organize a standing army, or did he establish a military despotism? No; he did neither of them. What did he do? Why, by his diplomacy, and his skill in international laws, he so far succeeded in compromising the border difficulty, as to make military force unnecessary. And when Congress assembled, he handed back the purse and the sword to the people's Representatives, with his hands as unpolluted, and the sword as unstained with human blood, as were the hands and sword of General Harrison, when he threw down his commission in the midst of the last war, and admonished Congress, in a manner which should be remembered, never to invest the Executive with such power again.

So much for the circumstances united with the factions which were brought to bear to the overthrow of this Administration. I could name others equally unfounded and unjust, but I have not time.

Before I proceed, permit me to give the gentleman on my right some notice.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] the other day, after mourning for some time, over the distressed condition of our poor country and the wickedness and profligacy of Mr. Van Buren's Administration, suddenly turned his tune and pronounced a eulogy on the gallantry of General Harrison, and consoled himself and his friends, that "the gallant Harrison" would relieve the country. "The gallant Harrison" would secure prosperity to the country. "The gallant Harrison" would do this, and "the gallant Harrison" would do that. I am tired and sick of Tippecanoe songs, and I would like to know what difficulty the country is in that General Harrison's gallantry can relieve it from, and I would also like to know in what his gallantry consists. Does it consist in his having been the commander at the massacre of Tippecanoe, where ten or twelve hundred men, as brave as ever defended a country or faced an enemy, were surprised in the night and one hundred and eighty of their number slaughtered and wounded by four or five hundred Indians, who, after performing the work of death for more than two hours, retired without perhaps the loss of ten of their number? Or does his gallantry consist in his having ordered the really gallant Croghan to burn and abandon Fort Stephenson, but which order was disobeyed, and thereby one of the most brilliant victories gained over the enemy in defence of the fort that characterized the last war? Does his gallantry consist in his having piled up the public stores and provisions on a frontier border, furnished at vast expense, setting fire to them, and retreating by the light? Does his gallantry consist in his having headed the infantry at the battle of the Thames a mile or more in the rear, while Colonel Dick Johnson, with his gallant regiment, was in death grapple with three times their number, from the beginning to the end of the battle? Or does his gallantry consist in his having thrown down his commission in the middle of the war, when all was darkness, doubt, and danger?

Sir, you may dig from the grave the withered carcass of a General, buried for more than a quarter of a century; you wash his face, comb his locks, dress him in long boots, a chapeau, and epaulets, and plume him with feathers, and a black cockade, but you cannot make a military chieftain of him, only as he has made himself so.

Mr. D. was here called to order by several Whigs, and the Chair reminded him that his remarks were irrelevant. Mr. D. said he was aware of that. It was his intention to be out of order, and he was pleased that he had been called to order. He was desirous of knowing whether order in debate was uniform here or not. He had now discovered that order depended more upon the party passions and capricious feelings of members, than upon any established rules of order; for, said Mr. D. during this debate Mr. Van Buren has been called a jackass, and his cabinet and cabinet officers knaves, fools, liars, swindlers, and thieves, but there was no Whig then to call to order; it was all right, all fair, and all in order. Now, sir, you have my apology and my reason for departing from the rules of order, and I wish to be understood, while I have a seat here, I will meet such abuse and such slander and falsehood, in a manner which they merit. But (muttered some Whig member) you have not long to be here. Yes, said Mr. D. I will be here again. On the first Monday of December a year, if not sooner, I will make my entrance at that door. The Democracy of Old Hamilton will send me, or if not me, they will send a better man, who will as fearlessly defend the Democracy and their principles. I was not defeated by voters. I was defeated by "pipe layers." No Democrat, who is the selected candidate of the Democracy of Old Hamilton, can be defeated by honest and legal voting.

Now, sir, I will proceed in order.

But, on motion, the committee rose, and the House adjourned at 4 o'clock.

Tuesday.—The House met, and went into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DUNCAN proceeded: Mr. Chairman, I desire to new blaze the landmarks which do now, and ever have divided the two great parties—I mean the Federal and the Democratic parties, for there are no other names by which they have or by which they should be known—and I will be justified in this by the fact that it is every day's practice for the Federalists of this House to call themselves Jefferson Democrats! Why, sir, they profane the name, and slander the memory of Jefferson. I will prove this by documents which are as true as Holy Writ. In the days, and in the political life of Thomas Jefferson, the measures and principles which divided the two parties were the same that now divide them. The Federalists then were in favor of a great National Bank, and the Democracy were opposed to such an institution. The Federalists were in favor of a national debt, and an unrestrained credit system; the Democracy were opposed to both. The Federalists were in favor of an extravagant system of internal improvements by the General Government, the Democracy were opposed to such a system of policy, as incompatible with the purposes for which the General Government was formed. The Federalists were in favor of assuming and funding the State debts; the Democracy were opposed to such a policy. The Federalists were in favor of a high protective tariff; and the Democracy were opposed to any other tariff than what was necessary to secure the requisite revenue for the support of the Government and for national defence. The two parties, I repeat, stand, on all these measures, now, precisely as they then did; and, although the Federal party came into power on no avowed principles, and pledged to the support of no measure, they had not assembled here three days until they showed the cloven Federal foot as broad as ever it was seen. All the Federal measures which I have named, and some that I have not, have been boldly advocated on this floor by every Federalist who has spoken this winter.

I now ask your attention while I read some of the opinions of Thomas Jefferson on those measures which I have enumerated—which I say now divide the two parties—and we will see what approximation the modern Whig principles make towards the standard of Jefferson Democracy. And first as to the system and policy of internal improvements by the General Government. While a member of the United States Senate, Mr. Van Buren introduced the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That Congress does not possess the power to make roads or canals within the respective States."

This resolution was introduced in 1825, when the Federal party had the ascendancy in Congress, and in the Executive Department, and when Federalism was making fearful strides towards consolidation, and the establishment of Federal measures and Federal institutions. Mr. Jefferson, in a letter to Mr. C. W. Gooch, says:

MONTICELLO, January 9th, 1826.
DEAR SIR: I have duly received your favor of December 31, and fear with you all the evils which the present lowering aspect of our political horizon so ominously portends. That at some future day, which I hope to be very distant, the free principles of our Government might change with the change of circumstances, was to be expected. But I certainly did not expect that they would not over live the generation which established them, and what I still less expected was, that my favorite Western country was to be made the instrument of change. I had ever fondly cherished the interests of that country, relying on it as a barrier against the degeneracy of public opinion from our original and free principles. But the bait of local interests artfully prepared for their palates, has decoyed them from their kindred attachments to alliances alien to them. Yet, although I have little hope that the torrent of consolidation can be withstood, I should not be for giving up the ship without efforts to save her. She lived well through the first squall, and may weather the present one. But, dear sir, I am not the champion called for by the present dangers. I will, however, say one word on the subject. The South Carolina resolutions and Mr. Van Buren's motion show that other States are coming forward on the subject, and better for any to take the lead than Virginia. We shall see what our co States propose, and before the close of the session we may shape our own course more understandingly.
THOS. JEFFERSON.

In this communication, Mr. Jefferson writes expressly with reference to the Federal schemes of internal improvement by the Federal Government, as well as the unconstitutionality of providing the means for such purposes. He deprecates the delusive baits held out to the States, and denounces the whole as a departure from Republican principles, and the purposes for which the Federal Government was established.

In relation to a National Bank and an Independent Treasury, he says in a letter to Albert Gallatin—(Jefferson's works, vol. 4, page 12.)

From a passage in the letter of the President, I observe an idea of establishing a branch bank of the United States in New Orleans. This institution is one of the most deadly hostility existing against the principles and form of our Constitution. The nation is at this time so strong and united in its sentiments, that it cannot be taken at this moment. But suppose a series of untoward events should occur, sufficient to bring into doubt the competency of a Republican Government to meet a crisis of great danger, or to unhinge the confidence of the people in the public functionaries, an institution like this, penetrating by its branches every part of the Union, acting by command, and in phalanx, may, in a critical moment, upset the Government. I deem no Government safe which is under the vassalage of any self-constituted authorities, or any other authority than that of the nation, or its regular functionaries. What an obstruction could not this bank with all its branch banks be in time of war? It might dictate to us the peace we should accept, or withdraw its aids. Ought we then to give further growth to an institution so powerful, so hostile? That it is so hostile we know, first from a knowledge of the principles of the persons composing the body of directors in every bank, principal or branch, and those of most of the stockholders; second, from their opposition to the measures and principles of the Government, and to the election of those friendly to them, and 3d, from the sentiments of the newspapers they support. Now, while we are strong, it is the greatest duty we owe to the safety of our Constitution to bring this powerful enemy to a perfect subordination under its authorities; the first measure would be to reduce them to an equal footing only with other banks as to the favors of the Government. But in order to be able to meet a general combination of the banks against us in a critical emergency, could we not make a beginning towards an independent use of our own money—towards holding our own bank in all the depositories where it is received, and letting the treasurer give his draft or note for payment at any particular place, which, in a well conducted Government, ought to have as much credit as any private draft, or bank note, or bill, and would give us the same facilities which we derive from the banks? I pray you to turn this subject in your mind, and give it the benefit of your knowledge of details; whereas I have only very general views on the subject.

Washington, December 13, 1803.

In this communication Mr. Jefferson speaks in the language of prophecy. He anticipated the difficulties which we have witnessed, and are now witnessing, not only in relation to banks, but of corporations in general. And his objections did not more exist upon the grounds of policy, than upon the unconstitutionality of all corporations, but more especially that of a National Bank. I have not time to refer to all his arguments against a National Bank; nor is it necessary. I will, however, ask the Clerk to read one more passage, which is found in his Annals of Jefferson's Works, vol. 4, pages 523-7. The Clerk read.

I regret that the length of this expose will prevent me from making it a part of my printed remarks, I hope it will be sufficient to say that it is his cabinet opinion against the constitutionality of a National Bank. His arguments are conclusive and irresistible. I wish every man in this Union could be furnished with a copy of this opinion; he would cease to be a bank man, or wilfully violate the Constitution.

Mr. Jefferson was opposed to a national debt, paper currency, stockjobbing interests, and assumption of States. He looked upon them all as corrupting in their tendencies, and destructive in their effects, both in a private and political sense.

I hold in my hand the "Life of Jefferson." Vol. 1, page 388-9, in a conversation with General Washington, he says, among other things:

"That the two great complaints were, that the national debt was unnecessarily increased, and that it furnished the means of corrupting both branches of the Legislature, as it was notorious to all that there was a considerable squadron in both branches whose votes were devoted to the paper and stockjobbing interests: that on examining their votes they would be found in favor of every Treasury measure; and as most of those measures had been carried by small majorities, they had been carried by those very votes; that, therefore, it was just cause of uneasiness when we thus saw members legislating for their own interests in opposition to those of the people."

On page 355, speaking of the effect of the rise of bank and other stocks, produced by the operations of the United States Bank and its paper issues, he says:

"This sudden influx of good fortune was attended with its usual abuse; a disposition to exchange the regular pursuits of industry for adventurous traffic and whatever business held out the temptations of a lottery."

Mr. Jefferson tells Mr. Gouverneur Morris, (same page.)

"Our public credit is good, but the abundance of paper has produced a spirit of gambling in the funds, which has laid out our ships at the wharves, as too slow instruments of profit, and has even disarmed the hand of the tailor of his needle and thimble. They say the evil will cure itself. I wish it may; but I have rarely seen a gamester cured, even by the disasters of his vocation."

"The effect of the speculations in the funds on the habits and character of the people, especially in the cities and towns, was greater than can well be imagined by one who was not an eye witness."

One more extract, by way of illustrating the Federal party in 1796, 7, 8, which I think will supersede any description of them at this time, except by comparison. If names are the representatives of things, the terms "Whig" and "Jefferson Democrats" are out of joint and out of time and place, when applied to the party opposed to the Democracy. This is a letter which I find in the first volume of Mr. Jefferson's life, page 518, addressed to Mr. Mazec.

"The aspect of our politics has wonderfully changed since you left us, April 24, 1796. In place of that love of liberty and republican government which carried us triumphantly through the war, an Anglican-monarchical-aristocratic party has sprung up, whose avowed object it is to draw over us the substance, as they have already done the forms of the British Government. The main body of our citizens, however, remain true to their Republican principles. The whole landed interest is Republican, and so is the great mass of talents. Against us are the Executive, the Judiciary, and two out of three branches of the Legislature; all the officers of the Government, all who want to be officers, all timid men who prefer the calm of despotism to the boisterous sea of liberty, British merchants, and Americans trading on British capital, speculators, and holders in the banks and public funds. A contrivance invented for the purposes of corruption, and for assimilating us in all things to the rotten, as well as the sound parts of the British model. It would give you a fever were I to name to you the apostates who have gone over to these heresies, men who were Sampsons in the field, and Solomons in the council, but who have had their heads shorn by the barlot England. In short, we are likely to preserve the liberty we have obtained, only by unremitting labors and peril. But we shall preserve it, and our mass of wealth and wealth on the good side is so great as to leave no danger that force will ever be attempted against us. We have only to wake up and snap the Lilliputian cords with which they have been entangling us during the first sleep which succeeded our labors."

How, Mr. Chairman, do the modern Whig principles measure with the standards of Jefferson Democracy which I have been reading. The blush of shame should mantle the face of him who would call himself a Jeffersonian Democrat, when at the same time he tramples under foot the principles and admonitions of that father of Democracy and patriot of the Revolution. Did Thomas Jefferson now live, and could he describe the Federal party of this day with living lips, their principles and their favorite measures, he would fail to give a better description of them than he has in the extracts which I have read.

It is due to the memory of Alexander Hamilton, the elder Adams, and the other leaders of the Federal party of '98, that their political names should be preserved by those who make their principles their rule of faith. It is due to their memories that those who practise the doctrines of their school, should maintain the name that represents their doctrines. Federalists should be called Federalists. Every thing has a name, and every thing should be called by its name. The modern Whig who calls himself a Jefferson Democrat, defames and slanders the name and memory of Thomas Jefferson, and is guilty of moral depravity and falsehood.

The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] in the commencement of his speech, asserted that this Administration, from its commencement to this time, had declared and kept up a war of extermination against the credit and commerce of this country, and that one blow had succeeded another until the best prospects of the country have been prostrated.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] asserted that the extra session (1837) was called to carry out the Independent Treasury scheme.

Every Federalist who has spoken has asserted that it is the withering effect of the Independent Treasury that has blighted and prostrated the country.

All those charges in their turn; but to answer them it will be necessary to go into the history of banking and the Independent Treasury, so far as the Government is or has been concerned or connected therewith. Be the Independent Treasury good or bad policy, Mr. Van Buren is not its author. His credit consists in recommending its revival by law, not in its invention. That system has its root in the Constitution. The framers of the Constitution are the authors of it, and when gentlemen are denouncing it as a corrupt measure, and its author as an ambitious aspirant after power, they are treading upon sacred ground; it is the memories of the Revolutionary patriots that they are denouncing and slandering.

The patriots of the Revolution were the framers of the Constitution; and the Constitution expressly provides that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except by appropriations made by law. What did the framers mean when they said that no money should be drawn from the Treasury? Did they not mean that there should be a Treasury, and that the public money should be kept in the Treasury; and that it should be drawn out only as authorized by law. What did the framers of the Constitution mean when they provided that nothing should constitute a lawful tender in the payment of a debt but gold or silver? Did they not intend that gold and silver should constitute our national currency; and that the money which should be placed in the National Treasury should be gold and silver? Now, sir, what is the Independent Treasury measure, and what its object? It is that the public money shall be collected in gold and silver and kept in the National Treasury, and paid out for public purposes as appropriations by law may direct. That is the length and breadth, the depth and height of the Independent Treasury. The patriots of the Revolution, and the framers of the Constitution, were (or many of them) the members of Congress in 1789. That Congress passed a law making it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to collect the public revenue in gold or silver, and making it his duty to keep safe the public revenue. They also prescribed the manner and mode by which it should be kept safe until it should be paid out as appropriations by law should direct. So we find the Independent Treasury founded in the Constitution, and practically established by the Congress of 1789, long before Mr. Van Buren had an official existence. When the Bank of the United States was established, in 1792, by a Federal Congress, on the recommendation of Alexander Hamilton, and against the wish and efforts of the entire Democracy in and out of Congress, the public depositories were made in that Bank. That was the first innovation upon the Independent Treasury principle. That was the operation by which a union of Bank and State was effected—and a most unhappy and unfortunate one it was. As Mr. Jefferson says, that union continued until the Bank expired by the limitation of its charter, which was in 1811. Between that time and 1816, I believe, the State banks were used in some instances as depositories of the public revenue. And an unfortunate connection that was, too; for, according to a report of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House, in 1830, the Government lost about thirty-four millions between the years of 1814 and 1817. But in 1816 the late United States Bank was incorporated. By a resolution of Congress, it was made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit the revenue of the Government in that Bank and its branches, and to receive its notes and the notes of its branches in liquidation of the Government revenue; thus giving it the use of all the undrawn balances of the people's money, and a credit to its notes far and wide as the Union, and far and wide as the credit of the American Government. I believe the average amount, at all times on hand, of undrawn balances, from 1816 until 1834, the time when the deposits were removed, was near eight millions of dollars. All this the Bank had the use of for the pitiful bonus of $1,500,000, for the whole time—a sum insufficient as a bonus for the use of the Government credit and revenue for one year. And yet, notwithstanding all these, that Bank came near breaking in less than two years after its establishment. Nothing but the timely interference of the Government saved it from bankruptcy and ruin. It brought more pecuniary ruin and distress on this country and this people than all the calamities which have afflicted us either by our own folly or the visitations of Providence, not even the cholera excepted. I speak of the pecuniary and commercial calamities of 1818, '19, '20, and '21.

But to progress with the Independent Treasury system. In 1834, General Jackson recommended the public depositories to be removed from the Bank of the United States, and branches, and made in the local banks. That was done, not because the local banks were favorite institutions with Gen. Jackson or his supporters, but because the American people had put their veto on the United States Bank. They had said, through the ballot boxes, that it should not be rechartered; but because the commercial and trading community were in the use of the public depositories, and it would have produced embarrassment to suddenly have withdrawn them, Congress, in 1836, passed the deposit act, confirming and approving the order which the President had taken on the depositories. By that act, the Secretary of the Treasury was required to make deposite of the public revenue in the specie paying banks, and to receive the notes of such banks in discharge of the public revenue. Thereby the local banks, which were selected as depositories, enjoyed the same advantages which the United States Bank and branches had; and all the banks were benefited that had the name of paying specie for their notes; for the fact that their notes were received in payment of the revenue, gave them a credit and a circulation coextensive and wide as the Union. What was the result of the deposite connection with the local banks? Precisely what it had been with the Bank of the United States and its branches—overbanking, overtrading, stockjobbing, and universal panic, distress, ruin, and a prostration of commerce and credit. Now be it remembered that Mr. Van Buren was installed into office on the 4th of March, 1837, and on the 10th of May, in that year, the banks suspended payment; just one month and six days after he came into office. Before Mr. Van Buren performed the first official act of a financial or general character, all the calamity which we have heard so frequently and so pathetically recited, was brought upon the country by the action of the banks, without the agency of Mr. Van Buren or his administration, or the time or the power to control the banks. How do these facts measure with the broad charge of the gentleman from South Carolina, viz: that "this Administration, from the first day of its existence to this time, declared, and has kept up, a war of extermination against the credit and commerce of the country." When this Administration came into power, we owed a commercial debt of upwards of sixty millions of dollars. Commerce was suspended, and credit was destroyed. The banks had suspended, and the Treasury was without an available dollar. And what has been the result? Why, under this Administration, our commercial debt has been paid—commerce has revived—credit is fast restoring—and the banks have resumed payment. The gentleman is welcome to all the credit he may gain with the candid, honest and intelligent part of the community by such charges.

What was the condition of the country and the Government when the banks suspended specie payments? A credit system had been introduced by the bank and deposite system, by which almost all who traded, and all who bought and sold, traded, bought, and sold on credit. The Government revenue was in the banks. I ask, then, what was the condition of the country and the Government? The people were all indebted to each other, and hardly a constitutional dollar to pay a debt with. The debtor was at the mercy of his creditor, to be dealt with as his avarice might dictate. The people's pockets were filled with the ragged promises of the banks, and the gold and silver of the country locked up in their vaults. But what was the condition of your Government? When the banks suspended, I say the Government revenue was in their possession. Your Government was without a dollar. Your Federal judiciary was spread over the Union dispensing justice with not a dollar to pay them with. Your army was spread along your frontier defending your country, and not a dollar to sustain it with. Your foreign ministry were representing you in every civilized court known, and not a dollar to pay them with. Your navy was displaying her canvass upon every sea, every bay, and every ocean where you had commerce to defend, and not a dollar to support her with. Not a dollar with which to pay your Executive officers in the various Departments here or elsewhere, commerce at the time suspended, and the channels of revenue stopped. What was to be done? What was left for the Executive to do? Why, just what he did do. He called Congress together, to devise ways and means by which the Government should continue to perform its functions, or, to use a common phrase, "to furnish Treasury oil for the wheels of Government." That meeting of Congress was the extra session. I ask the candid and the honest man how it could have been avoided? And yet the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] boldly asserts here, and to the country, "that the extra session was called to carry out the Independent Treasury scheme." Such an assertion will be rewarded with the contempt and derision of every honest man, when the history of this Administration shall be fairly presented to the country.

The Independent Treasury system was revived by the act of bank suspension, and brought into full force, as authorized by the act of 1789, and as provided for by the Constitution. The deposite act of 1836, under which the Secretary of the Treasury acted, in making the local banks fiscal agents of the Government, required the Secretary to deposite the public revenue in specie-paying banks; but when the banks suspended specie payments, there were no "specie-paying banks" in which he could make depositories. He was therefore driven to the duty of keeping safe the public moneys as the act of 1789 provided (if there was any to keep safe.) The deposit act of 1836 also required the Secretary to collect the revenue in the notes of specie paying banks; but when the banks suspended specie payments there were no "specie paying banks;" the Secretary was therefore compelled to collect the revenue in gold and silver as the act of 1789 required. So we see the whole policy, and all the principles of the Independent Treasury were revived by the act of the banks, which is to collect the Government revenue in the currency provided for by the Constitution, and to keep safe the public moneys, until appropriations by law shall disburse them.

But what truth is there in the assertion made here by every Federalist that speaks: "That it is the withering effect of the Independent Treasury that has prostrated the credit, the energies, and the commerce of the country?" Let the disasters of May, 1837, answer. When the banks were in possession of the public revenue, and were in its daily use, and when possessed of the credit, the vast and unlimited credit of the Federal Government, they could not maintain themselves—they suspended, and thereby brought upon the country all the disasters and calamities of which gentlemen sing so piteously. So far from the Independent Treasury paralyzing the energies of the country, under that system, I repeat, that the country has been relieved from the embarrassments which never would have existed had the Independent Treasury been in force.

But it is now time for me to illustrate the operations by which the union of the Government with the banks produced the pecuniary and commercial embarrassments that have periodically afflicted the people of this country. One of the conditions of that union has been the use of the public money to bank upon, and the credit of the Federal Government to the amount of the revenue given to the paper promises of the banks. The banks discounted upon the public deposits, as did they on general deposits made by individuals, as well as on the capital paid in. That made paper "money plenty!" and its reception in the collection of the revenue gave any quantity of it which was issued credit, without doubt, or limit, and individual credit ran pari passu with the quantity of paper currency. Bank paper and credit were more abundant than the commerce and products of the country required.

The facility with which credit and bank paper was obtained, encouraged a wild rage for speculation among individuals, as well as a wild rage for internal improvements by the States. Speculating in trade, and gambling in State and bank stocks were the orders of the day. A general system of plunder and spoils, extravagance and dissipation, supplanted industry, economy, and sobriety. It was all a system of plunder, and every man, not governed by better motives, put in for a share of it, and dashed headlong like the reckless adventurer, regardless of consequences or "the day of settlement."

Such was the almost universal rush into trade and speculation, stockjobbing, and banking, that in the language of Thomas Jefferson, the tailor was disarmed "of his needle and thimble;" the anvil was deserted, the plane and the hammer dropped from the carpenter's hand, the shuttle ceased to fly, and the "plough was left to rust in the half finished furrow."

The redundancy of paper money raised the price of produce so far above its intrinsic value, that it would not bear exportation to foreign markets, where produce bore a price correspondent with a sound and uniform currency. It would not sell in a foreign market for what it cost the trader here. Again, the quantity of produce of the country was diminished, in consequence of the hundreds of thousands of producers who were withdrawn from the productive pursuits of life to become speculators; and the price of produce was raised still higher above its value by competition between the individuals composing the swarms of speculators, so that your produce was diminished in quantity, until you had but little to export, and what you had, I say would not bear exportation. What was the consequence? Why, exportations in a measure ceased. Importations went on. The Atlantic was whitened with the sails of importing vessels, but exporting vessels were few and far between. What was the effect of all this? It was to turn the balance of trade against us. What farther? It was to bring upon us a commercial debt of I believe over sixty millions of dollars; and the time arrived in the course of trade, when that debt must be paid; and how was it to be paid? You had no produce or articles of commerce with which to pay it; or if you had, they bore so high a price that they would not bear exportation; but the debt must be paid. Again, what had you to pay it with. Your ragged bank promises would not pay it. As I have said at other times and places, you could not get a dinner or a drink of grog in a hot day with a common basket of such rags in a foreign country. How then was the debt to be paid? It was to be paid in that which all nations regard as the only legitimate and natural currency ever known since Joseph was sold to the Ishmaelites for twenty pieces of silver. That was the currency, or what is its equivalent, and what the modern Whigs deriding and sneeringly call the "Tom Benton humbug;" I mean the yellow boys. The gold and silver was all that you could pay that debt with. So the foreign manufacturer, capitalist, and merchant, called upon the importing merchant for gold and silver; the importing merchant called upon the wholesale seaport merchant to whom he had sold on credit, (for all this was the result of the glorious credit system,) for gold and silver; and the wholesale seaport merchant called upon the country retail merchant for gold and silver; and the country retail merchant called upon his customers, the people, for gold and silver; and the people gathered together their lazaroni rag bank promises and called upon the banks for gold and silver; and the banks, unable to stand the shock, shut down their trap-doors, and that was the suspension of specie payments. This, sir, describes the circle of the bank and credit operations which brought all the distress we have experienced in 1837 and since. It results from the same operations which produced the distress and ruin of 1818, 1819, and 1820. It is a principle in politics and government, as well as in logic, philosophy, and ethics, that like causes produce like effects; and whenever the Independent Treasury is repealed and the Government and banks united, the deposits put into the banks to bank upon, and their notes received in liquidation of the Government revenue, I care not whether the union be with the local banks or a National Bank and branches, the result will be the same as it has been; for, in less than two years from the commencement of such a union and such a use of the public money, we will have another bank bubble explosion, and all the pecuniary afflictions and commercial disasters which we have heretofore experienced. The Federal party promised relief to the people, if they would change the Administration. If that relief is to be attempted by repealing the Independent Treasury, and making banks the fiscal agents of the Government, and thereby make paper currency plenty by banking upon the revenue, I would like to have it in my power to admonish every Democrat in this Union, in peals louder than thunder, to be on the look out for the day of evil. I would admonish him to avoid the snare and the mire which will entangle and swamp thousands in irretrievable disaster and ruin.

I would advise him, too, if he shall be compelled to take for his labor and his honest products the rag promises of the banks, not to let the sacred day of rest pass over without converting them into cash, if the speed of a race horse will carry him to the counter on Saturday evening, where promise of redemption is to be found. A Democratic Administration has been overthrown by foreign and domestic banking and stock-jobbing influences, but if every Democrat is true to himself and his principles, every bank in the United States can be wound up in six months, and the Federal Administration overthrown, for it has no foundation but fraud, falsehood, and rotten borough corporations to stand upon. Such an Administration, composed of such factions, bound together by no ties but hostility to Democratic principles, and at this moment wrangling with each other, and threatening a blow up, before they have come together, cannot stand; it will crumble, and mingle with the rottenness upon which it stands. Firmness to your principles, and union of your party, Democrats, is all that is wanting to restore the Government, your party, and our free institutions. Fear not—be firm.

I repeat, that this Administration has been overthrown on no principle. The Federal party came into power upon no principle or pledge of measures. They came into power singing

"Tippecanoe and Tyler too."

And now, sir, as I before said, they are flocking from the head waters of "Salt river," as poor and cadaverous as if they had lived on locusts and coon skins during the forty years of their political banishment. The motley groups of spoils hunters who are now besetting this city remind one of the return of the Persian troops from the Scythian expedition, whom hollow hunger and pelting storms had deprived of the countenance and walk of men. Why, sir, when the gathering shall be complete, there will be two thousand for every office there will be to fill, after every Democrat is reformed. Every applicant will demand spoils. Every man will have made himself poor and bankrupt by his expenditures in overthrowing this "wicked and profligate Administration!" Every man, too, will have a wife and nine small, hungry, ragged children, and one at the breast. Sir, feeling myself unable to give a suitable and proper description of this lazaroni gathering in prose, I called upon my poet, as usual in such cases, and he has furnished me with:

THE GATHERING, MARCH 4th, 1841.

With crooked shin and jutting heel,
Comes cringing Abolition,
With blue light Federalist, born to peal
The glories of sedition.
The paper king, and all his spawn,
The soap-locks and the dandies,
The pipe men and the men of Rhawn,
Stockjobbers and the grandees,
And tariff men, who strive to get
A duty for protection,
To pay their pockets back the debt
Occasioned by election.
A noble band, that hand in hand,
Have piped in many places;
Around the dreadful hero! stand,
But scare him with their faces,
And while they chant his simple lay,
They hold their ready dishes,
For seven principles have they;
Five loaves and two small fishes!

My poet has done justice, in his description of the hungry pilgrims of "Salt river." I have said the Federalists came into power singing,

"What has caused this great commotion,

Motion, motion,

Our country through?

It is the hail a rolling on

For Tippecanoe and Tyler too."

They will go out of power on the 4th of March, 1845, singing a different tune, to a different song. My poet, who you see is admirable at description, says they will take up their line of march for the head waters of "Salt river," to the tune of "Row, brothers, row," and the song of,

With broken hearts our Federal bands
In shallops move to barren sands.
Soon as the Western star grows dim
We'll sing at St. James our parting hymn.
Row, brothers, row, the stream runs fast,
Salt river is near and our glory's past.
Steady! our shallop will run aground;
Hoarsely the ripple is heard around.
Listen! our fuglemen raise a song,
And the burden is "Josey, oh Jim along."
Row, brothers, row, the stream runs fast.
Clay, Webster and Tip are veto'd at last.
Money is gone, and our bills are due.
Credit, dear credit, where are you?
Loafers and pipers no music we'll dine
On bacon boiled in Champagne wine.
Row, brothers, row, the stream runs fast,
Corn bread and hard cider are all our repast!
Swiftly we near the arid shore,
Puffing and tugging the heavy oar;
Sady we sit on our threadbare cloth,
Fishing for meat in our coonskin broth.
Row, brothers, row, the stream runs fast,
The humbug of log cabin is all gone past.
Merry we've been in days gone by—
Pleasure has beamed from our lordly eye;
But thankless are they o'er whom we've ruled,
We've been shipp'd off by those we've fool'd.
Rest, brothers, rest, the distance is past,
Salt river is gained, and our shallop's fast.
Here, where the carion crow ne'er flies,
Where want grows poor and famine dies,
We'll eat our shadows, and blow away,
Like mists that hang on the mountain gray.
Die, brothers, die, our day is past,
Salt river will murmur our dirge at last.

Mr. Chairman, the Democracy have been charged with attempting to destroy the banks, and overthrow credit. That charge is without the least foundation in truth. I defy any man to point to the action of the Democracy, which will justify such a charge. True, the Democracy regret that the banking system, on its present plan, was ever introduced, and there is no man, who is not a bank knave or a bank vassal, who makes himself acquainted with the bank statistics of this country, and the stupendous frauds which the banks have practised upon the Government and the people, who will not regret that there ever was a Bank established in the country. But the evil is here; and it has interwoven itself with our institutions, commerce, and credit, in such a manner, that the Democracy are compelled to look upon it for the present as a necessary evil, and to content themselves with attempts to reform it. I have been engaged for some time examining bank documents and bank statistics with laborious attention; and here is the result of my labors in a table, on this small piece of paper. Here is a table, disclosing, in a compressed manner, the frauds, and public and private losses by banks, that must astonish all who may read it. I have the documents and statistics which prove every word of it. I have stated that the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives reported, April 13th, 1830, the Government to have lost by the local banks, between 1814 and 1817, $34,000,000 or $35,000,000.

That report was made by a committee, a majority of which was in favor of the recharter of the Bank of the United States, and was intended to illustrate the necessity of rechartering that institution. It is a Federal expose, and ought to be good against that party and the banks, but I believe it is an exaggerated estimate, and as it is truth I was after in my research, I have not relied on it.

Now for my table. Here it is. It is short, and consists in generals and round numbers not in details and fractions. The number of bank failures in this country since 1789, is about four hundred. The losses by and through banks that have failed since 1789, on their capital, circulation, deposits, and bank balances, are about - $80,000,000

Losses on depreciation of bank notes on banks which have from time to time suspended specie payments . 100,000,000

I find by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Doc. No. 10, made to the House last session in conformity with a call for that purpose, that the Government lost by the banks, between 1814 and 1817, in principal . 8,000,000

Interest from that time to this . 8,000,000

Losses on deposits in banks, and balances due from banks which have suspended, about . 50,000,000

These last losses were effected by the reception of depreciated paper from banks which suspended specie payments, in lieu of gold and silver, or its equivalent, which had been deposited; for it is a part of the system of bank suspensions to pay nothing but bank notes on deposits, however depreciated they may be.

Loss to the Government in expenses by the extra session, occasioned by the general bank suspension in 1837, and other additional expenses and losses in settling with the banks . 300,000

The aggregate amount of which is $246,300,000

These, sir, are the stupendous losses and frauds which this people and this Government have suffered by the present banking system—losses and frauds which have brought periodical ruin upon this country, embarrassment upon the Government, and sunk hundreds and thousands into poverty and the grave. It is this system of banking that the Democracy are exerting themselves to reform. But the pecuniary embarrassments and losses to the Government and the people are the smaller evils which this system is working. The effect upon our political institutions and individual political rights is a thousand times more to be deprecated and feared.

Let us briefly examine the subject—and I have but time to glance at it. And first let me remark on a truth well known, which is, that all the wealth, comfort, and temporal happiness we enjoy in this country, is dug in toil and sweat from the ground. The earth is the source of our support. The farmer and the mechanic are the operators to whom the country and the Government must look for support in peace and war. There must be so much labor done to furnish the means of support; and any system of policy which may be introduced, that will enable a portion of the community to live without labor, must throw upon the balance not so favored, a greater proportion of labor and responsibility. So, too, in the establishment of institutions, which bestow exclusive privileges and exemptions upon a portion of the community, must deprive the balance, not so favored, of a part of their privileges, which the principles of political equality entitle them to.

What is it that induces an association of individuals to petition a Legislature for a bank charter? It is to secure to themselves, in an aggregate or corporate capacity, a legal right to exercise powers and privileges which the principles of our Government prevent them from exercising in their individual capacity. Here then is an object and a design in the beginning, odious and anti-Republican, and at war with every principle of equal rights. What are the privileges and powers which have been bestowed on associated applicants for bank charters? After they have been incorporated by the provisions of their charter, they have been privileged to subscribe stock. Having subscribed stock, it became the legal duty to pay it. When a requisite amount of stock has been subscribed and paid in, by the present system of banking the association have the right to issue three times the amount of paper promises that there is capital paid in. That is, they have the right to lend three dollars in their paper promises for every dollar in money they have, and receive six per cent. interest on every dollar so issued. We the Democracy think it is unfair and unjust, that one part of the community should receive interest on their paper promises to pay, while all others not so favored, have to pay interest on their debts. We, also, think it unfair, unjust, and inequitable, that an association of rich and moneyed men should be permitted by law to receive eighteen per cent. upon every dollar that they own, while the laboring mechanic, and the farmer, in his individual capacity, can receive but six per cent. for a dollar that he may have to lend, over and above what may be necessary for his maintenance and that of his family; (if he has a family, and if he has not, he ought to have one.)

Without further illustration, it is seen that the present banking system is calculated in its very nature and privileges to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer. It at once creates two orders of society; a privileged order, and an oppressed order, and it provides the means to maintain and support the former, while the same means sink and oppress the latter.

But the members of this bank association are exempt, by their charter, from individual liability for the debts of their corporation. The bank may divide hundreds of thousands of dollars among its stockholders, and it may fail for the amount so divided, and the individual community may hold its rag promises to the amount of its failure, and yet not a dollar can be collected from those who have received the value of its promises. Nothing can be collected from a bank, except corporate property can be found; and this is one of the dangerous, fraudulent, and unjust principles connected with the present banking system. The bank stockholder may possess himself, by his bank advantages and privileges, of a princely estate; he may live in a palace, tread a Turkey carpet, drink the richest wine from goblets of gold, eat the fattest beef, roll through your streets in a gilded carriage-and-four, with his liveried out-riders, and transmit pecuniary independence to his children, while the bank from which he has drawn his wealth and splendor may owe every dollar to the community which has been divided to him and his incorporated associates. He may look with contempt on all below him in wealth, when the frauds that made him affluent made them poor. This is no supposition or fancy sketch; it is all truth, and thousands who may read me, and thousands who may not, have experienced its sad realities.

But further. Those bank lenders are money borrowers. I have stated they have the power to manufacture three times as much paper money as they have silver money in their vaults, and then they have power to borrow it themselves. They not only monopolize by their charter the prerogative of manufacturing money, but they monopolize its loan. This is in violation of the principles upon which a bank charter is granted, if I have any knowledge of the intention of Legislatures. No one will contend that a bank charter is bestowed for the benefit exclusively of those who constitute the members of the corporation. It is the public advantage that is looked to, but that object is defeated by the bank stockholders, directors, presidents, and cashiers, being the borrowers themselves. Now let us briefly present the evils that this abuse may and has produced. Banks have power to expand or contract their issues as much and as often as they please. Suppose that the pecuniary influence of a local bank covers one hundred miles square, and that its capital paid in is two hundred thousand dollars. On that capital it has power to issue six hundred thousand dollars. Suppose that its paper constitutes the principal circulating medium in the supposed area. That the price of every object of bargain and sale is regulated by the quantity of currency, is a fact well known. Then this bank would have power to raise and lower the price of produce of every description, within the influence of its circulation. Suppose at an early period of the season for purchasing produce for exportation, the directors and stockholders, in place of lending money to others to purchase produce with, monopolize all the loans the bank can make themselves, and become the traders and purchasers of produce. All this the owners of a bank can do. But suppose before they enter into such a speculation, the bank calls in a great portion of its paper, and curtails its issues and its loans to all but its directors, this would have the effect to reduce the price of produce in proportion to the curtailment supposed. The directors would then, being the monopolizers of loans, become the monopolizers of purchases, with money of their own manufacture, and at their own price. It may be said that traders could procure loans from other banks. But perhaps not. The traders and their securities may not be known to other directors of banks at a distance, and before they could make themselves known, the monopoly would be completed. All this the directors of banks can do, and have done; and, by a combination of bank managers for such a purpose, the whole trade of the country may be engulfed and monopolized by bank directors. They may, or they may not, take in, or embrace, the stockholders generally. Then the banks monopolize the manufacture of the currency of the country. Their directors may monopolize the loans of the money they manufacture; and by monopolizing the loans, they monopolize the trade of the country. These are evils that do exist, as connected with the present banking system. They are evils that strike at the root of justice, equality, and every principle of individual rights, anti-Republican and oppressive in their character, which must, and will eventually, overthrow our boasted liberty, and sink our free institutions.

It is by such a system of monopoly, as well of bank privileges and unequal credit as of political privileges and distinctions, which have made two hundred and seventy thousand of England's subjects rich noblemen and haughty aristocrats, but have reduced and ground down twenty-six millions of her subjects to poverty and the dust, and made one-sixth part of the whole population paupers and beggars. That system of monopoly is now undermining our Government, sapping our Republican institutions, and, I repeat, will eventually sink and subvert our boasted liberty.

These are the evils of which the Democracy complain; and it is the correction of these evils that the Democracy mean by bank reform. If banks must exist, we desire to have them placed upon the same footing with other institutions in the country. If money lenders must be incorporated, we desire to see them deprived of the power of monopolizing the loans of the money of their own manufacturing, for surely incorporated money lenders should not, or need not, be money borrowers. If the rich must be incorporated as money lenders, we desire to see them deprived of the power to receive three times as much interest on their capital as the poor can receive. And last, if banks must be incorporated, we desire to see their stockholders held and made liable for their debts as other individuals are, the laborer who is compelled to take their promises for his work, may have a right of action and process of law to recover the amount of that promise in the currency which the Constitution guarantees to him. This, I repeat, is what the Democracy mean by bank reform. Is there any thing wrong in it? Is there any thing in it that any man would not approve who looks to his own and the best interests of his country? Is there any thing in it that any man but a bank knave or a bank spaniel, without a soul and with less spirit than Baalam's ass, would deprecate?

Mr. Chairman, I wish the American people could have heard the debate on this bill. I wish they could have heard the high-toned Federal doctrines which have been boldly advocated. I think it would have removed the scales from the eyes of all who are not in wilful Federal and party blindness. Never were the Federal doctrines in the Administration of '98 more boldly asserted than they have been during the discussion of this measure. The distribution of the proceeds of the public lands boldly advocated—a high tariff advocated with equal boldness—a National Bank—assumption of the State debts—and an extravagant and reckless system of internal improvements by the General Government, are now urged as a national policy; and it is claimed that this Administration has been overthrown by the people in order that these Federal measures may be carried out. Had such declarations been made before the elections, the result would have been different, we all know. These measures are all of a character, and all lead to one object and one great and fatal political result, which it has been the cardinal object of Federalism to secure, viz: subjection and dependence of the States and consolidated power of the Federal Government. I have no time now to discuss those measures separately, and if I had, I do not know that I would do it. The American people understand them; they have repeatedly denounced them through the ballot box, and they will again do it when they are called upon.

What object can the people have in submitting to a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, when they know that that distribution must diminish the Government revenue, and that diminution must be supplied either by direct taxation or an increase of duties on imports, which they will have to pay, and which will be no more nor less than a tax, with the additional expenses, both in the distribution and the collection? What object can the people have in a high tariff, when all the additional revenue arising from it must come out of their pockets, together with the expenses of managing such a tariff. What object can the people have in permitting or wishing the Federal Government to carry on an extravagant system of internal improvements, when every dollar that is expended must come out of their pockets? Why not leave it with the States, whose legitimate right it is, and who do, and can, conduct improvements more than fifty per cent. cheaper than can the Federal Government, and who know best the character of improvements they want? What object can the people have in an assumption of the State debts by the General Government, when those debts must be paid by means drawn from their pockets, and at an expense in the management of the trust vastly greater than if the States managed it themselves? What object can the people have in the establishment of a National Bank which they have seen, more than once, shake this Union to its foundation, and bring blight and ruin upon them, and embarrassment upon the Government? An institution or the establishment of which no object can be answered but to engender a system of swindling, a spirit of stockjobbing and gambling, and to provide the means for thousands to live without labor, on the industry of others. I make these inquiries merely with reference to the policy and pecuniary economy of these measures. I have no time to discuss their unconstitutionality and their subverting effects and subjugating tendencies. I can only say that the exercise of all, or any of them, except so far as the support of the Government for national defence is concerned, is a departure from the original object of the Federal Government, and calculated to subvert those institutions which it established to protect.

Mr. Chairman, if I could make an appeal to the American Democracy which every one could hear, or every one could read, that appeal would be to stand to their principles, and the measures which they have ever supported. I wish I could point them to the tottering condition at this moment of the triumphant party. I believe they would see and feel, as I do, a confidence in its downfall and final overthrow within the term of its political power. All the Democracy have to do is to be firm and united—firm as to principle, and united as to men, and their triumph will be certain. If they will once more give the vote that they gave last fall, Federalism will be routed, horse, foot, and dragoons; for such a combination of factions and circumstances never can again be arrayed against them. Thousands of those who have been misled, will visit with vengeance those who have deceived them; and the ten thousand falsehoods, slanders, corruptions, bribes, and frauds, by which the Federalists have gained power, will be made to recoil upon their heads with fearful judgments. I would, then, say to the Democracy, as they value the principles and measures which they have ever considered sacred, and which they have so long, so manfully, and so successfully maintained against the combined powers, factions, wealth, and influence, of Federalism, Stand to your principles, and be united. I would say to them, as they fear and dread, with patriotic horror, the successful efforts of Federalism and the fatal effects of a political combination of a domestic and foreign moneyed bank aristocracy, organized and drilled, and clothed with powers and exclusive privileges, which now give them "a power behind the throne greater than the throne itself," I say, as they fear and abhor these, I would appeal to them to stand to their principles, be united, be vigilant, and triumph will be theirs. If the Federal factions should hang to ether, and survive the commotion in their ranks that now shakes and threatens them with dissolution, the first Congressional elections will give them an earthquake shake, and the elections of 1844 will secure their overthrow more complete and fatal than the Babylonian fall. Once more I say to the Democracy, be united and firm, and triumph will be yours.

When Mr. DUNCAN had finished his remarks, he read from the Intelligencer the following, as reported in that paper:

"Mr. W. C. JOHNSON submitted the Chair whether it was in order for an individual to charge General Harrison with cowardice, who had himself been branded as a coward on this floor?"

This paper was put in his hand a moment before he commenced speaking. He had deferred saying any thing on the subject until he should finish his remarks, expecting that some denial would be made, or some correction of the report ordered. But that not being done, he denounced its author (pointing to Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON,) a base liar, a contemptible puppy, a scoundrel, and an infamous coward. Now, sir, said Mr. D. I heard no part of the matter so reported, as applied to myself; and I ask the chairman, who was nearer to Mr. JOHNSON whether or not he heard the member so express himself.

The chairman [Mr. CAMPBELL] responded that he heard no such remark.

Then, said Mr. D. if said at all it must have been muttered, and not intended to be heard.

Mr. JOHNSON rose and said he was correctly reported that he had made the remark, and justified it. He read a part of a speech which purported to have been delivered in support of the resolution which had been introduced to expel Mr. D. for the publication of certain letters, posting certain members therein named. Mr. J. made some other remarks in justification.

Mr. DUNCAN said that resolution and its support was founded in base cowardice. It was manufactured as he was informed, and had reason to believe, in a caucus; and the object was to relieve the members posted in the said letters from disgrace, which they had not the courage to relieve themselves from. When the resolution was introduced, in was intimated that the publication of these letters was postponed until after the passage of the law against dueling. As soon as that intimation was uttered, Mr. D. said he pronounced the man who imputed such a motive to him, a base scoundrel and a liar. The member from Kentucky, [Mr. MENIFEE] intimated the same; he, too, said Mr. D. I pointed out instantly, and pronounced a contemptible scoundrel, and told him that the duelling law only operated over ten miles square; and in ten or twelve short days we would be out of these ten miles square, and any gentleman who felt himself aggrieved, might call on him: he should be met, and have such redress as he might have the courage to ask. Mr. D. disclaimed having charged General Harrison with cowardice, in any remark he had made; he had presented no fact or statement but what the political history of the country and of the last war warranted and sustained. Those who heard him, and those who might read him, could draw their own conclusions. And to conclude, once for all, said Mr. D. I repeat and fix upon the member [Mr. JOHNSON] the charge I made upon him. He is welcome to make the best of it.

THURSDAY.—When the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DUNCAN rose and asked permission to make a remark or two personal to himself. Leave being given, he said that it was with some astonishment that he had seen a report of some remarks of the member from Maryland, [W. C. JOHNSON] in the Intelligencer, denying the charges that he, Mr. DUNCAN, had made upon Mr. JOHNSON on Tuesday last. I will read, said Mr. D. the report as it is in the Globe. It is as follows:

"When Mr. DUNCAN had finished his remarks," he read from the Intelligencer the following, as reported in that paper:

"Mr. W. C. JOHNSON submitted to the Chair whether it was in order for an individual to charge General Harrison with cowardice, who had himself been branded as a coward on this floor?"

"This paper was put in his hand a moment before he commenced speaking. He had deferred saying any thing on the subject until he should finish his remarks, expecting that some denial would be made, or some correction of the report ordered. But that not being done, he denounced its author (pointing to Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON,) a base liar, a contemptible puppy, a scoundrel, and an infamous coward. Now, sir, said Mr. D. I heard no part of the matter so reported, as applied to myself; and I ask the chairman, who was nearer to Mr. JOHNSON, whether or not he heard the member so express himself?"

"The chairman [Mr. CAMPBELL] responded that he heard no such remark.

"Then, said Mr. D. if said at all it must have been muttered, and not intended to be heard.

"Mr. JOHNSON rose and said he was correctly reported. He had made the remark, and justified it. He read a part of a speech which purported to have been delivered in support of the resolution which had been introduced to expel Mr. D. for the publication of certain letters, posting certain members therein named. Mr. J. made some other remarks in justification.

"Mr. DUNCAN said that resolution and its support was founded in base cowardice. It was manufactured, as he was informed, and had reason to believe, in a caucus; and the object was to relieve the members posted in the said letters from disgrace, which they had not the courage to relieve themselves from. When the resolution was introduced, it was intimated that the publication of these letters was postponed until after the passage of the law against dueling. As soon as that intimation was uttered, Mr. D. said he pronounced the man who imputed such a motive to him, a base scoundrel and a liar. The member from Kentucky, [Mr. MENIFEE] intimated the same; he, too, said Mr. D. I pointed out instantly, and pronounced a contemptible scoundrel, and told him that the dueling law only operated over ten miles square; and in ten or twelve short days we would be out of these ten miles square, and any gentleman who felt himself aggrieved, might call on him: he should be met, and have such redress as he might have the courage to ask. Mr. D. disclaimed having charged General Harrison with cowardice, in any remark he had made; he had presented no fact or statement but what the political history of the country and of the last war warranted and sustained. Those who heard him, and those who might read him, could draw their own conclusions. And to conclude, once for all, said Mr. D. I repeat and fix upon the member [Mr. JOHNSON] the charge I made upon him. He is welcome to make the best of it."

The member from Maryland denies that the words in italics were uttered by me. I say they were as reported, word for word, and directed in the member's face, not in a cowardly mutter, but in peals that filled this hall to its remotest corners. And I now endorse the above report, and reiterate what I then said, and pronounce the member now, as I did then, and as I can do at any time or place, a base liar, a contemptible puppy, a scoundrel, and an infamous coward. I hope I am now heard, and I am prepared to prove that I so denounced the member on last Tuesday, as reported; and I have now to add that his sneaking and pitiful effort to change the issue, and shift the responsibility, by a contemptible quibble and a barefaced falsehood, sinks him still lower in my estimation. This he has done by denying the correctness of the report.

Here is the report of the Intelligencer, which would surely do him no injustice, in which the Globe is sustained in all that is essential, so far as he was denounced.

"Now (proceeded Mr. D.) I never heard this remark made by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON.] It was not addressed to me nor to the Chairman of the committee in such a way as to be heard. And I was astonished when it was put into my hands; and if I had had time for reflection, I would have contradicted it through some other medium. I say I did not hear the remark; and I have no hesitation in declaring that the man who uttered it is guilty of a base falsehood, and is himself a liar. And I call upon the Chairman of the committee to say whether such language was used in his hearing."

"When called upon by Mr. DUNCAN—

"Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina rose and said: I take upon myself to say that I heard no such expression when I was in the Chair. I had called the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] to order for irrelevancy, and he had acquiesced. I then understood the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. W. C. JOHNSON] as rising to the same point of order, and my reply to him was, that I had already called the gentleman to order, and that he had acquiesced in the decision. But, I repeat, I did not hear the expression referred to."

"Mr. DUNCAN. I protest against the statement that I had ever said anything against General Harrison except what the history of the country sustained me in saying. I never intimated that he was a coward, nor any thing like it; and no conclusion can be drawn from any thing I have said other than that he was not entitled to that character of a great military chieftain which was claimed for him by his friends."

What more is necessary to prove the member guilty of falsehood in his attempt to deny that he was denounced in the words reported? A single remark, and I am done.

The member from Maryland is the last man who should attempt to shuffle from responsibility by making the question of character an objection to a demand for satisfaction. I will take some other occasion to present the member's character to the country. It is not my object to make any new issue at this time; I have the member nailed, and I intend to keep him so. I am no duellist; I know but little about the rules and laws of etiquette that regulate duelling, if there be any; nor have I any desire to know them; but I have just got skill, the courage, the power, and the Highland blood, to meet the member, whenever and wherever he may have the courage to invite me, and give him such redress as he may have the chivalry to ask, and I will make the member gentleman enough for that purpose. Let me remark, too, that the duelling law has as few terrors for me as it has for the member. He has nothing to fear through me from the duelling law. I am done. I will trouble the House or the committee no more with this subject. If I appear again in this matter, it will be alone in the columns of the newspapers, unless the member should rally his courage, if he has any, and invite me to some other place.

REMARKS OF MR. BROWN,

OF MISSISSIPPI.

In the House of Representatives, Monday, February 22, 1841.—In Committee of the Whole on the General Appropriation bill, on the amendment of Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi in relation to the fees of marshals, clerks, &c.

Mr. A. G. BROWN said the proposition of his colleague was the only one for which he could vote. That amendment proposed to reduce the fees of officers in the district and circuit courts of the United States to a standard with the fees of officers performing like services in the courts of the several States; and it further provided that the fee bill in the Federal courts should in all after time conform to the fee bills of the State courts. This was right. The fee bills of the State courts were under the control of the Legislatures of the respective States; and there was not, in his judgment, the slightest danger but that the people would always exercise sufficient control over their immediate representatives to force such a regulation of the fees of law officers as should be acceptable to themselves. He believed there was no community in the Government who would object to pay marshals and clerks of the United States courts the same fees that were paid to clerks and sheriffs of State courts; and he was quite certain that no people would be willing to pay more. Pass then the amendment of his colleague, and you would do all that you ought to do—all that the people command you to do on this subject. You leave the fee bill in the Federal courts to be regulated by local legislation. There was a peculiar fitness in this. Services in some States were worth more than like services in other States. The Legislature of New York was the best judge of what the issuance of a subpoena, or the service of a capias was worth in that State; and the Legislature of his own State (Mississippi) was most competent to adjust all such matters in that State. If Congress undertook to pass a general fee bill, it must necessarily do injustice to some of the States, since that bill, which conforms to the interest of the South, may be much too heavy for the North, where labor is generally much lower; and every one knew it was worth more to discharge the duties of marshal or sheriff, in a sparsely populated country, than in one densely settled. At all events, there could be no harm in leaving this matter entirely in the hands of the respective State Legislatures. The proposition of his colleague [Mr. THOMPSON] proposed to place it there, and to permit it to remain through all after time.

The bill, as reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, he deemed a political enormity. What does that bill propose? Why, sir, not to reduce the fees, but to collect from the unfortunate debtor the enormous sums which you have always forced from him with such miserable twaddle as that clerks and marshals are not permitted to retain the money, but compelled to pay it over to the United States Treasury—as though it was a matter of any sort of consequence to the plundered man whether the money which you had thus forced from him went into the pockets of an officer or the vaults of a bankrupt Treasury. For one, if this system of legalized plunder was to be kept up, he desired, so far as his own State was concerned, that the clerks and marshals might have the benefit of it. In that event, meritorious citizens in Mississippi would derive some benefit from your cruelty to the unfortunate; and the aggregate wealth of the State would not be diminished. But pay it into the Treasury of the United States, and what goes with it? It is lost to us and ours forever. It goes to build up light-houses, harbors, and to make other improvements in your Eastern States; and the gross amount of the wealth of Mississippi is diminished to the full amount of the money thus unrighteously abstracted from the pockets of his indebted constituents, and strained through the hands of Federal officers into the vaults of the nation. His constituents had asked to be released from this onerous taxation, and you propose to quiet their supplications by taking their money to build light-houses and other things for the benefit of other States. Sir, this is not the relief asked for, and it is an insult to the people thus to respond to their petitions. If you take the money from the poor litigant, let the marshal and clerk keep it. The people of Mississippi had already been forced to pay five times their just quota for the support of Government under the tariff laws and land laws of the United States; and now you propose to levy a tax of seventy-five or eighty thousand dollars per annum, and call it relief. Believe me, Mr. Chairman, my unfortunate constituents have had a surfeit of just such relief.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have another and insuperable objection to the bill as reported by the committee, or as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and that objection is one founded on what I deem to be a just and proper construction of the Constitution. If I have read that instrument aright, it secures equality in taxation to all the people of this Confederacy; and what do you propose to do by this bill. Why, sir, to collect off of about 2,000 defendant suitors and citizens of Mississippi, eighty-five thousand dollars in the way of tax on law suits. Of this sum, you propose to give to the marshal ten thousand dollars as the maximum of his compensation, and to pay the remainder into the United States Treasury. Is that equality of taxation which exacts from two thousand citizens of Mississippi, who are so unfortunate as to become suitors in your Federal court, a tax of seventy-five thousand dollars, whilst you exempt from similar taxation the remaining thirty-five thousand who are not suitors in that court? Is that equality of taxation which exacts seventy-five thousand dollars from two thousand citizens of Mississippi, and not one cent from the five hundred thousand who live in Ohio? Is that equality of taxation which exacts of me fifty dollars, because I am so unfortunate as to be sued, and yet exempts entirely my neighbor or my brother, who is not sued? Is that equality of taxation which exacts of the unfortunate debtor thousands and tens of thousands, and not one cent from the unembarrassed and unindebted part of the community? And does any man seriously pretend that this will not be the result if this law is passed? Is it not in fact avowed, in all parts of the House, that this will be the result? And have not defences been attempted to be set up for this political monstrosity?

Sir, you have no authority to raise revenue in this way; and if you had, it would be a monstrous abuse of power to exercise your authority. I would not have one dollar of revenue collected in this way;—such ill-gotten gain—gotten in violation of the Constitution—wrong from the unfortunate debtor—coined, as it were, from the flesh of a tortured citizen, I should expect to turn to slimy reptiles and to hissing adders, that would besmear the vaults of your Treasury with their filth, and sting, as with a deadly poison, each hand that dared remove them. I cannot, I will not, vote for any maximum compensation—to do so is to fix a contingency on the suffering, of which this ill-gotten treasure endures to the nation. You have no authority to fix any such contingency. You have no authority to take one dollar of money collected in this way, though there were millions wrong from the unhappy citizen. I will vote for the proposition of my colleague, and I shall do so with great pleasure; but when this is done, I shall have done all that I can or will do. I shall not be accused of voting against a maximum through party motives, for before this law goes into effect—if it passes at all—there will probably not be a political friend of mine in any office in the Republic within the gift of the Executive, that is worth asking for. I claim to give the vote which I shall give, against the original proposition, and against the amendment of my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] in obedience to my sense of justice to my constituents, and my duty to the Constitution, and to these alone.

SPEECH OF MR. BLACK, OF GEORGIA.

In the House of Representatives, February 2, 1841—
On the Treasury note bill.

Mr. BARNARD'S motion to strike out the enacting clause being under consideration,

Mr. BLACK said: He deemed it incumbent on him, at this late period of the discussion, to detain the committee for as short a time as the importance of the subjects introduced into the debate would permit. If the honorable gentlemen who preceded him had confided themselves to the merits of the bill on the table, he would, in all probability, have given a silent vote; but the mere question whether we shall authorize the issue of five millions of Treasury notes to enable the Government to anticipate a portion of its revenues, had been wholly lost sight of. It seemed to be conceded on all hands that the bill must pass; he doubted whether the gentleman himself, whose motion was now pending to strike out the enacting clause, would vote against its final passage; nay, the great difficulty with the reforming and retrenching Whigs who had marshalled themselves in apparent opposition to the bill, was, that instead of too much, it gave too little. But the issue of Treasury notes, whether considered with regard to the constitutionality or expediency of the measure, had hardly been mentioned for the last week—the tariff, internal improvements by the Government—the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the States—a public debt (which they denominated a "loan,"") and a National Bank, are the vital and important questions which have absorbed us, since the commencement of this discussion. Never himself a great stickler for "relevancy of debate," he was rejoiced that the leading friends of General Harrison had seized this occasion to show their hands to the people—particularly to the Southern people, who had great interests at stake upon the policy and measures of the incoming Administration. He had never before, from the commencement of the struggles between the rival parties, heard or witnessed, from the opponents of Mr. Van Buren, so bold, candid, and fearless an avowal of policy and principle as had characterized their speeches on this occasion. He ventured to say, if these confessions of Whig faith had been made during the last summer, "old Tip" had never been President—at least, if his election had depended on the vote of the State of Georgia.

Sir, said Mr. BLACK, my delegated light is flickering in its socket; my representative career is about to terminate abruptly; and the trappings of office, which I have endeavored to wear meekly, will shortly fall from my shoulders. They will be transferred to an abler, but not more honest or zealous incumbent. But while, in obedience to the voice of my constituents, I willingly resign to the hands of another the high trust, and the representative character with which they endowed me, I am yet "ONE OF THE PEOPLE;" of that character, and of the rights which pertain to it, no man can deprive me; and in that character, as one of the sovereign people of the State of Georgia, I claim to be heard on this floor. I avail myself then, sir, of my privilege, not only as a Representative, but as a constituent, to advise my fellow-citizens at home of what is transpiring here, and to warn them that a high discriminating tariff, under the specious garb of a tax on luxuries, is to be saddled on them, and perhaps on their posterity. That a public debt, disguised as a loan, is preparing for them—that their hard earnings must go to support a splendid system of internal improvements by the General Government. That the proceeds of the public lands, instead of being made to contribute to the reduction of duties on imports, are to be abstracted from that purpose, and divided out among the States in proportion to their population, for the avowed purpose of paying the debts of those States. That this vacuum, thus produced, of between three and five millions annually, is to be supplied by increasing the duty on those articles of commerce which depend for their importation into the country exclusively upon the agricultural productions of the South. That a National Bank, to which they have ever been opposed, as unconstitutional, as destructive to their own State institutions, and as hostile to their agricultural and commercial prosperity, is to be fastened on the country. These are the measures, sir, which have been openly advanced in this debate—not hinted at or suggested, but boldly proclaimed, as if "by authority," to be the measures which are to characterize General Harrison's administration. My object, then, is to give timely notice to the people of Georgia, to Whigs as well as to Democrats, that their day of trial is at hand—that all the evil which it was predicted would follow the election of General Harrison is about to be realized, and that the forebodings which were denounced in certain quarters as the interested misrepresentations of political aspirants, are now about to assume the unquestionable character of passing events. Sir, said Mr. B. I question the motives of no man; I shall not be so unparliamentary as to deny to gentlemen here the same rectitude of intention that I claim for myself; but, at the same time, my rights and interests as a constituent, and my high duty as a Representative, which with me are paramount to all other considerations, constrain me to speak out plainly and audibly, without regard to consequences. When I do this, I shall have done my duty; and the people of Georgia, who I doubt not are equal to any emergency, will most assuredly do theirs.

Sir, my friend from New York [Mr. VANDERFORD] delivered yesterday an able speech in vindication of the present Administration. I listened to it with great pleasure, as a prompt and conclusive reply to the blundering attacks which had been made on the official estimates; but there was one remark of that gentleman which I regretted to hear. He told us he had listened to so much rant and gasconade about Southern wealth and importance, he had almost concluded that Pennsylvania and New York were nothing more than mere colonies, in comparison with some other States of the Union. I cannot but regret to hear these comparisons instituted as to the relative importance of the North and the South. But if gentlemen will talk about it, I insist that justice at least shall be done to the South. She does not urge the comparison; but when Northern gentlemen are making these unprofitable estimates, let me ask them, what would all their boasted commercial importance amount to, without the agricultural productions of the South. If the article of cotton was stricken from their commercial vocabulary, what would they export? Could they freight their ships to Europe with apples, potatoes, onions, and wooden nutmegs? Let the production of cotton be destroyed at the South by actual legislation, or the prevalence of the Abolition mania, and what would the State of Maine do with her ships? Instead of employing them, as she now does, in exporting the produce of the South, and in bringing back the manufactured goods with which our raw material is purchased, her merchantmen would freeze in her docks, and rot at her wharves; unless, indeed, she embarked them in the commendable employment of abducting our slaves from their lawful owners. She could, it is true, send a few "long, low, black schooners" to Savannah, and down the Southern coast, in command of such men as Philbrook and Kellran, who, under pretence of taking lumber to the East, might stow away our negroes between the interstices of their timber cargo. But however this sort of "traffic in human flesh" might approve itself to the philanthropic sentiments of the advocates of "human rights," yet I apprehend that in a commercial point of view, the profits of the voyage would not be quite as large as if they had been honestly employed in carrying our cotton to Liverpool or Havre.

[Here Mr. ALBERT SMITH of Maine interposed, and said that so far from employing "long, low, black schooners" in the abduction of slaves from Georgia to Maine, he would be very thankful if the gentleman from Georgia would abduct the 100 negroes from Maine who had voted against, and beaten him in his own district at the last Congressional election.

[Mr. BLACK assured his friend if he would deliver these negroes to him at his plantation, on the Savannah river, at any time after the fourth of March proximo, he would employ them in a much better business than voting against and defeating so distinguished a Democrat as the gentleman from Maine.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I deprecate this sort of discussion, especially with our friends—this unnecessary comparison between the different sections of the Union. All that I have said on the subject has been strictly in reply.

Sir, I take the liberties of this debate to digress for a moment to a topic in relation to which much has been said, not only in this House, but in the newspapers of the day. I allude to the supposed influence of British gold in controlling the elections which have just passed. What the extent of that influence was, if it existed at all, in other sections of the United States, I cannot assert of my own knowledge. The charge of corruption has been made, and has been met on this floor by the gentleman from Kentucky [Gov. PORE] only with silence and alleged contempt. It may be that in the dense and crowded cities of the North, the East, and even in the West, the "noble art of pipe laying" was resorted to, to secure the ascendancy of the modern Whigs. It may be true, as I have seen it gravely and circumstantially stated, that in many of the Harrison counties of Ohio they have actually beaten the census at the late elections in that State. But whatever may be my opinion as to the truth of these charges, or the manner in which they have been met with regard to other and distant parts of the Union, I am free to declare that so far as they relate to the State of Georgia—to any of my constituents, whether Democrats or Whigs, they are wholly and totally false. It is true the party, with which I am acting, was defeated in October and November last, but it was because the majority of the people was persuaded to prefer General Harrison to Martin Van Buren—because they believed that the administration of the former, if elected, would be strictly conformable to the rights and interests of the South—that we would have no bank—no protective tariff, open or disguised—no internal improvements by the General Government—no distribution of the public lands for the purpose of assuming the State debts, or for any other purpose—that supposed abuses would be reformed, and last, not least, that we should have a retrenchment of the expenditures of the Federal Government. Because the people believed that these would be the characteristics of a Whig administration, they thought proper to sustain our opponents and abandon us. We told them then, as I tell them now, that they were deluded and deceived by the false professions of party hacks, and party leaders. But still the people chose to believe, as they had a right to do, in the truth of the professions which were made to them. That belief, honest, I have no doubt, to the full extent of it, and not the appliance of either British or American gold, induced them to the support of the dominant party. Nay, sir, so far from the great mass of the people of Georgia being tainted or touched with the corruption of gold, I do not believe that we have even a floating balance of population that could be bought by such vile means; and the charge, when made against any party in Georgia, is false, and a slander upon the reputation of the State. By the way, said Mr. B. while I am talking about bribery, I may be permitted to allude for a moment to a pictorial representation of two of my colleagues and myself, which is now exposed upon your avenue to the public gaze, and openly vended in the Whig print shops of this city. I mean the base libel which exhibits me as bought over by Federal gold to the support of Mr. Van Buren. I now denounce it as a lie in its inception, a lie in its execution, a lie in its promulgation. I stop not to denounce the poor artist, to whom it may have been a matter of indifference whether he lithographed the truth or a lie, but I mean to reach the author whoever he may be, of the base unmitigated fraud, and to tell him that not only my neighbors, who have known me, and confided in my integrity from my infancy, but the whole people of Georgia will, as one man, proclaim it to be a lie. With many of the frailties of humanity lingering about me, those with whom I am daily associated at home, and who know me best, have never suspected me, nor will they tolerate the charge, of venality and corruption; and the very surest means of vindicating my character from such anonymous slander will be to exhibit this specimen of Whig lithography (which I mean to do, if Providence permits me to return) to the people among whom I live, that they may see and know the means which have been resorted to out of Georgia, for the purpose of affecting me at home.

I shall not attempt, said Mr. BLACK, to follow the three gentlemen who led off this debate on the Whig side of the House through the confused and discordant mass of figures with which they sought to impeach the accuracy of the official estimates. The fate which awaited them at their own hands, admonishes me of the impracticability of making estimates in detail, without access to the various sources of fiscal and statistical information with which the Secretary of the Treasury must necessarily be most intimately conversant. That functionary is in daily intercourse not only with the different revenue officers of his Department, but with the most extensive and intelligent merchants of our principal emporiums. It is his exclusive business to arrange, analyze, and digest these facts and this information, a thorough knowledge of which is so essentially necessary to an accurate calculation of the receipts and expenditures of this vast Government. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] acknowledged this much, when he admitted his information to be necessarily limited and imperfect; and yet he draws largely on our "generous confidence," for an approval of his counter estimates. Why, sir, they can't agree among themselves. They tell us a permanent deficiency exists in the Treasury. Well, what is it? The gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] says it is somewhere between $7,000,000 and $10,000,000—the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] asserts it to be $18,000,000—and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] out figures them all, and runs it up to $40,000,000. These are the doctors who are to treat the body politic for the next four years! Settle your differences among yourselves first, gentlemen, before you tender us an issue of deficiency.

But, sir, I take this broad ground; and I call the attention of the Opposition particularly to it. Since 1837, Mr. Van Buren, with a growing and increasing country, and a tariff of duties gradually diminishing, by the operation of the compromise act, has not only paid the debts and preserved the credit of the Government, but has actually reduced the public expenditures nearly ten millions of dollars. This is a fact, worth to the people of the United States just ten millions of dollars more than all the cyphering of these discordant arithmeticians. In 1838 the expenditures were reduced from those of 1837—in 1839 they were cut down six millions of dollars—in 1840 they were again reduced between two and three millions. The President, in his last annual message, says:

"The estimates and appropriations for the year 1838 (the first over which I had any control) were somewhat diminished. The expenditures of 1839 were reduced six millions of dollars. Those of 1840, exclusive of disbursements for public debt and trust claims, will probably not exceed twenty-two and a half millions; being between two and three millions less than those of the preceding year, and nine or ten millions less than those of 1837. Nor has it been found necessary, in order to produce this result, to resort to the power conferred by Congress, of postponing certain classes of the public works, except by deferring expenditures for a short period upon a limited portion of them; and which postponement terminated some time since, at the moment the Treasury Department, by further receipts from the indebted banks, became fully assured of its ability to meet them without prejudice to the public service in other respects. Causes are in operation which will, it is believed, justify a still further reduction, without injury to any important national interest. The expenses of sustaining the troops employed in Florida have been gradually and greatly reduced, through the persevering efforts of the War Department; and a reasonable hope may be entertained that the necessity for military operations in that quarter, will soon cease. The removal of the Indians from within our settled borders is nearly completed. The pension list, one of the heaviest charges upon the Treasury, is rapidly diminishing by death. The most costly of our public buildings are either finished, or nearly so; and we may, I think, safely promise ourselves a continued exemption from border difficulties."

"The available balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January next estimated at one million and a half of dollars. This sum, with the expected receipts from all sources during the next year, will, it is believed, be sufficient to enable the Government to meet every engagement, and leave a suitable balance in the Treasury at the end of the year, if the remedial measures connected with the customs and the public lands, heretofore recommended, shall be adopted, and the now appropriations by Congress shall not carry the expenditures beyond the official estimates."

But, sir, what do we now hear? Instead of seconding the economical suggestions of the Chief Magistrate, these retrenching gentlemen, who last year were for bringing down the expenses of the Federal Government to the point at which Mr. ADAMS had it, ($13,000,000,) are now taunting us with a close and niggardly parsimony. Instead of responding affirmatively to the recommendation of Mr. Van Buren that "Congress shall not carry the expenditures beyond the official estimates," their cry is "give us more." The gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] tells us we ought to make "liberal and abundant appropriations, and his coadjutor from New York to whom I have just alluded, fills up this broad and indefinite outline, by insisting on vast appropriations for rivers, harbors, roads, and canals—for the Northeastern frontier—for building splendid war steamers—for outfits and salaries for a new set of ministers and charges to foreign courts—for the payment of the 4th instalment to the States—for French spoliation, and the thousand claims for money which crowd your table. And strange to tell, notwithstanding their disgusting clamor last year about Mr. Van Buren's "royal establishment," they are now actually demanding another appropriation to buy more furniture for the log cabin candidate. What I are not the tabourettes, the gold spoons, the $1,500 French bedstead, good enough for old Tip? Is the "old pine table," on which Mr. Van Buren eat his dinner, to be replaced by costly mahogany, or must you have a more splendid plateau than the one which now adorns the President's table, and about the cost and extravagance of which you descanted before the election, so economically to the people? I am aware, sir, that consistency, although a jewel, is not the question now in order before the committee, or I might go on to show the inconsistency between the present demands and the former professions of these admirable retrenchers.

These, sir, are the answers which are now given, by the reform party, to Mr. Van Buren's recommendation that "Congress shall not carry the expenditures beyond the official estimates;" and given, too, in the face of their declarations that the Government is largely in debt. Grant, sir, that there is a deficiency in the Treasury—is this the way to supply or retrieve it? What makes a deficiency? The legislation of Congress; for without the "authority of law" the Executive cannot draw one dollar out of the public coffers. How shall we retrieve this alleged deficit? By "liberal and abundant appropriations" for a wild, extravagant, and splendid system of internal improvements? By voting new outfits for partisan ministers? By laying out millions on millions upon coasts, harbors, fortifications, and steam ships, when there is no necessity for it? By offering inducements to the thousand speculators who crowd your lobbies to revive their exploded claims? By spending another $20,000 to refit the White House for the reception of the "old farmer," whose chief merit it was, but a few months ago, to live in a log cabin and drink hard cider out of a gourd?

Is this the way to fill up an empty Treasury? Strange and unaccountable as it may seem to the thousands of honest men who were deluded into the support of the Whig party by professions of retrenchment and reform; astounding as it may be to those who are quietly pursuing their daily labor at a distance from the scene which is now passing palpably and tangibly before me—yet it is even so. We are in debt, they say; but with the honorable exceptions of the gentlemen from Virginia, [Mr.

WISE and Mr. MALLORY,] and the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. ALFORD] who, of the Whig party, during this debate, have even uttered the word retrenchment, or offered to cut down the expenditures to the receipts? It would occur to plain, honest, unsophisticated men, that this was the only practicable way, without raising your taxes, of filling up this vaunted vacuum in the Treasury. But not content with these extraordinary demands for more money, when they say there is no money, they go further. It is now distinctly proposed by Gen. Harrison's friends, with the above exceptions, to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the States.

Those whose occupations will not permit them to come here and see and know for themselves, are unwilling to believe that the Whig party intend to effect this distribution among the States; much less do they believe that this Government is about to assume indirectly the debts of the States by this distribution. Why, sir, even intelligent men in Georgia seriously doubt whether this can be so. If the proof of it depended upon my personal knowledge of the fact, it may be that I could not make out a point-blank case; but so far as the proof of party measures depend upon the declarations of leading men who compose the party, there can no longer be any doubt in the minds of those who are willing to be convinced by the truth. I will venture to say that there is no Senator in the other end of the Capitol who has not heard Mr. CLAY, Mr. WEBSTER, and Mr. CRITTENDEN over and over announce this assumption, either directly, or periphrastically. Why, sir, it is the burden of their song; they sing it every day, not only to their old tune of distribution, but to their new variation of "our obligations to the States." Who doubts it in this House? Who will rise and, in the name of the Whig party, deny that it is one of their measures? Did not the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE] who, even his enemies will admit, is first among the foremost of the Whigs, get up here the other day and not only announce it, but denounce it as such? Did any one of his friends or opponents contradict him? No, sir, not one. Let the people of Georgia know, then, that this is another of the fruits of the tree they planted. Between three and five millions of the proceeds of the public lands are to be annually abstracted from a depleted Treasury, to be given to the States, and the manner in which these gentlemen propose to fill up the vacuum (by an increase of the tariff,) I will endeavor presently to expose to my constituents, when I come to notice the extraordinary speech of my colleague, [Mr. WEBSTER.] But, sir, I am opposed to this distribution because it leads to an assumption by this Government of State debts, and I am opposed to that because those debts amount to the enormous and alarming sum of $200,000,000—nay, even the annual interest on this extraordinary debt is $20,000,000. I am opposed to it because, if it becomes the settled policy of this Government, I, as one of the people of Georgia, shall be taxed indirectly, by an increase of tariff duties on imports, to replace the three, four or five millions, or even more, which are thus to be abstracted and distributed. For we have now no surplus revenue, and I hope we never shall have. Therefore every dollar that is now taken out of our already deficient Treasury for extraordinary purposes, must and will be supplied immediately, for the ordinary wants of Government, from that only other source of revenue—a tariff on imports. I am opposed to it because this increase of the tariff, necessarily consequent upon the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, must fall most heavily on the South—the cotton growing and revenue yielding South. I am opposed to it, too, because while Georgia owes comparatively nothing, she will thus be made to contribute far beyond the proportion of her taxable property and population, to the payment of an enormous debt, for which she never has, and never will, receive a cent of benefit. I subjoin the following table of the debts of the different States, and although I cannot pretend to figure against the gentleman from New York (who foots up the present deficit at $40,000,000) yet my constituents may ascertain, by calculating for themselves, the amount of their liabilities collectively and individually, if this Whig measure is made a law of the land.

The above table is abstracted from Trotter's Finances of the United States, an English book, published in London as long ago as December, 1839. I do not give it as exhibiting an accurate amount of the debts of the States at this time, because, in some instances, a portion of the stocks authorized to be issued by certain of the States, has not yet been disposed of; and besides some time has elapsed since the compilation. However, it will serve to show which of the States are indebted, and will indicate something like the amount of their debts. From the best information I can gather, the present aggregate of the whole debt is considerably over $200,000,000; and the annual interest thereon, as I have already shown, is nearly $20,000,000.

Sir, I confess I was astonished and mortified at the speech of my honorable colleague, [Mr. NISBET,] who succeeded the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT.] I do not intend to attack the motives of that gentleman, or to express even a suspicion of his intentions; but while I willingly concede this much to him, and promise to set down nothing in malice, I shall speak plainly and candidly of the position he assumed, and of the consequences likely to result from it. The more I see of that gentleman, sir, the more I am convinced of his firmness and resolution. I will not say that he ever was a nullifier, eo nomine; but that he professed to be a State Rights man, and was willing to take the advantages of nullification principles, however he may have found it convenient to shun the odium of the name, he himself will not deny. His old associates, then, for the sake of their principles, to the success of which he is indebted for his present elevation, ought to have been secure from any detraction, either direct or indirect, at his hands. But in his haste to commend himself to his new and unnatural allies, he has the boldness to turn upon his old coadjutors, and, with a small but bitter vituperation, assail them and their principles in an unprovoked attack upon the distinguished Carolinian who represents the palmetto State in the other end of this Capitol.

Does not that gentleman know that the majority of this world has not yet been able to distinguish between measures and men? Does he not know that the eminent statesman, against whom he hurled the shafts of his new-born indignation, has, by his able and fearless vindication of the rights of the States, identified himself with the principles upon which those rights depend? Does he not know that any assault he may make against that statesman, personally, must recoil from the man to the political system of which he is justly regarded as the head and front? Wherefore the necessity of wandering from the question before the House to speak of John C. Calhoun as a political comet, wild and errant in his course, coming from whence he knew not, and going whither no man could tell; as a politician who ought to have a straight jacket; and as a leader whom he could not follow? Sir, I think my colleague ought to be able to tell whence

Mr. Calhoun came on the State Rights question, and whither he went; for the gentleman himself, whatever he may now think of it, was, in that celebrated progress, the travelling companion of the great Nullifier. Although he may have worn no badge by which he might be marked and distinguished, yet he had our countersign, and was certainly at that time in the State Rights camp, wherever he may now be. Notwithstanding all this, he affects to be extremely ignorant of Mr. Calhoun's "whereabout." As a Southern State Rights man, I most decidedly object to this unprovoked attack upon an individual, who, in the hour of our utmost need, defended us and our rights with an ability and constancy equalled only by the patriotism with which he was ready and willing to sacrifice himself for the good of his country. Sir, the gentleman's arrows were well dipped, but his bow was too weak. He may exercise his archery if he will, but his shafts fall, as they ever must, far short of the bright and elevated object at which he would hurl them.

Mr. B. said he had just alluded to his colleague's fortitude; he could not but do so again, for no man as a Representative of the South, could make, such a speech as the gentleman had just delivered upon the "tariff question," without utterly disregarding consequences.

[Mr. NISBET explained. He had no idea that his colleague would intentionally misrepresent him; he therefore asked him to bear in mind that, throughout the whole of his speech, he had protested against a tariff for protection, and that he advocated duties for revenue only.]

Sir, said Mr. B. I repeat again, I do not question the gentleman's motives. I freely concede to him all the benefit of "good intentions." He has a perfect right, as an individual, to choose his position—that I shall not question; but when he speaks here as my representative, I must be permitted to dissent from the doctrines he has thought proper to advance. Nor shall I misrepresent his remarks—I remember them well, for they sounded ominously on my ear. The gentleman did say, more than once, (and I thought he was unusually solicitous to impress it on his hearers,) that he was opposed to a protective tariff, and advocated duties only for revenue. That was his text, but did he stick to it? We shall see.

In the first place, "he advocated duties only for revenue." What sort of a revenue? For a revenue commensurate with the demands of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] who estimated the deficit of the Treasury at $40,000,000; to which we must add his estimates for the current expenses, not only of 1841, but of 1842? If my colleague is willing to raise a revenue by means of a tariff sufficient to cover these liberal estimates, I apprehend he will find but few of his constituents who would go with him. This is an important point on which we are left to grope our way through an indefinite generality, and I protest against leaving open any door through which these "liberal estimates" of avowed tariff men may be forced upon us hereafter under the guise of "duties for revenue only."

We are told by the gentleman from Georgia that he will support and maintain the compromise act of March 2d, 1833—for that "it settles a great conservative principle for the South." The only "conservative principle" in favor of the South which that act settles, is to be found in the third section, in these words: "And such duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government." So far as that principle is concerned, I am willing to support it myself, but to the two other principles contained in this section, to wit: the cash duties, and the home valuation, I am opposed upon the ground that their insertion in the act was a reservation in favor of the tariff interest of the North, which of itself stamped upon the law of 1833 the character of a "compromise" between the conflicting claims of the high tariff men and those who opposed that iniquitous system. I oppose them because when they shall come into full operation after the 2d June, 1842, they will run up the maximum of 20 per cent. duties on imports, as nominally settled by that act to 50 or 60 per cent. ad valorem. I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] proved that these two conservative principles which my colleague would support and maintain, would have precisely that effect, to wit: that this 20 per cent. duty, when levied, as it must be if this compromise is maintained, after the 2d June, 1842, "in ready money," and that too upon "goods, wares, and merchandise," valued "at the port where the same shall be entered," will be increased to a comfortable tax of 50 or 60 per cent. ad valorem, without limitation as to time. For although the act provides for a reduction of duties "in the contingency, either of excess or deficiency of revenue," the expenditures, if we may judge of the future by the "liberal estimates" of the present, will always be made to keep pace with any "excess" of revenue that may accrue.

Let me illustrate these conservative principles which my colleague would maintain, and by the use of a few facts and figures show the effect they will have on the consumers of imports, who with us, for the most part, are the producers of exports, and who, at last, it is conceded, must pay this insidious tax. The committee will remember that the imports of 1840 were much lower than those of any other year since 1832, when they amounted to only $101,029,266. In 1836, they reached to $189,980,035. But take the imports of 1840—$104,805,981—a tariff of 50 per cent. on that amount would produce a revenue of $52,402,990! Is my colleague willing to sustain a "compromise" that in all probability will produce such a revenue? Let us suppose, however, that the cash duties and home valuation will not increase this compromise 20 per cent. to more than 25 per cent.; even that tariff of duties on the unusually small importation of 1840, will yield to the Government $26,201,495—this added to $4,000,000 from the sales of the public lands will give you $30,201,495 per annum. Is any Southern man prepared to support a "compromise" that will throw this amount annually into the Treasury? (to say nothing of the revenue that would accrue from a tax of 50 per cent. instead of 25 per cent. upon an average importation of one hundred and forty millions?) This estimate is made upon as reduced a scale as any gentleman could require; and even at that rate we should have, in a short time, another surplus revenue to scramble for, besides the burden it would impose upon the people. The public expenditures have, for the last few years, exceeded the usual expenses of the Government in consequence of the extraordinary character of the exigencies which demanded them, but from causes now in operation, as has already been shown, we have a reasonable expectation that they will continue to recede in amount, especially if the retrenchment advised by Mr. Van Buren in his last message, and heretofore promised by the Whigs, be honestly and efficiently carried out by Congress. The expenditures for 1841, for ordinary purposes, are estimated at $19,250,000; with economy we may hope to find them in a few years down to $15,000,000, and yet, with this prospect in view, my colleague will support and maintain a compromise which, at the lowest and most reasonable calculation, must yield, in conjunction with the sales of the public domain, at least $30,201,475 per annum. Against supporting such a compromise, I, as a representative, and as one of the people of Georgia, do most solemnly protest.

The committee are aware that the gentleman from New York has given notice, that if the enacting clause of this bill is stricken out, he will move the imposition of a tax on silks and wines, and other luxuries; this, with the other proposition to tax linen fabrics and pins, leaves no doubt on my mind of the settled determination of the great majority of the Whig party, in this House, to fix upon the next Administration the policy of a high protective tariff. To the tax on French silks and wines, which above all others would be most mischievous to the cotton and tobacco growing States, my colleague gives his hearty assent. Let us see if that assent comports with his declaration that he was opposed to a tariff for protection, and advocated duties only for revenue.

What is the fact with regard to the consumption of silks at the South? They have grown into general, nay into almost universal use; they are no longer to be looked on as luxuries, at least not as luxuries confined to the use of the rich. Almost every man, poor or rich, in the region where I reside indulges his wife and daughter in the use of this elegant and substantial article. To the extent then, sir, to which silks are used at the South, are the cotton goods of Northern manufactories excluded. The manufacturer sharpened by his interest, sees and feels this—prompted by his cupidity, and regardless of our rights and preferences, he is now striking at the imports of silk by attempting to tax them with a duty of 20 per cent. By your existing laws they are free—our farmers' wives and daughters, under this free importation, can afford to wear them as well as the wives and daughters of the wealthy merchants, or the bankers; but raise the duty 20 per cent. almost one-fourth of the value of the article, and tack on to it cash duties, and a home valuation, and you effectually deny to the poor man what the wealth of his neighbor may still enable him to enjoy. The manufacturer thus hopes to expel silks from the South and to fill up the vacuum with his own cotton fabrics. Strange to say, this expulsion of silks has been urged as an "unanswered and an unanswerable argument" why the South should acquiesce in a tax on wines and silks; that in proportion as silk was expelled, the consumption of cotton would be increased. This would undoubtedly be a hard argument in the mouth of a Northern manufacturer; but when used by a Southern man to the South, the reply is evident and conclusive. Although this expulsion of silk might compel us to consume more of the manufactured article, I deny that it would increase the consumption of the raw material, in which the producer is mainly interested, for even as things now are, the home factories are fully supplied, and any increased supply of the unwrought staple in that quarter would glut the market, and still farther reduce its diminished value. In addition to the compulsion upon which this additional consumption would be based, it would not only be destructive of the advantages resulting from free trade, but it would be closing a profitable foreign market, from whence our cotton is not returned to us, and substituting therefor a less profitable market at the North from which we should receive payment for the raw material in the same commodity wrought up, being made to pay, in the mean time, the profits of the manufacturer. Is not this a "protection" of Northern manufacturers at the expense of our constituents? And yet my colleague is willing to lend his aid to a measure which will surely effect it. So we see that protection, at least in this case, is one thing, and practice quite another.

Mr. Chairman, this tax on wines and silks is a blow struck directly at the South—at the cotton and tobacco growing States. By the treaty of Paris, concluded in 1831, a system of commercial reciprocity was established between the French and this country highly beneficial to both parties, and injurious to no one. Under that treaty our commerce with France, which before was comparatively limited, extended itself rapidly, and was maintained principally by the exports of Southern cotton. For a period of five years past our exports to French ports have varied, in round numbers, from eighteen millions to twenty millions per annum, of which the exports of cotton alone amounted to between thirteen and seventeen millions annually, the balance being of tobacco and rice. Now, instead of sending back to us, as the English do, the greater part of this cotton, in wrought goods, and thus saddling us as consumers with all the intermediate expenses accruing on the commodity from its production to its consumption, the French return to us only about one million of cotton manufactures annually, nearly the whole balance being paid to us in silks and wines. They then consume among themselves, one year with another, an average of quite fifteen millions of Southern cotton, to say nothing of rice and tobacco, for which, as I said before, they pay us with their silks and wines. Now, put a tax of 20 per cent. on these articles, and couple with it, as you must, if you maintain the compromise act, cash duties and a home valuation, and what do you effect? Why, you close up this outlet for our cotton by taxing, almost to prohibition, the very articles with which alone the French can pay us for our raw material. What further do you effect? Why, you throw back annually upon the hands of the planters $15,000,000 worth of their cotton. France cannot buy it; England is supplied without it, and, moreover, is preparing to grow her own cotton; you have stifled the foreign market by your legislation, and the Northern weaver steps in and buys it at five or six cents per pound. A propitious state of affairs for the farmer! But, notwithstanding, my colleague is willing, not only to maintain the compromise, but to tax wines and silks, at the suggestion of one of the rankest tariff men in this House.

Again, sir, in proportion as you depress the commerce of France, the friend and supporter of our colonial struggles for liberty and a national existence, you elevate that of Great Britain. These two nations are the only great rivals for our trade; and while I would extend the principles of free trade, upon the broad ground of justice and equality, to our Saxon forefathers, I would certainly do nothing to swell her commercial importance over the just claims of our first friend and ancient ally. England at this moment is pervading the whole earth. She is stretching her grasping and powerful arm over the four quarters of the globe. Europe, Asia, Africa, and America are the objects of her towering and insatiate ambition. She has colonized India; she is pushing her trade with the Celestial Empire "by the grace of God and gunpowder;" she is dictating terms to belligerent thrones and rebellious viceroys; she is openly attempting to dismember one of the sovereign States of this Union, and she is silently erecting her standard upon our territory at the mouth of the Oregon. Nay, sir, pretending to suppress the slave trade on the coast of Africa, she has recently boarded and searched, under circumstances of insult and aggravation, an American merchantman, bearing "the broad stripes and proud stars" of these independent and United States. Her Minister near this Government has recently avouched the act of a British subject which resulted in the destruction of the lives and property, within our own limits, of the citizens of New York. With these facts staring us in the face, with this long account unsettled between us and this marauding power, is there an American statesman on this floor who is ready to lend our legislation, however indirectly, to British interests, at the expense not only of our own people, but of the French nation, our old and well tried friends? Sir, I address myself to the South; England has taken her stand in the ranks of the Abolitionists; the proceedings of the World's Convention in London, at which Prince Albert, the personal representative of the Queen, presided, are proof sufficient for us that she waits but a time and an opportunity to invade our rights, and rob us of our property. The English are making strenuous efforts to supplant the great staple of the South by settling cotton plantations in the East Indies—if she succeeds she will glut her own markets with her own produce, and the main source of our wealth and prosperity will be forever closed up. She is thus grasping directly at our slaves—if she fails in the open attempt, she is still endeavoring secretly and insidiously to destroy the value of our property by taking away from us the foreign market for our staple production. Are the countrymen of La Fayette engaged in such a crusade against us? Shall we deal a blow at the Southern people, by striking at their commerce with France, when the comparison stands, as I have stated it, between that Government and England? Let my constituents consult their rights and interests, and then answer these questions. I ask no legislation in behalf of France; I only claim that our trade with that country be let alone—that my constituents may be allowed to send the produce of their labor where and to whom they please. This they will do, and you had better save your credit and our rights by conceding what, in a certain event, we will take, by the help of "the great conservative principle."

Mr. Chairman, I may not repeat the identical words of my colleague, but the substance of what he said about the TARIFF will long be remembered by me. It was noticed by every one around me, particularly by the Democrats, as a most extraordinary speech for a Southern man to make any where, but more especially in the presence of tariff men, and Northern manufacturers. I never heard a speech more thoroughly imbued, in my opinion, with the principles of protection and discrimination, than the remarks of that gentleman as they were delivered to this House. How they will appear on paper, I cannot say—I only speak of my impression from what I heard. He said substantially, if not in hec verba, that formerly the people of Georgia were rabid on the tariff question—that it had been a mad-dog cry among us. He remembered the time when any man who ventured to speak in favor of a tariff would be withered by the indignation of the people of Georgia; but, said he, that day has past, "thanks to the events of the last summer!" Now the intelligence of his constituents enabled them to think and speak calmly upon that subject." Ah! the events of the last summer—have they wrought this marvellous "change?" Have the events of the last summer cast an oblivion on the old antipathies of the people of Georgia? Sir, in the name of the people of that State, I deny the assertion, and all the deductions that may be drawn therefrom. What changes those events may have made in the gentleman, I cannot divine; but this much I can say, that, from present appearances, he has not only lost his old horror of a tariff, but he has ventured to walk boldly up to the monster. He can now look it coolly and calmly in the face; nay, he even dares to touch and handle it without any apparent concern. Ere long, sir, he may have "his foot in the stirrup and his hand on the mane." Well, that honorable gentleman certainly has a right to mount what hobby he pleases—provided he rides in his individual capacity; but in his official character I protest against the course he has thought proper to pursue. At this critical juncture, when every thing is portentous of "change;" when we have an evidence of change before us in the speech I have just adverted to, it behoves no man from Georgia to be silent. Where are my colleagues? They are shortly to be my representatives, and I have a right, as it is my interest, to know their present position upon all the great questions (particularly on the tariff question) which have been agitated in this debate. I therefore invite them to come out—to speak plainly and openly, and quiet the hopes and fears of those whose interests are confided to their hands.

Upon the tariff question, the people whom I represent "are now where they ever have been, and where they ever mean to be." If luxuries are to be taxed let it be done indiscriminately, and if any change is to be made in our revenue laws, let all the imports of this country be taxed equally—no discrimination—no protection. If any imports must be admitted duty free, let the sugar, salt, iron, molasses, coarse woollens and coarse cottons—the absolute necessities of life, be relieved, and let the revenue raised be sufficient only for an economical administration of the Government. With this sort of a tariff, and with no other, (notwithstanding the events of the last summer) will the people of Georgia be satisfied. If they supported General Harrison, and inadvertently brought certain of his friends into power, they assuredly did not do so with the remotest expectation that a protective discriminating tariff, either open, or disguised as a tax on luxuries, was to be fastened on them. And when they find that such a result is likely to follow "the events of the last summer," another "change" may come over the spirit of my colleague's dream.

Mr. Chairman, I have no vain regrets for the past; but let us look to the future, and watch closely the shadows which ever precede coming events. Precaution is the safeguard of our rights and liberties; in this spirit only, as one of the people, and as a representative of the people, I sound the alarm. In doing so, I have done my duty; and come what may of it, I shall always be consoled by the recollection that I have suffered no personal feelings to deter me from my post when I had nought to face but a victorious and overwhelming enemy.

SPEECH OF MR. BLACK,

OF GEORGIA.

In the House of Representatives, February 9, 1841—

In Committee of the Whole (in reply to Mr. GIDDINGS of Ohio,) on the Pension bill, and the amendment thereto appropriating $100,000 for removal of the Indians from Florida.

Mr. BLACK addressed the Committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I had hoped to be permitted to devote myself peaceably and quietly to the performance of my official duties during the short period of time that remains of my public service. I did not expect, when I concluded my speech a few days since on the Treasury Note bill, to be called up so soon to defend my constituents against a most wanton and outrageous attack. I did not dream there was a man on this floor who would dare to advance, in the face of an American Congress, and in the presence of my colleagues, charges so false and calumnious as those which were deliberately uttered in this House, yesterday, against the people of Georgia, by the member from Ohio. For three long hours did that member [Mr. GIDDINGS] impose himself upon your unwilling ear, in the delivery of a violent, inflammatory, Abolition speech, in which he distinctly charged the infamous crime of negro stealing upon the people whom I represent. Abolition, anti-slavery, human rights, the oppressed African, Florida blood hounds, and all the miserable cant which makes up the sum total of a modern philanthropist, were the chief theme and burden of his song. Upon a bill providing a scanty subsistence for the feeble and suffering remnant of our Revolutionary soldiers, this crafty and daring Abolitionist, in defiance of the 21st rule of the House, and of all parliamentary order, has managed to ingraft an open and violent attack upon the institutions of the South. What availed it, Mr. Chairman, when I stopped him and told him that his assertions were palpable falsehoods? Why, sir, it passed him as the idle wind; and although my colleague [Mr. HABERSHAM,] my friend from South Carolina, [Colonel CAMPBELL,] and myself, repeatedly called him to order, he was as repeatedly pronounced to be in order by the Chair. I do not make this allusion to question the decision of the Chair, for so long as he refrained from actually presenting an Abolition petition, he certainly did not violate the letter of the rule, which prohibits their reception; and as for "relevancy of debate," that has long since been banished from this hall. I only desire to remind you and the committee that Southern gentlemen had no agency in pushing this exciting topic into the House. So far from it, we did every thing in our power, short of violence and indecorum, to arrest the incendiary harangue, which we foresaw must end in excitement and reply.

Sir, said Mr. BLACK, we committed an egregious error in the outset, by permitting the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to propose an amendment to a pension bill, by tacking to it a measure which, in my opinion, is nothing less than an acknowledgment of our inability to whip the Indians out of Florida. I will vote for no $100,000 to buy up our peace from the Seminole warriors. I am willing and anxious to do every thing which comports with the honor and dignity of this Government, for the relief of the suffering people of that doomed Territory. If the money is wanted to redouble your forces—if I could be assured it would be expended in exterminating these savage hell hounds from that ill-fated land, and in offering them up as a sacrifice to appease the blood which cries aloud from every hearth stone in Florida, I would freely and joyfully give it. But I would sooner see the whole Territory abandoned by its inhabitants, and sunk in the Atlantic ocean, than vote one dollar to propitiate those whom we ought to conquer.

Whatever, sir, we may think of this proposition, we committed an error by receiving it, in the first place, which you cannot now retrieve without doing injustice to those whose rights have been assailed, and to it we are indebted for this insulting and wanton attack. Under cover of this irrelevant amendment, the Abolitionist has walked abroad with a blazing torch in his hand, ready to light up the path of "human rights" by the conflagration of our peaceful dwellings. I have no idea that the gentleman from South Carolina anticipated such a result; from that suspicion I wholly discharge him. What human intelligence could have foreseen that an Abolition speech could be made upon a proposition to vote money to remove the Indians? And yet it has been done. The member from Ohio has managed, in defiance of the feelings of the CHAIR and the House, to go on his way rejoicing in his love for the negro, and his hatred for the white man. He was not content with innuendoes and vague declamation about the rights of the enslaved African—he pointed directly at the people of Florida and Georgia—he particularized transactions, and alluded to citizens of Georgia as actors in them; and then, in close connection with those allusions, he descanted upon the crime of "negro stealing" in such a way as to leave no doubt of the application he would make of his slanderous charge. Sir, I understood him; every man in this House understood him. It was too plain to be concealed—nay, he took no pains to conceal it—that his speech, which he says was prepared long since, was intended as a regular, systematic attack upon slavery and the slaveholder; and all this he built up on his postulate that "negro stealing" was the prime cause of the Florida war. I cannot sit still under such a speech; I cannot permit any man even to allude, with impunity, to my constituents, or any portion of them, as men who would act in derogation of the high principles of honor, morality, or religion. After the display we have had, I should be faithless to the trust reposed in my hands, if I failed to hurl back upon the slanderer the calumny he would fasten on the people of Georgia. Let other gentlemen pursue what course they please. I intend to reply to this attack in my own way. I will no longer stand upon my dignity, as we have been too much in the habit of doing when Abolition was the theme. I will no longer treat our assailants with silence and contempt. Whatever may be my opinion of the man, as an individual, I am constrained to notice him here, because he represents a population of forty thousand souls; that gives him importance; and if, as we are bound to admit until the contrary be shown, he truly represents his constituents on this subject, it is time that he should not only be noticed, but promptly repelled. Let him not mistake me: I do not mean to argue the abstract question of slavery with him, nor will I discuss the question of Southern slavery in any of its aspects. Upon that subject I have been instructed by my constituents, particularly by the intelligent and patriotic men of my own county. They have told me that their slaves were their own; that on this subject I shall hold no argument with Abolitionists; and that if one of these fanatics should dare to present himself within the limits of their county, (Scriven,) they are pledged to bring him to a speedy and condign punishment. And, sir, they are men who have never yet failed to redeem their pledges, at whatever peril. Yes, sir, if that member will go to the county where I reside, or to any other county in the State of Georgia, and dare to utter but half of what he said here yesterday, he would most certainly be subjected to the infliction of Lynch law, and he might be happy if he escaped at that.

[Mr. GIDDINGS was understood to say that he hoped never to be found among such people.]

Yes, sir, I admit that discretion in such a case would be more safe than zeal or valor; for I assure the member if he ever comes among us, and dares to utter such sentiments as he delivered on this floor, we would give him an elevation of which he little dreams. Now let him put that down in his book, and tell it at his "indignation meetings" when he goes home.

When we decline to argue the question of "Southern slavery" on this floor, it is not because we are afraid of the discussion. We feel and know that we are fortified on that subject not only by the practice and example of the world, but by the precepts of Divine law. But will a man stop to argue with an incendiary who is about to stick a lighted torch to his dwelling? Will you waste words in a dissertation on justice and honesty when the thief has his hand in your pocket? Besides, we are tired of all this talk; it is sickening and disgusting to those whom it does not inflame. I say to this member, whose fellow-feeling makes him so wondrous kind to the negro—Cease your petitioning for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade, against the admission of Florida, and the annexation of Texas. Waste no more words, and if you really think you can effect your darling purpose of robbing us of our property, come and try it. We do not seek it, but we are ready for the conflict. We will not meet you then with "paper bullets of the brain," but we will give you a reception that shall touch your feelings, and in that way we will convince your judgment much more effectually than any argument we could address to your intelligence here.

But, Mr. chairman, while I will not argue the "abstract question," I will meet the member on his own ground. I will no longer content myself with a mere defence; I will carry the war into Africa, and charge our invaders in their own camp. Yes, sir, I will show from extracts, which I shall presently read from a pamphlet written by the Abolitionist, Jay, that these tender hearted, canting philanthropists, who come here and whine so piteously over the "down trodden slave," are the veriest hypocrites on the face of the earth—that the claims and professions which they are eternally ringing in our ears in behalf of the negro, on this floor and in their newspapers, are as far different from their own practices at home as the poles are asunder. I will show that they say one thing and do another. I will show that while they claim of us to liberate our slaves and give them all the rights, privileges and liberties of freemen, instead of practising their precepts at home themselves, they actually deny to their negroes, whom they have nominally freed, all the "human rights" about which they talk so feelingly to us. And this I will prove from their own record.

I have nothing to say to those gentlemen on this floor and elsewhere, who let us and ours alone—who do not disturb the peace of the country by agitating the subject of abolition—and who keep their opinions to themselves, and recognise our constitutional right to our slaves. They are guilty of no false professions, at least so far as we are concerned; nor do they make any extravagant claims on us. They have nothing to do with slavery here, nor do they meddle with it in the South, nor do they insult Southern gentlemen by abusing and vilifying their constituents as kidnappers, and dealers in human flesh and blood. With their professions and practice I have nothing to do. I will not even utter an opinion as to the propriety or impropriety of their treatment of the negroes resident among them. That is their own matter, so long as they do not interfere with our practices and domestic institutions. It is only to those who would override the Constitution of the country, who would invade our rights of property, and who would compel us to elevate our slaves to the condition and privileges of freemen, that I read these extracts, to prove the INCONSISTENCY between their professions, their claims on us, and their practices at home. Let me not be told that the anti-Abolitionists at the North have the power, and are answerable for this treatment of the negroes among them. I hold them to no answer: that portion of our Northern brethren have not exposed themselves to be questioned on the subject; they have not laid themselves liable to be charged by me with INCONSISTENCY—because they repudiate, publicly and privately, all interference with the concerns of the South in this regard; besides, it is not the fact that the anti-Abolitionists control public opinion and the "customs of society" in all the towns and districts of the North and East. And as for the power of majorities, I ask, where is the power of the vast majorities that returned, not only the member from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] but his fellow laborer from Vermont, [Mr. SLADE,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JAMES,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and many other ho-noble members to whom I could point on this floor. If you say the Abolitionists are not to blame for the treatment of negroes in the non-slaveholding States, because they are a minority, I ask again, where slumbers the power of these majorities to which I have pointed? If their majorities do not extend over the States where they exist, at least they extend over the Congressional districts from which these gentlemen are returned; and if they cannot control the legislation of the whole State, they certainly are competent to model their own society, and give a tone and direction to public opinion within the limits of their private circles, which are sufficiently wide to afford an asylum for their favorite and oppressed people. Many, nay most of the oppressions of which this abolition author complains, are wholly independent of legislation, and depend entirely upon public opinion in their counties and towns, and upon the "customs of society." On the other hand let no man suppose that I complain of this treatment of the negro. No, sir, it is not my business to interfere in that matter at all; I only seize on the fact as it stands stated by an Abolitionist, and hold it up in contrast with their claims on the South, and their professions. The only complaint I have against these fanatics is, not their relations with their own negroes, but their presumptuous attempts to interfere in our domestic relations. They might treat their own negroes as they please—free or enslave them, elevate or oppress them, and we should never open our mouths about it; but when they volunteer to regulate our conduct to our slaves, they give me a right, which I shall exercise, of exhibiting them as men who have neither principle nor consistency, as men who are willing and anxious to impose on their neighbors, that which they will not take practically to themselves. It is to these violent abolition crusaders, then, who have the power in their own neighborhoods to elevate the condition of their negroes, and who are in the habit of taunting the South with slavery, and to no one else, that I make the charge of INCONSISTENCY and HYPOCRISY. And for that purpose, with the permission of the House, I will proceed to read, from a pamphlet written by Mr. Jay.

The author classes the disabilities of the free negroes in the non-slaveholding States under ten heads: 1st. "EXCLUSION FROM THE ELECTIVE FRANCHISE." 2d. DENIAL OF THE RIGHT OF LOCOMOTION. 3d. DENIAL OF THE RIGHT OF PETITION. 4th. EXCLUSION FROM THE ARMY AND MILITIA. 5th. EXCLUSION FROM ALL PARTICIPATION IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE. 6th. IMPEDIMENTS TO EDUCATION. 7th. IMPEDIMENTS TO RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION. 8th. IMPEDIMENTS TO HONEST INDUSTRY. 9th. LIABILITY TO BE SEIZED AND TREATED AS SLAVES. 10th. SUBJECTS TO INSULT AND OUTRAGE. It is worthy of remark that Mr. Jay charges and attributes, all these exclusions, impediments and liabilities, to the Abolitionists themselves; constantly using in the course of his remarks the pronouns "we" and "our." He an Abolitionist, writing to Abolitionists, charges himself and his co-laborers with what, in his eye, is a crying sin, and to my apprehension is glaring inconsistency, and consummate hypocrisy.

He says in his prefatory remarks, speaking of prejudice against color:

"Were we to inquire into the geography of this prejudice, we should find that the localities in which it attains its rankiest luxuriance, are not the rice swamps of Georgia, nor the sugar fields of Louisiana, but the hills and valleys of New England, and the prairies of Ohio? It is a fact of acknowledged notoriety, that however severe may be the laws against colored people at the South, the prejudice against their persons is far weaker than among ourselves."

"We turn to the free States, where slavery has not directly steeled our hearts against human suffering, and where no supposed danger of insurrection affords a pretext for keeping the free blacks in ignorance and degradation; and we ask, what is the character of the prejudice against color here? Let the Rev. Mr. Bacon, of Connecticut, answer the question. This gentleman, in a vindication of the Colonization Society, assures us, 'The Soondra is not farther separated from the Brahmin in regard to his privileges, civil, in electoral, and moral, than the negro from the white man by the prejudices which result from the difference made between them by the God of NATURE.'"

If we are to believe Mr. Jay, the member from Ohio and all his fellow-laborers entertain a deep-rooted, implacable "prejudice against color," and yet he would impose on us the very thing he so strenuously rejects. What even-handed justice!

Now, let us see how these advocates of "human rights" practise on the right of suffrage. The author proceeds:

1. GENERAL EXCLUSION FROM THE ELECTIVE FRANCHISE. "Were this exclusion founded on the want of property, or any other qualification deemed essential to the judicious exercise of the franchise, it would afford no just cause of complaint; but it is founded solely on the color of the skin, and is therefore irrational and unjust. That taxation and representation should be inseparable, was one of the axioms of the fathers of our Revolution; and one of the reasons they assigned for their revolt from the crown of Britain. But now, it is deemed a mark of fanaticism to complain of the disfranchisement of a whole race, while they remain subject to the burden of taxation. It is worthy of remark, that of the thirteen original States, only two were so recreant to the principles of the Revolution, as to make a white skin a qualification for suffrage. But the prejudice has grown with our growth, and strengthened with our strength, and it is believed that in every State Constitution subsequently formed or revised, [excepting those of Vermont and Maine, and the revised Constitution of Massachusetts,] the crime of a dark complexion has been punished, by debarring its possessor from all approach to the ballot-box. The necessary effect of this proscription in aggravating the oppression and degradation of the colored inhabitants, must be obvious to all who call to mind the solicitude manifested by demagogues, and office seekers, and law makers, to propitiate the good will of all who have votes to bestow."

2. DENIAL OF THE RIGHT OF LOCOMOTION.

"The Connecticut Black Act, prohibiting, under heavy penalties, the introduction of any colored person from another State, is well known."

This law the author says was repealed after being suffered to remain on the statute book for many years; but he complains loudly of an Ohio law, (in the enactment of which perhaps the gentleman participated,) "intended to prevent colored citizens of other States from removing into Ohio," unless they "find within twenty days two freehold sureties in the sum of five hundred dollars for their good behavior, and likewise for their maintenance," and in default thereof he is to be removed by the overseers of the poor; and if any person "harbors" emigrants who have not complied with the above requisitions, he or she is subjected to a heavy pecuniary penalty, and made liable for the future maintenance of the "negroes or mulattoes."

"In 1829, a very general effort was made to enforce this law, and about one thousand free blacks were in consequence of it driven out of the State, and sought a refuge in the more free and Christian country of Canada. Previous to their departure, they sent a deputation to the Governor of the Upper Province of Canada, to know if they would be admitted, and received from Sir Jas. Colebrook this reply: 'Tell the Republicans on your side of the line, that we Royalists do not know men by their color. Should you come to us, you will be entitled to all the privileges of the rest of his Majesty's subjects.' This was the origin of the Wilberforce colony in Upper Canada."

"We have before us an Ohio paper, containing a proclamation by John S. Wiles, overseer of the poor in the town of Fairfield, dated 12th March, 1833. In this instrument notice is given to all 'black or mulatto persons,' residing in Fairfield, to comply with the requisitions of the act of 1807 within twenty days, or the law would be enforced against them. The proclamation also addresses the white inhabitants of Fairfield in the following terms: 'Whites look out! If any person or persons employing any black or mulatto person, contrary to the 3d section of the above law, you may look out for the breakers.'"

Sir (said Mr. BLACK) let us see what these "human rights" gentlemen think of the right of petition in their own country, and then we shall be better able to estimate their sincerity, and the purity of their motives, when they undertake to lecture us for "keeping human beings in bondage." This right of petitioning for the liberation of the slave was the theme of many glorious declamations on this floor last winter, and thousands of dollars of the public money were spent in giving these gentlemen an opportunity to harangue us on the subject, and to slip in every now and then an insult to the South. (Here the Chairman, Mr. CLIFFORD, pronounced that it was not in order to discuss the right of petition.) Mr. BLACK said: I do not intend to discuss the right of petition—I only desire to refer to the practice of gentlemen in contrast with their avowed sentiments on this floor, and this I think I have a right to do, especially as the Chair allowed the member from Ohio to take so wide a latitude of debate as he did yesterday. The Chairman insisting on the order, Mr. BLACK said he would not consume the time of the committee by appealing from the decision of the Chair, but he gave notice he should make the extract in his printed speech.

3d. "DENIAL OF THE RIGHT OF PETITION."

"On the 14th of January, 1839, a petition for relief from certain legal disabilities, from colored inhabitants of Ohio, was presented to the popular branch of the legislature, and its rejection was moved by George H. Flood. This rejection was not a denial of the prayer, but an expulsion of the petition itself, as an intruder into the House. 'The question presented for our decision,' said one of the members, 'is simply this: Shall human beings, who are bound by every enactment upon our statute book, be permitted to request the Legislature to modify or soften the laws under which they live?' To the Grand Sultan, crowded with petitions as he traverses the streets of Constantinople, such a question would seem most strange; but American Democrats can exert a tyranny over men who have no votes, utterly unknown to Turkish despotism. Mr. Flood's motion was lost by a majority of only four votes; but this triumph of humanity and Republicanism was as transient as it was meagre. The next day the House, by a large majority, resolved that the blacks and mulattoes who may be residents within this State, have no constitutional right to present their petitions to the General Assembly for any purpose whatsoever, and that any reception of such petitions on the part of the General Assembly is a mere act of privilege or policy, and not imposed by any expressed or implied power of the Constitution."

Why, sir, this is the language we hold—that blacks and mulattoes have no right to present their petitions to the General Assembly—for the holding of which we have been subjected to unmeasured vituperation and abuse by the very men who practically adopt our views.

4th. "EXCLUSION FROM THE ARMY AND MILITIA. 'To such an absurd extent is this prejudice against color carried, that some of our military companies have refused to march to the sound of a drum when beaten by a black man.'"

This is going a little ahead of the South, for although a colored man never thinks of entering our "ranks," we very seldom have any body else to beat our drums but negroes. But the liberty-loving member from Ohio, it seems, will not march to the sound of a drum when beaten by his favorite part of creation, a black man!

5th. "EXCLUSION FROM PARTICIPATION IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE."

"But by the law, while any unknown white vagrant may be a witness in any case whatever, no black suitor is permitted to offer a witness of his own color, however well established may be his character for intelligence and veracity, to prove his rights or his wrongs; and hence, in a multitude of cases, justice is denied in despite of the Constitution; and why denied? Solely from a foolish and wicked prejudice against color."

6th. "IMPEDIMENTS TO EDUCATION."

After relating an amusing and edifying instance of the destruction of a school house in Canaan, New Hampshire, upon the ground that it was to be devoted to the use, indiscriminately, of blacks and whites, (200 oxen were hitched to it, and it was dragged a quarter of a mile, and left in ruins,) the author says:

"The transaction we have narrated, expressed in emphatic terms the deep and settled hostility felt in the free States to the education of the blacks. The prejudices of the community render that hostility generally effective, without the aid of legal enactments."

Now, sir, if I had been present at the abatement of this universal school house, I think it probable I should have taken a hand in it myself. But where were the Abolitionists? They were strong enough to build the house and establish the school. Why did they not defend it? Did they slink away from their premises at the first breath of opposition? Mr. Jay says not one word of any attempt on their part to regenerate public opinion, or to remodel the "customs of society" in that patriotic and spirited neighborhood. They might at least have made an effort that way to save themselves from the reproach of inconsistency. They are now, and have been for years past, engaged in a crusade against the South, and in denouncing the customs of our society with regard to our alleged degradation of the negro. Ought they not to have commenced operations at their own doors first, upon the principle that charity should begin at home? We hold our "slaves" precisely where they ought to be—in subjection and obedience to their masters. They are well fed and half worked; they are tended in sickness and supported in their old age; they are instructed in the principles of Christianity, and protected from personal injury. This is the consistent and kind treatment of Southern slaves. The book I am reading shows you the treatment of negroes at the North and East, where the Abolitionists have nominally freed them.

But where is the member from Ohio? Has he abandoned his seat? Cannot he stand this shot out of his own gun? Calculating on our silent contempt, he was wonderfully bold yesterday; when he was attacking us, it was all "blood and thunder, wounds and wonder;" but now, when, contrary to his expectations, I am shooting back his own arrows at him, he retreats, and, like the Seminole, is not to be found. Let him come back, sir, for I am not done with him yet.

After showing the IMPEDIMENTS to the RELIGIOUS instruction of the negro among the Abolitionists, the author adds,

8th. THE IMPEDIMENTS TO HONEST INDUSTRY; and, among other instances, declares that—

"In 1833, a black man, of irreproachable character, and who by his industry and frugality had accumulated several thousand dollars, made application in the city of New York for a carman's license, and was refused solely and avowedly on account of his complexion!"

We are next told that these free negroes are "LIABLE TO BE SEIZED AND TREATED AS SLAVES" by the Abolitionists; and then this evidence of the insincerity and hypocrisy of these pretended friends of human rights is closed by showing how they habitually "subject" the negroes among them to "insult and outrage."

"The feelings of the community towards these people, and the contempt with which they are treated, are indicated by the following notice, lately published by the proprietor of a menagerie, in New York: The proprietors wish it to be understood, that people of color are not permitted to enter, except when in attendance upon children and families."

[When these extracts were being read, much confusion and excitement prevailed in the House. Mr. BLACK was frequently interrupted, and called to order, but was at length permitted to go on in order.]

Sir, (said Mr. B.) I am nearly through. I have other evidences of Abolition insincerity which, however, I will not now submit. We all remember the Amistad negroes. I shall not stop to inquire whether they were "bozals" or "ladinos;" we have had a sufficiency of philological dissertation and learned twaddle upon that grave subject already. But I can show, by his own confessions, that the celebrated "Jingua," the chief of these rascally mutineers, who have their advocates, at least in words, not only at the North, but on this floor—that Jingua himself, about whose abduction and enslavement we are so feelingly harangued, was, in his own country, a slave-catcher and dealer, and that he has only had the tables turned upon him by some more successful trader. But, as it will be out of order, I will omit it here, and put it into my printed speech. During the trial of these Spanish slaves in the United States District Court for Connecticut, where they were claiming their freedom—

"Mr. Ingersoll, Clerk of the United States District Court, rose to make a suggestion, it appearing that he also appears on behalf of the libelants. The court said Mr. Wilcox would be allowed to state what Covey had said to him when he first saw these Africans. The Marshal proceeded to say that he called Covey and Jingua aside, soon after the former arrived, and told him to ask Jingua how he came to be taken and sold. Covey asked him. Jingua replied that he owed a man two pounds, (holding up his fingers,) and to pay him he had taken two negroes and sold them; that one of them ran away and the man called upon him for one pound. He had no other negro, and turned him out clothing—that the clothing was turned over to another person, and that the man called on him to pay, and being unable to do so, he was seized and sold to pay the debt."

Sir, said Mr. B. those gentlemen who have been so solicitous to keep me in order, shall have another opportunity presently of exerting their rules of decorum. I intend to read from a book, a few of the detached leaves of which I hold in my hand. It is an ancient, venerable, and venerated book—the oldest, perhaps, since the Christian era, and the wisest and best that the world has ever known—I mean, sir, the BIBLE itself. Now, let gentlemen call me to order with the Bible in my hand, for I intend to become personal to the member from Ohio (whom I see now in his seat) and his coadjutors, by applying to him a passage from that book. I read, sir, (if it be not out of order and indecorous to read the Bible to an Abolitionist,) from the 7th CHAPTER of the GOSPEL according to the holy SAINT MATTHEW—1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th verses:

"1st. JUDGE NOT THAT YE BE NOT JUDGED.

"2d. FOR WITH WHAT JUDGMENT YE JUDGE, YE SHALL BE JUDGED; AND WITH WHAT MEASURE YE MEASURE, IT SHALL BE MEASURED TO YOU AGAIN.

"3d. AND WHY BEHOLDEST THOU THE MOTE THAT IS IN THY BROTHER'S EYE, BUT CONSIDEREST NOT THE BEAM THAT IS IN THINE OWN EYE?

"4th. OR WILT THOU SAY TO THY BROTHER, LET ME PULL OUT THE MOTE OUT OF THINE EYE, AND BEHOLD A BEAM IS IN THINE OWN EYE?

"5th. THOU HYPOCRITE, (pointing to Mr. GIDDINGS,) FIRST CAST OUT THE BEAM OUT OF THINE OWN EYE; AND THEN SHALT THOU SEE CLEARLY TO CAST OUT THE MOTE OUT OF THY BROTHER'S EYE."

You say that we have a mote in our eye: I deny it. My constituents have no mote in their eye upon this, or any other subject. Therefore the text is not applicable to us, but to you; and if you will insist that we have this mote in our eye, I say to you in the language of Scripture: "THOU HYPOCRITE," first cast out the beam from thine own eye, before you attempt to run your fingers into ours.

PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. LINN, OF MISSOURI,

In Senate, Friday, January 29, 1841.—On Mr. CRITTENDEN's amendment to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States.

Mr. LINN addressed the Senate as follows:

"MR. PRESIDENT: As this seems to be a day of general settlement of accounts and misunderstandings, I desire to say a few words in order to prevent the possibility of any mistake in regard to my course on the important question now before the Senate. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] was in an error when saying that I had remarked, that under no state of things that could present themselves, would I vote for the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] to cede, under certain conditions, the public lands to the States in which they lie.

Now, sir, I have never committed myself thus far against cession, although determined to vote against it when presented as an amendment to the pre-emption bill. But more am I opposed, and decidedly opposed, to the gentleman's [Mr. CLAY] well known proposition for distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among all the States. I will watch, sir, all these different propositions with care and deep interest when they come up as naked questions, and give my vote according to the dictates of my judgment, and the interest of my constituents. Having voted for one distribution bill already, sir, I think it more than probable it shall be the last—events since that time, not very clearly proving its wisdom. When my friend from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] moved his amendment or resolutions of instructions to the Committee on Public Lands to report a bill, one feature of which should be the distribution principle, I promptly and instantly rose in my place and remarked that I would move an amendment at the proper time to his resolutions, to dispose of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands for the benefit of the whole country, by appropriating them to the increase of the navy, to the fortifications, and other national defences; for it was my opinion that if they were to be taken from the common fund of the Union, that they should be devoted to high and important national objects, to which I think they justly and properly belong; and should the Senator's [Mr. CRITTENDEN] proposition prevail, it is my fixed determination then to present mine, and press it with all the zeal, energy, and ability, in my power to command.

I do not know, sir, how far a member can go in condemning or characterizing measures, and still not be personal to the mover. There is some delicacy due to others, and some limits, or ought to be, to the use of epithets, which, although applied to measures, were made often to stick to persons.

The honorable member from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] this morning, in the course of debate, thought proper to speak of the resolutions against the assumption of State debts, and for which I voted, as wanton, cruel, Danton and Robespierre like, and even traitorous to the States. I should be very sorry to use such epithets, to mark the character of the proposition to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. But if such epithets and appellations were strictly in order, without meaning any thing personal to an individual, or disrespectful to the Senate, I would be glad to be informed of it, so that I may avoid a breach of order; nor do I wish such information for self-protection against violent or harsh language, for the man that can give harder blows in that respect is welcome to all the advantages he can gain; but this body of grave men should be the last to resort to denunciatory language, and even on this occasion, when there might be some justification for it, I will not resort to harsh words to mark with disapprobation the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] to distribute the proceeds of the public lands, although presented at a time when the Treasury is empty, and when the aspect of affairs was warlike and threatening on every hand. I know, sir, this is a favorite project of the Senator from Kentucky, and the pivot upon which many political events will be made to turn, and that to sustain it he would strain every energy of his soul; but, in my opinion, this is the last moment in our history that a proposition should be made to alienate any portion of our revenues. Rather, sir, increase them for great national objects.

Mr. President, did not my colleague, a few days since, in the most solemn and impressive manner, say that he would not at this moment permit himself to speak as he thought of the dangers that at present environed us?

I know him, sir, to be one of the bravest men that God ever made, and it may seem something like vanity and presumption in me to say any thing on this subject after such a declaration. But, sir, I must and will speak out now, as heretofore, and warn the country of its danger and defenceless condition. I feel it a solemn and imperious duty to do so. Look for a moment at our condition. Why, you know well that a few years since there were not men enough in garrison in New York or some other large Atlantic city to fire a national salute on the arrival of a French vessel of war in their harbor! Yet a strenuous opposition was then made to the increase of your army; and small enough it is now, after being doubled by the act of 1833. Examine into the state of the English navy; but the following letter from our Navy Department will show it at a glance:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, 18th January, 1840.
SIR: I have the honor to state, in reply to the inquiries contained in your letter of the 12th instant, that in consulting the British Navy Register, it is found that Great Britain had built and building in 1840, 125 ships of the line, 113 frigates, 53 steamers of war, and 287 sloops and smaller vessels; there were also twenty-five mail steamboat packets. It is known that several very large private steamers are all ready, and were about to be employed in transporting the mail from England to other quarters of the globe, but the precise number is not ascertained. By the latest information respecting the number of our Government vessels, it appears they had in 1838, 49 ships of the line, 60 frigates, 30 steamers, and 184 sloops and smaller vessels built and building; and they contemplate increasing the number of steamers to 40 soon. It is not supposed that many of the French passage steamers would form very efficient vessels of war.

I am, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
Hon. L. F. LINN,
United States Senate.

J. K. PAULDING,

Fifty-three steamships of war, and some of them of the largest class, and it is in her power to bring one hundred on our coast, as she can, in a very short period of time, convert all her steam packets into ships of war, they being built under that stipulation with the Government. And what man, knowing the state of our relations with that power, and the excited state of feeling along the borders of Maine, and the whole Northern frontier, would dare assert, in his place here, that there was not momentary danger of collision with Great Britain. No member of this body could have the hardihood to deny that, if the soldiery of England were to shoot down half a dozen of the citizens of Maine, war would not be inevitable. It would be as certain as that the Almighty rules the heavens and the earth. No man can permit himself to deny it, however much he may deprecate it, or close his eyes to the conviction; and such a war as it will be, never to end till we are subdued, or they expelled from this continent. Yet, sir, with these dangers staring us full in the face, we are quarrelling about giving away the treasure of these United States!

Look at the red fiery wall which this Government has built up of fierce Indian warriors along your defenceless Western frontier. Turn your eyes to the Gulf of Mexico; thence to the island of Jamaica over which hangs a dense black cloud of danger, which, in due time, will roll itself along our Southern coasts and from its murky folds scatter pestilence and death! to the mouth of that noble river, the Mississippi, which floats on its bosom to the ocean, the rich productions of the magnificent valley of the West. Consider the state of your navy. Thirty millions of dollars would scarcely be sufficient to put it in a condition to defend our coasts, or twenty millions to place it on a respectable footing. Examine for a moment the state of your defences along the line of the Atlantic from Maine to the Mississippi and Sabine rivers, and say if they do not demand prompt attention and care, and yet we are now called upon to distribute five millions annually among the States of the Union!

The Constitution of our common country calls upon us to provide for the common defence and general welfare; this was one of the principal arguments urged in favor its adoption to protect our interests abroad; and to defend the country against foreign aggression. Now is the accepted time to fulfil these great and paramount obligations. We cannot evade, we dare not postpone, without being faithless to the noble trust reposed in us by our constituents; we have had one distribution, and that is sufficient for me. No, sir, I mistake; it was honestly intended, as far as my action was concerned, to be a deposit of our money with the States for safekeeping, rather than permit banks to speculate on it, and flood the country with their paper. But it seems I was behind the age, and it was, and is, considered as a debt we owed, the last instalment of which is to be paid by the passage of a bill (if it does pass) now upon our tables. Make this other distribution, and do you suppose that it will stop at that point? Let this portion of the revenue go, and you will be called upon to yield another, and yet ANOTHER, until we shall be left powerless and helpless; and when, as a nation, we are insulted and trampled on, and our rights violated, it will be too late to call aloud upon the people to provide for the public defence. Awful then will be their vengeance upon their unfaithful servants.

I repeat it again, now is the accepted time to do our duty in providing for the common defence and general welfare. If I know the feelings that animate my bosom, so help me Heaven, if such a proposition came from the side of the Senate with which I usually act in politics, my American feeling is so strong, that I would throw to the winds all minor and party considerations, and vote, without a moment's hesitation, against it.

Read over carefully all the messages of your Presidents, from the first to the last. They all breathe the same spirit, the same language, in effect, viz: in peace, prepare for war. Examine well the reports from the War Department; ponder over the following sentiments from the Secretary at War to the Senate, in 1836:

"But it is upon our maritime frontier that we are most exposed. Our coast for three thousand miles is washed by the Ocean, which separates us from those nations who have made the highest advances in all the arts, and particularly those which minister to the operations of war, and with whom, from our intercourse and political relations, we are most liable to be drawn into collision. If this great medium of communication, the element at the same time of separation and union, interposes peculiar obstacles to the progress of hostile demonstrations, it also offers advantages which are not less obvious, and which, to be successfully resisted, require corresponding arrangements and exertions. These advantages depend on the economy and facility of transportation, on the celerity of movement, and on the power of an enemy to threaten the whole shore, spread out before him, and to select his point of attack at pleasure. A powerful hostile fleet upon the coast of the United States presents some of the features of war, where a heavy mass is brought to act against detachments, which may be cut up in detail, although their combined forces would exceed the assaulting force. Our points of exposure are so numerous and distant, that it would be impracticable to keep, at each of them, a force competent to resist the attack of an enemy, prepared by his naval ascendancy and his other arrangements, to make a sudden and vigorous inroad upon our shores. It becomes us, therefore, to inquire how the consequences of this state of things are to be best met and averted.

"The first and most obvious, and in every point of view the most proper method of defence, is an augmentation of our naval force to an extent proportioned to the resources and necessities of the nation. I do not mean the actual construction and equipment of vessels only. The number of those in service must depend on the state of the country at a given period. But I mean the collection of all such materials as may be preserved without injury, and a due encouragement of those branches of interest to the growth of a navy, and which may be properly nurtured by the Government; so that on the approach of danger, a fleet may put to sea, without delay, sufficiently powerful to meet any force which will probably be sent to our coast."

"OUR GREAT BATTLE UPON THE OCEAN IS YET TO BE FOUGHT, and we shall gain nothing by shutting our eyes to the nature of the struggle, or to the exertions we shall find it necessary to make. All our institutions are essentially pacific, and every citizen feels that his share of the common interest is affected by the derangement of business—by the enormous expense, and by the uncertain results of war. This feeling presses upon the community and the Government, and is a sure guarantee that we shall never be precipitated into a contest, nor embark in one, unless imperiously required by those considerations which leave no alternative between resistance and dishonor. Accordingly, all our history shows that we are more disposed to bear, while evils are to be borne, than to seek redress by appeals to arms. Still, however, a contest must come, and it behooves us, while we have the means and opportunity, to look forward to its attendant circumstances, and to prepare for the consequences.

"There is as little need of inquiry now into our moral as into our physical capacity to maintain a navy, and to meet upon equal terms the ships and seamen of other nations. Our extended commerce, created and created by those resources which are essential to the building and equipment of fleets, removes all doubt upon one point, and the history of our naval enterprise, from the moment when the colors were first hoisted upon the hastily prepared vessels at the commencement of our Revolutionary struggle, to the last contest in which any of our ships were engaged, is equally satisfactory upon the other. The achievements of our navy have stamped its character with the country and the world. The simple recital of its exploits is the highest eulogium which can be pronounced upon it."

Look at the recent message of the Governor of the State of Maine. He says:

"The correspondence which has recently been communicated to you by my predecessor, discloses another movement on the part of the British authorities, well calculated to arrest attention, and call forth indignant remonstrance on the part of Maine and the Union. If I am correctly informed, in a very short time after the conclusion of the agreement, by which it was in effect stipulated that the British authorities should not attempt to take military possession of what is termed by them 'the disputed territory,' during the existence of that arrangement; a detachment of her Majesty's troops was stationed at Tamiscouata lake, within that territory, and has been continued there ever since. And we are now informed that another detachment has been moved to, and stationed at, the Madawaska settlement, for the purpose of sustaining the jurisdiction and supporting the exercise of authority on the part of the British magistrates. This movement has been made by the Governor General of the British Provinces, without any prior notification or correspondence, seeking information or explanation from the authorities of this State or the United States; and assuming, as the ground of action, the report of acts and threats of individuals, without inquiring whether those assumed facts, if in any part true, were in pursuance of orders, or justified by the Government of Maine. I cannot but view this proceeding, as my predecessor does, in his reply to Sir John Harvey, as 'a direct and palpable infringement of the subsisting arrangements,' and as taking military possession of that portion of the contested territory. And if the suggestion of Lieutenant Governor Harvey, who seems not to have been consulted in relation to this new act of jurisdiction, and who evidently regards it with regret, if not as an infringement of subsisting arrangements, is disregarded, and the British troops are permanently located at Madawaska, I shall feel it my duty to reiterate the request already made to the General Government, and to urge upon that Government the justice and expediency of taking military possession, on the part of the United States, of the territory in dispute. The General Government owes it to Maine to move forward in this matter with promptness and energy, with a sincere, and even anxious, desire to preserve peace, but with an equally firm determination to maintain subsisting engagements on our part, and to insist upon a full performance from the other party. But I will not permit myself to doubt, that prudent and wise councils will prevail, and that the promised termination of pending negotiations will not be retarded or prevented by hasty and unjustifiable movements, in relation to military occupation, during the progress of the surveys and negotiations, intended or a final determination of the long vexed question.

"I would again call attention to our defenceless seaboard and frontier. I need not enlarge upon the topic, for the naked facts are the strongest arguments on the subject. As guardians of Maine, it is your right and duty to set forth our situation and our claims upon the Government; that alone has the power to place us in a proper state of defence against foreign enemies, and I have no doubt you will discharge your duty."

Turn your eyes to the state of your defences on the great lakes and their borders. On these internal seas you have neither steam nor any other vessels of war, whilst Great Britain has both, and, by the Welland canal, can concentrate any number of sloops and small craft, so as to command any and all the lakes, and strike at any point she pleases.

Whilst we have but one or two national steam vessels of war, Great Britain can command one hundred, by the conversion of her steam packets into vessels of war; and, sir, but little is risked, when I assert it as very possible for six steamships of the first class to force their way into the harbor of New York, our great commercial metropolis, bombard and demolish it, or lay it under contribution, in less than forty-eight hours from the time of the attack. Look at the state of your defences on Staten Island. Why, sir, it will take five millions of dollars to fortify properly the city of New York; and yet we are called upon to give away five millions annually of the people's money, entrusted to us for these objects, and for their use, to the States, which have surrendered to us the power and duty of protecting them against foreign assaults.

The eloquent Senator [Mr. CLAY] has told us that this was the age of peace; that there was no danger of war; that war was beginning to be considered disgraceful. I quote his sentiments, not exactly his words. I am aware, sir, of the progress of Christian and Democratic principles over the world; and that they will ultimately rule, it is my serious belief. But ages and ages must roll on before that happy and blissful period will arrive. Come it will, in the fulness of time. But to prove that this happy period has not yet arrived, see the English nation throwing its mighty power upon the far distant shores of China, and carrying destruction and death along her borders, because she will not permit her people to be poisoned by English opium.

Have we no just cause of difficulties with her? Are they not accumulating from time to time, and from the shores of the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean? Are not the causes for war more grave and serious between us than between England and China? And what security have we that she will not be down upon us for some real or fancied wrong? Her conduct to China should serve us as a useful lesson, never to be forgotten; Can we, then, say that peace will be lasting? No one will say so. Can we, as American Senators, divert from great national objects the money confided to our care for the holy purpose of our defence?

England has now in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and the Canadas, thirty thousand black and white troops, and twenty or thirty thousand Indians, our natural and hereditary enemies, who require nothing but British organization on the Western frontier to make them desperately formidable, and yet we are told there is no danger. At a time like this, and under all the circumstances, I should not have expected such a proposition, or such lulling sounds of peace, from the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] whose clarion voice, animating his fellow-citizens to battle in the cause of their beloved country during the last war still rings in my ears. He was then all alive to the honor and security of the land which had piled up honors so lavishly upon him; and he will descend to posterity with the recollections of the part he then took clustering around his memory; nor do I now wish to be understood as doubting his patriotism; it may slumber, but will never die. I may differ from the Senator on many important political points, but it is my earnest desire to be just.

The defences of our country lay close to my heart. Sir, the events preceding and during the late war made an indelible impression upon my mind. Who, that was animated by one spark of American feeling, did not witness, with indignation, the insults and the injuries heaped upon us by foreign nations, and in particular by Great Britain? Who does not, even now, feel the blush of shame mantling his cheeks, at the recollection of the facts that our vessels were stopped upon the high seas, and our fellow-citizens dragged in chains on board foreign ships of war, and frequently compelled to fight against their own countrymen? Who can remember, without shame and sorrow, the attack upon the Chesapeake, and the murder of Pierce, in our own waters, and even in the mouth of our harbor? Who cannot recall, in a moment, the burnings, murders, and scalplings, along our frontiers? But enough of this: they are not reverted to in a spirit of revenge, but the history of the past will be the history of the future, and coming events cast their shadows before them.

Yet, it is endeavored to be impressed upon us that this is an age of peace! There is no peace, sir, for this guilty, lost world of ours. Look at the conduct of England, even in the last few years—nay, months. There is scarcely a country on the globe in which she was not at work, with her death-dealing instruments, to accomplish the object she seemed to have in view—of UNIVERSAL DOMINATION. The sound of her cannon may even now be heard reverberating from the shores of the Mediterranean, from Upper India, and from China. It is impossible to deny that she is exerting her influence in our own country through many and various channels—through her literature, which finds its way to the extremest verge of the Republic, and for which I am thankful; but still it is an influence, and a most potent one, even if kept within legitimate bounds—through our language, religion, customs, manners, and laws—through the arts and sciences—but above all, through the medium of trade and navigation, by which we are almost sold to her. And, sir, it is a melancholy fact to admit, but candor compels the admission, that never, to this moment, have we entirely cast off the swaddling clothes of infancy, or the tattered garments of early colonial dependence.

Mr. President, there can be but two honest political parties in this country. The fragments must be absorbed by the great bodies; and is it saying too much that when these parties are arrayed against each other, and battling fiercely for principle and power, with nearly equal numbers, that British interests and British influence may be thrown into the scales to cause one side to preponderate? And the party in this country which approximates in opinion nearest to her political system, which advocates with zeal her interests in opposition to the interests of powers foreign to us; that party which shall exert its power and influence to secure the payment of the vast sums we owe in England at the expense of crippling vitally the General Government, will have the sympathy and all the incidental aid which can be given without seeming to interfere too openly in our domestic affairs.

The British press and British money will be put in requisition here and abroad to aid this party, and the world must judge which of the two parties in this country was most likely to obtain that aid.

And, Mr. President, I hope this can be said without meaning or asserting that the great mass of the American people have been corrupted by foreign gold. No one has said so, no one has thought so. English emissaries have heretofore penetrated into the heart of the land, and will do so again, to foment disunion; and glided along our frontier, exciting the ferocious savage to rapine and slaughter; and the World's Convention lately met in London for purposes connected with our domestic relations. She is every where insinuated among us; and upon the ocean and upon the land, she now presents the most stupendous fabric of wisdom and power that the world ever saw. Our disputes with her are ripening; they must soon be matured, and when she is ready, she will present the alternative of acquiescence to her wishes, or of war to the knife! Are you prepared for this? No, sir. Then let us be up and doing, for now is the accepted time.

In the remarks made by me on the pre-emption bill, it was my earnest desire to confine myself to its provisions and to its objects. I view it as a measure that will at this moment increase our revenues, make the heart of the poor man glad, augment our national resources by opening the wilderness and the fountains of hidden treasures, and invite emigration from abroad. I desire to see my country great, prosperous, independent, and happy; the asylum of the exiled and oppressed of all nations. I wish to see it a burning and shining light to the world. And in every vote, and in every word uttered, I will endeavor to keep these objects in view.

REMARKS OF MR. DAVIS, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In the House of Representatives, February 19, 1841—In Committee of the Whole, on the bill to extend for five years the law approved July 7, 1838, granting pensions to certain widows of officers and soldiers of the Revolution.

Mr. DAVIS addressed the committee as follows: Mr. CHAIRMAN: There seems to be some misunderstanding in the committee as to the effect of this bill now under consideration, or at least amongst some of the gentlemen who have addressed the committee on the subject. It has been stated that this bill will increase the public expenditure; and the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. JONES] informs us that it will require between two and a half and three millions of dollars for the five years. Admit this to be a fact, (said Mr. D.) of which I have no doubt, it is not an increase over your present expenditure to that amount. The bill only revives and extends the act of July 7, 1838, for the term of five years from the 4th of March next, when the present law expires. If a few pensioners or their widows should be placed on the list under the second section of this bill, it will not be equal to the diminution of the number of those now on the roll, embraced in the first section. Some gentlemen seem to be alarmed at the increase of the pension list. So far, however, from its increasing, it is decreasing daily, and agreeably to the course of nature, so far as Revolutionary officers and soldiers and their widows are concerned, it must soon cease altogether.

By referring to the returns of the Commissioner of Pensions, it will be seen that 1,505 deaths have been reported within the last year; 171 of them were widows who were pensioned under the act of July 7, 1838, now intended to be revived. It is believed that many more have died that have not been reported, because there was a balance remaining in the hands of the pension agent's undrawn on the 1st day of January last, of $561,762 28, of which sum $401,023 52 was appropriated for the payment of certain widows, embraced in the act which the first section of this bill intends to continue in force.

By referring to the several pension laws, it will be seen that, under the act of March 18, 1818, of 20,000 officers and soldiers placed on your pension list, only 7,947 are now remaining.

Under the act of June 7, 1832, the number allowed pensions was 31,868, of which only 23,207 now remain.

Of the 1,116 persons who were pensioned under the law of May 15, 1823, for the benefit of the officers and soldiers of the continental army who served during the war, only 605 are now on the rolls.

The number of widows who have received pensions under the act of July 4, 1836, is 3,468; and 2,760 of that number are still on the pension rolls, and supposed to be living.

The number of widows who have been pensioned under the act of July 7, 1838, is 5,912, and death has already reduced them to 5,586; and in a short time there will be no more of them left.

The whole number pensioned under the several acts of Congress, of officers, soldiers, and widows, is 62,374; of this number 40,105 are reported to be still on the pension roll, although it is believed that many of them are deceased, of whose deaths no notice has yet been given. From the statement it will be seen that there are about forty thousand names now on your pension roll, out of sixty two thousand; and therefore there is no cause of alarm by appending an increase of your pension list; and if it were double that number (said Mr. D.) I would still make ample provision for them.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLEY] has attempted to make this a party question, by calling on the friends of the coming Administration not to suffer themselves to be burdened with this additional expense.

[Here Mr. STANLEY rose and stated that he did not intend to make it a party question, nor did he wish his remarks to be so understood.]

Mr. DAVIS said, he had so understood the gentleman, but he would take his explanation as given. One thing he was pleased to say, that there was no party in the district that he had the honor to represent, opposed to this bill. If there ever was a law that met the universal approbation of all parties in that district, it is, said he, your laws granting pensions to the officers and soldiers of the Revolution, and to their widows, to keep them from want in their declining years.

Sir, said Mr. D. we owe to that class of our fellow-citizens a debt of gratitude that we shall never be able to pay. To the soldiers of the Revolution we are indebted for the blessings of the Government. Yes, sir, for the right to assemble in this hall, to discuss their claims; and yet gentlemen talk about dollars and cents, when such claims as these are presented for their consideration.

There are a few widows yet remaining among us, whose husbands not only fought the battles of your country, but wasted their fortunes, and injured their health in doing so. And will you, said Mr. D. now withhold from them this small pittance to keep them from suffering, during the few days that they may yet remain amongst us? An attempt has been made, said he, to make this a sectional question. But by looking over the last returns of the Commissioner of Pensions, it will be seen, however, that they are to be found in every State and Territory of the Union.

Mr. Chairman, said Mr. D. I did not rise to make a speech, but to correct what seemed to me to be an error in the minds of some members in supposing that this bill would increase your pension list, and therefore increase the public burden.

SPEECH OF MR. COOPER,

OF GEORGIA.

In the House of Representatives, February 9, 1841—

In Committee of the Whole (in reply to Mr. Giddings of Ohio) on the Pension bill, and the amendment thereto appropriating $100,000 for removal of the Indians from Florida.

After Mr. Giddings of Ohio had concluded his speech, Mr. COOPER of Georgia rose in reply, and said:

He felt himself called on by an imperious sense of duty to do what he least anticipated; and, although it had been his purpose to remain silent during the remainder of the session, he was not permitted quietly to sit and hear the people he represented—yes, his very neighbors—slandered and vilified, and the domestic institutions amidst which he had been born and educated, with which his constituents were identified, assailed and denounced as a moral pestilence, that polluted and contaminated all who were in contact with them. No, sir; I should be unfaithful to my trust, if I did not speak out, when sentiments like those of the gentleman from Ohio, and principles such as he advocated, were freely and plainly uttered in this hall, in the hearing of the American Congress—sentiments and principles unwise, imprudent, unsafe, alarming, and destructive of this Government—principles dictated by a false philanthropy, and unsupported by the laws and Constitution or by the reason and justice of the case.

During three long hours, sir, we had sat, hearing and seeing the inflictions which that gentleman attempted to put upon the State of Georgia. Respect for ourselves and for the station he holds, as a member of this House, has procured for him a patient hearing.

I have endeavored to mark with accuracy the sentiments he has uttered and the principles he has laid down; that I might clearly define his purposes, and expose the rule that governs him in refusing or granting supplies to defend his country, when invaded by a foreign or domestic foe.

I think I have not misunderstood him, nor have I erred in the estimate I have put on his purposes. The proposition before the committee is to appropriate $100,000 to carry out an effort to terminate the Florida war—a conflict which you have been engaged in for five years with savages and refugee slaves—a war unlike any other which has heretofore existed—a foe ever in the field; never seen, but always felt—continually attacking, but never met—one with whom innocent mothers and their babes are as lawful victims as the man at arms.

To this proposition the member from Ohio says he will stand opposed. And upon what ground? The war, he says, was unjust because the people of Georgia and of Florida were the aggressors. He has endeavored to trace the causes of that war with a view to fix this charge on Georgia in particular. He thinks he has traced it to slavery. For he declares that the crime of negro stealing, committed by the Georgians, was the cause of the war. He arrives at this conclusion by assuming, that without slavery there could be no negro stealing.

After condemning the war and his Government for being engaged in it—after abusing, in a slanderous manner, the people I represent, for originating it, as he alleges—after pouring forth his invectives and denunciations against the peculiar domestic institutions of my State, he utters loud and bitter complaints that he and his constituents are taxed to pay for this war—raises a lamentation and a wailing in behalf of the poor Indian, whilst he stands with his tomahawk and rifle over the mangled and bleeding bodies of the defenceless white mother and her child, and declares he will give nothing to defend or protect his country.

This, sir, is the character, the sum and the substance of the philanthropy and benevolence of those who, like the gentleman from Ohio, have such a holy and pure religion in regard to slavery; so much good will for the Indian and the negro—mixed with “scorn and indignation” for the Southern white man. This affords us a measure of his patriotism.

I rejoice, sir, that we of the South have a different and more exalted patriotism—one which is neither measured by our purse, our love of Indians and negroes, nor our love of money. No, sir. Though you were at war for a petty strip of land on your Northeastern boundary, fit only for firewood, Southern products, Southern money, and Southern blood would be at your command. We should not stop to inquire whether your war was just or unjust. We should not attempt to reproach our Government and country for a war, that might have resulted from cutting or stealing wood, as England would say, on her own territory. We should make no such charge against any State. We should hold it to be our country's cause; and for her cause and her honor we would bleed and die. Not so with the gentleman from Ohio. He has no blood to shed, no battles to fight, no money to pay, no sympathy to exercise. Standing on the side of his country's foes, he condemns his country, feels only for the savage, and refuses to pay.

I will not go with the gentleman to inquire into the causes of the Florida war. Much as he is in error, I feel no obligations to put him right. He could not be obliged to me for it. I perceive he has a purpose and an object in view which would be wholly defeated if I should correct him. Let him be indulged in his error. To rectify this would only drive him to hunt up some other. My effort shall be confined to the attempt to expose and repel his false and slanderous charge against the people I represent; exhibiting, as I go, fairly and fully the object he has in view.

I will place a more statement of his principles and rules of conduct in review before this committee and the country. There are a number in this committee, whose views in regard to slavery are understood to accord with the gentleman from Ohio. I have thought I had seen a concerted movement amongst them here this session. I am not permitted to designate those gentlemen by name, but it is well understood, to whom I refer. When I shall repeat in their hearing the principles avowed by the gentleman on this floor, I call on them to say whether they all do not agree. And if I misrepresent him, I ask him or some friend of his to correct me.

Sir, the gentleman maintains, first:

“That slavery is a great political and moral evil, and ought to be abolished.”

Secondly: “That his constituents are insulted, that their money has been taken to pay for negroes, and are greatly excited on the subject.”

Thirdly: “That Congress has as much power to abolish slavery as to sustain it.”

Fourthly: “That Congress has no power to take the army to sustain it.”

These are some of the extraordinary and alarming doctrines proclaimed on this floor. I have not mistaken the gentleman. I wrote down his language at the time, and here it stands. Does he or any one for him disavow it? Not at all, sir; he was well understood.

I shall not discuss those portions; I am not here for such a purpose; I put them down as part of the history and signs of the times. There my duty ends.

These views are not peculiar to that gentleman;

I am well assured others here think with him. Else why this silence? Their silence indicates either their agreement or their apprehension at expressing a difference, lest their constituents should condemn them. Either fact demonstrates the minds of their constituency. That is the great point. Sir, these sentiments are freely disseminated all over the Union by several of the ablest conducted public journals in New York, Boston, Cincinnati, and elsewhere. They are fast pervading the whole country north of Mason and Dixon's line. This, too, I put down as a part of the history of the times. I should belie my own conscience, and be unfaithful to those I represent, if I should fail here to record it.

The gentleman from Ohio has made one discovery for which I give him credit, because it seems to conflict somewhat with his views and prejudices. It is this: he has at length ascertained that “negro stealing” is a crime. It is due to him to admit, however, that to constitute it a crime, he thinks it essential that the offense should be committed by a white man, living in a slave region. If committed by a citizen of Georgia amongst the Seminole Indians, it is a great crime, and a just cause of war on the part of the Seminole, for which he excuses and justifies the savage. If committed by the Indian in Georgia, it is excusable, for thereby the negro may escape his master. If committed by a citizen of New York or Maine in Georgia or Virginia, it is not only not a crime, but an act of great benevolence and philanthropy, worthy to be aided and abetted by the Legislatures of those two great States.

[Here the Chairman, Mr. CLIFFORD from Maine, called to order.]

Mr. COOPER said, sir, I do not intend to be out of order. I only adverted to these cases by way of illustration.

Mr. EVANS of Maine here rose, and said, he denied that any citizen of Maine had been guilty of negro stealing—on the contrary, he maintained that certain persons from Georgia had come to Maine and kidnapped a negro.]

Mr. COOPER said he was apprised that the gentleman from Maine, who thus interrupted him, held the same opinion with the gentleman from Ohio, on this subject of negro stealing; and, in so doing, gave great strength and weight to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] by his talents and influence in the ranks of his political associates. He has united in the charge of negro stealing against the people of Georgia—or that which is in Georgia considered equivalent, to wit, kidnapping. And whilst he does this, he maintains also, that a citizen of Maine, going from Georgia, commits no crime in harboring, concealing, taking, and carrying away a slave. But that the master, in pursuit of such property, recovering it in the limits of the State of Maine, is guilty of kidnapping. In this, sir, he agrees with the gentleman from Ohio. So do other gentlemen on this floor; many more, sir, than this House has credit for in the State of Georgia. In this, too, they are both sustained by their political party in Maine, Ohio, New York, and elsewhere.

I stand not here to dispute the point with the gentleman from Maine; whether a citizen of Maine has stolen a negro from Georgia. I leave that issue to the court and jury of Chatham county, where, at least, exists prima facie evidence of guilt. Whether a citizen of Georgia has been guilty of kidnapping his own negro, pursued and recovered in Maine, where he had been taken and harbored, is still more foreign to my purpose to investigate. The charge is too slanderous and vile to merit a refutation from me; and but for the fact that it has been wantonly made on this floor by a leader of one of the parties in this House, I would not stoop to notice it. Sir, I have been recently deprived of the power to resent it as I should do, by the act of my constituents. The power of properly resenting such outrages on this floor has been confided to other hands. I confess, however, that, impotent as my arm has been rendered, it is moved by an involuntary effort to return the blow that is given. To my colleagues, sir, who hold here the powers of the scorpion and the spear, I leave the office and the credit of driving back the gentleman from Maine. In my feebleness, I shall probably have enough to do to repel the attack of the picket guard, commanded by the gentleman from Ohio. I may sink under it when sustained and prosecuted by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] I have thought for some time that he, with others, had a fixed, preconceived purpose to press their views and plans here. See the gentleman from Ohio, with his speech before him, written out letter and word beforehand, ready for any and all occasions. See the impulse now given to this committee. Remember the declarations and threats of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] made during the present session. Sir, when gentlemen have wished to turn the force and effect of what the venerable member has said, they insinuated that he is deranged. If he is deranged, I feel curious to behold a sane man. If he is deranged, it is the derangement of a masterly intellect, tutored by long experience, fortified by vast knowledge, unimpaired by age, and stimulated by physical qualities peculiar to that gentleman. It is the derangement of a mind which evidently has a giant strength, and the quickness of lightning. He tells you this subject shall and must be discussed in this Hall. The evidences that he is right, are daily multiplying.

Mr. Chairman, whilst the crime of negro stealing is acknowledged by the member from Ohio, for the purpose of fixing the guilt of a savage warfare on the people of my State, and that of kidnapping is charged by him of Maine against a citizen of Georgia, who takes his own negro; no charge whatever, as they think, rests on a man of Ohio or Maine who shall entice or take away the property of my constituents, or of the people of Kentucky.

I know the fact, sir, that a negro belonging to a citizen of Georgia was enticed and carried away by certain people in Ohio, and that not for the benevolent purpose of freeing the slave, but for the very virtuous intent of pocketing the reward offered for her apprehension. For no sooner than a sufficient reward was offered, they caused her to be delivered safely over on the Kentucky side; for which act, all the parties concerned, including the agent of the owner of the slave, were presented by a grand jury for kidnapping.

[Here Mr. COOPER was called to order by the Chair.]

He said he had no purpose to discuss these topics, but believed it to be right and proper in reply to what had been said, to show how this subject was differently viewed under differing circumstances. I have (said Mr. C.) no notes of my own, save those taken of what the gentleman from Ohio said; and I am strictly pursuing his remarks.

[Mr. BLACK of Georgia appealed from the decision of the Chair. The committee overruled the decision, and Mr. COOPER was permitted to proceed.]

I have said, sir, all I designed to say of negro stealing in Ohio and in Maine. As I before remarked, I will not discuss any point involved in the subject. I shall be content to bring in review before this committee the views of gentlemen proclaimed here, in all their alarming import.

The member from Ohio, magnifies the evils of the Florida war, as he conceives them, and expressly charges that "slavery was the cause of it." [Here Mr. COOPER paused, looking Mr. GIDDINGS in the face; Mr. GIDDINGS remarked, "the gentleman is right."] I know I am right, sir. And the gentleman arrives at his conclusion in this way: the Georgians stole the Indian negroes; for which reason, the Indians fought. Without slavery, there would have been no negro stealing; therefore, slavery caused the war.

This, sir, reminds me of a certain mode of reasoning which I read about at school; by which, it may be proved, and with about as much propriety, in the conclusion, that a certain animal, going on two legs, having the stature and appearance of the gentleman from Ohio, is a goose.

Slavery had about as much to do with the Florida war, as had a certain breed of cattle in the lowlands, in causing that harassing border warfare kept up between the Highlanders and Lowlanders of Scotland. About as much to do as the taking of game and fish, or peltry, had in producing the war with Tecumseh and Black Hawk; or about as much as the stealing of ponies had in producing the Indian wars in Ohio; or that which resulted in the battle of Tippecanoe.

If the gentlemen's reasoning be just, there ought never to have been any Indian war north of Mason and Dixon's Line, west of the Ohio. How stands the fact? It confutes and confounds the gentleman. No, sir, it is not true; and the effort to make it appear, on an occasion like the present, demonstrates his great anxiety to get up an "Anti-Slavery Indignation meeting" in this Hall. He and his associates expect the benefits of it; and, so far as mischief is threatened to my people, he and they shall bear the responsibility.

Whilst he knows it to be contrary to rule to discuss slavery here, he has formally and at great length dwelt on the evils of it, notwithstanding he has been called to order by three of my colleagues, [Messrs. BLACK, HABERSHAM, and WARREN.] The first evil alleged by him was a savage, unjust, and iniquitous war waged, as he says, against innocent unoffending red men of the forest.

The second, and, as he thinks, the greatest, is that his constituents have to pay for it; and not only so, but have been required to pay for negroes captured in it, thereby acquiring the relation of masters to those slaves.

Thirdly, slavery, he says, has prevented the Seminoles from emigrating.

To make good these serious complaints, he adduces the report of Gen. Wiley Thompson, aid of Gov. Duval; the orders of Gen. Jesup; the memorial of John Walker; and that of an Apilachicola chief. These documents may serve his purpose of getting up "indignation" meetings amongst his constituents. They are insufficient for any other. By one of them, he would also implicate two gentlemen of character personally known to me; the one residing in my own town, and the other residing in Irwinton, Alabama, and distinguished for his gallantry in the late Creek war. On such evidence, introduced at this time by the member from Ohio, for such purposes as he has in view, I would not feel it just to those gentlemen even to join issue. If they were here to hear the imputations, or if they were made elsewhere by the gentleman, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] I would not promise to save his person harmless. Sir, it is of a piece with the slander he so freely dealt out in regard to the people of Georgia.

Another evil of slavery he states is: "That it produced that clause of the treaty of the Indian Springs, which required the Indians to pay for runaway negroes harbored and held by them, from 1802 to 1821, claimed by the people of Georgia."

This treaty, he says, caused the Florida war, and to prove it, reads from General Wiley Thompson's report as follows:

"The Creek claim to negroes now in possession of the Seminole Indians, which is supposed to be the first cause of hostility to emigration of the latter tribe, grows out of the treaty of 1821 between the United States and the former."

That treaty, it seems, was the foundation of the Indian title to the Georgia negroes, therefore that treaty caused the Florida war—and hence Georgians produced the war.

This, also, is another specimen of the gentleman's reasoning by syllogism. It measures again his sense of justice, because, from the fact that those Georgia claims were consequent upon the loss of that property, he would have refused to ratify it, or when ratified, would object to its execution, and in case of war, resulting from its provisions, (as he alleges,) he would justify the Indians, and refuse supplies to his Government to prosecute it. For he says that treaty required 250,000, part and parcel of the purchase money paid by this Government to extinguish the Indian title to the lands west of the Ocmulgee, to be applied to those Georgia claims. This is true. And it was so agreed by the Government and the Indians. The gentleman has no ground of complaint, and I presume will cease to complain when he reflects that such application of the money did not increase the burdens of his people one dollar.

But he says, "the people of Georgia extorted this sum from the Indians." This position is taken by the gentleman, no doubt, on the ground that he denies the right of property in negroes. Otherwise, he must know that he asserts what is not true, but what is palpably false.

A balance of this sum—say $149,000—being unexpended, he says Georgia memorialized Congress to have it paid to claims of a similar kind, and that Congress, by a report of Mr. Gilmer, was directed to apply it to the payment of negroes never born, but which would have been born if their parents had lived.

[Here Mr. GIDDINGS explained, and said he was misunderstood: he referred only to the increase.]

Mr. C. resumed. That may have been his meaning, Mr. Chairman, and I am willing to be corrected. That report of Mr. Gilmer is based on immutable principles of justice: it is able and unanswerable, and can only be withstood by those who, like the gentleman, think no man ought to be paid for a negro that is stolen from his master.

But it is monstrous, he says, that General Jesup should offer to give the Indian property to the captors—still worse, he thinks, that, when captured, the General should declare them to be the property of the United States. These are atrocities not to be atoned for, he would have you believe—not even surpassed by another great evil, to wit, a threat of the General to hang the runaway negroes, who were engaged in the war.

All this, sir, is intended, no doubt, for an "indignation meeting" amongst the gentleman's constituents, to excite them against slavery and Southern slaveholders; and for the same purpose he speaks of the bloodhounds. He, sir, knows very little of Indian fighting, and would no doubt much rather attend a dozen such meetings, at the hazard of destroying this Union, than go into one fight of the kind. A very little knowledge or experience would teach and instruct his tender conscience that the best move yet made there was that by Harney, when he hung the Indians, and left them hanging. And so far from attaching blame to Gen. Jesup for such orders, or the Government for sanctioning them, he would at once conclude that the most reasonable complaint would be that those who managed the war did not make it a war of extermination from the beginning. In the end that policy would have proved a saving of much human life, and millions of money.

But to get out of the difficulty, the Government caused the negroes to be sold to Gen. Watson. Here, sir, is a branch of the subject which is one reason that induced me to take the floor—Watson's claims to these negroes. I desire it may be well understood, and that it may not be prejudiced. It is true that he bought these negroes by and with the advice and consent of your Government. The contract was witnessed by its agent—the money paid in his presence. The sum paid was between fourteen and fifteen thousand dollars. It was done to aid the pacific policy of the Government in regard to the Indians, with a pledge at the time by your agents that the negroes should be delivered to Watson, they being there in possession of the officers of Government. It is true, also, that the order to deliver was issued by the Secretary of War, and equally true that an officer of the army, influenced probably by the benign feelings that the gentleman from Ohio claims, declined to obey it, by reason of which Watson failed to get possession of the property, and it was removed to Arkansas by your officers, in violation of the pledges of the Government officers, solemnly made to Watson, which pledges alone induced him to pay his money to aid you in carrying out your policy. You have had the benefits of his money. The Indians received it by your consent. Watson paid it at your instance. The negroes you have also, and can deliver if you will. You ought to do it without delay, or promptly pay Watson the damages. Sir, if your Government could be sued, Watson would recover in an action at law the negroes with their increase and hire. Your exemption from suit increases the obligation to pay.

But the gentleman has such a refined sense of right and wrong, that he commands your officer as noble and patriotic, in refusing to deliver the property to Watson, whilst he justifies the Government for violating its faith. This seems consonant with his code of morals. He never can be an object of envy amongst men of strictly honest purposes.

He expresses for his constituents the utmost "abhorrence and scorn for the buying and selling of negroes."

And who are his constituents? Who is the gentleman? He is the same who makes it his boast, that his district at the late election gave to General Harrison a larger majority than any district in the Union.

After what has occurred, it is unbecoming in this gentleman and his constituents to make this assault on Georgia and her institutions—ungrateful in the extreme, and particularly unkind to my colleagues, who co-operated with him in the late election. What has Georgia done? Has she not united with the gentleman's constituents from Ohio, those of the member from Massachusetts, from Maine, from Vermont, New York, and elsewhere, to elevate this distinguished chieftain? to place their party in power? In doing this, have they not discredited him who now addresses you, with two other of her sons who have faithfully and zealously endeavored to defend her against her adversaries on this floor? Have they not put these three aside, to make room for three others, whose views in that contest more nearly accorded with those of the gentleman?

[Mr. NISBET here spoke from his seat, and said, "No; not so."]

My colleague says no. I say yes, it is so, and will repeat it, that he may not misunderstand. Have not the people of Georgia put aside three of her sons, to make room here for three others, whose views in that contest more nearly accorded with those of the gentleman? She has in this—he is for Harrison, and so are they, whilst we are against him. And what is his return? Scoffing, reviling, abuse, and slander. He is lost to all sense of propriety, lost to every sense of justice towards those who aided him in the "great reform," unmindful of the relation her representatives bear to him and his party. Disregarding the obligations of gratitude, he drives his Abolition forces headlong upon them.

I call my colleagues here to bear witness to his conduct. Did I not feebly endeavor to warn my constituents of what is now before us? Did I not name this very man from Ohio, as one that would turn upon them? I did, sir; but I did not expect so soon to see the prediction realized. I did not expect so soon to hear such sentiments avowed in this hall—that he would travel out of his way to publish them; that it should be done on the very eve of General Harrison's advent to this city, before he is duly installed; and that I should be defending my constituents against attack, while the thunder of joyous artillery, bursting forth at the great hero's approach, deafens my ears, and reverberates from these walls, is more than I looked for. I have thought that regard for my colleagues and what they have said, an unwillingness to betray the miserable humbug by which Georgia had been led into a false position, opposed to her own policy, would have induced the gentleman to refrain.

[Hon. Mr. NISBET rose and asked if his colleague meant to intimate that the State of Georgia, in the late election, had been carried by humbug?] No, sir, said Mr. C. I made no such intimations. I spoke plainly concerning the Presidential election. I said what I now repeat, and what impartial history will record. It was carried by the veriest humbug. My colleague surely knows what I mean by humbug. If not I will tell him. I mean not fair arguments addressed to the reason and judgment of men, to settle and decide issues fairly made; but I mean time-serving expedients, resorted to to evade the true issues, and addressed to the passions and prejudices of men, to stimulate them to act by these impulses. I need not particularize. But if my colleague wishes to be informed, I commend him to men of all parties, who, since all is over, have taken a sober second thought. [Mr. WADSWORTH of South Carolina, here interposed, and said he regretted to see this revival of a family quarrel, on a question where all Southern gentlemen ought to stand together; and protested against the practice of charging the Whig party with holding sentiments peculiar to the gentleman from Ohio, who was the obscurest of all the obscure members of that party.] Mr. COOPER proceeded.

Mr. Chairman, I have had no purpose to revive a family quarrel or to provoke it. I have found it so far pertinent to advert to what occurred, that I may make the gentleman from Ohio feel the unworthiness of his conduct. If by so doing my colleague is made to feel, I regret it, but cannot be responsible for it. I disclaim having charged the Whig party, as a party, by word, thought or deed, with holding the opinions of the gentleman from Ohio, and for what purpose this is imputed to me I know not. I merely said that several prominent members of that party here, (besides that member) representing a great number at home, are of his opinion. I so charged, and it has not been disavowed by any but the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. WADSWORTH THOMPSON] from whom the disavowal ought not to come. Let those who are known to think with the gentleman from Ohio disavow for themselves.

I further charged, what appeared to me to be evident, a fixed purpose on their part, by an organized effort, to urge their opinions on this House; and that was not disavowed.

Sir, I desire to cherish the kindest relations with my colleagues. I have no motive, object, or interest, that could induce me to do otherwise. My political career is drawing to a close. I never expect, never wish, to return here. My colleague knows that my purpose was to have resigned, even if elected. And though the people who sent me here, have not afforded me an opportunity faithfully to represent their best interests, with a chance to show such disinterestedness, I still assert it, because it was recorded at a time when all thought I should be returned. And rather than have my colleagues here think I am aiming a single blow at them, I will suppress all report of my remarks. No, sir; I only design in frankness and candor to point a faithful finger to events as they are turning up during the short period I have to remain.

Mr. Chairman, I have nearly said what I rose to say, and, but for the interruptions, should not have said many things which have been drawn from me. The people of Georgia, I trust, will have sagacity enough to discover their true policy, and firmness enough to adhere to it. But whether, as recently has occurred, I shall agree to disagree with them, I still maintain that whatever, as a people, they may think their interest and happiness require, will be right for them to do. Theirs will be the loss or the gain, and from that judgment I shall never appeal.

But there is one thought I will here present, dictated, as I trust, by an unconquerable attachment for the land that gave me birth. It is this: Whenever her adversaries here, (and by such I mean those whose antagonist interests drive them to a policy injurious to her,) shall desire to carry out any of their great vital measures, interesting to them, but strongly objected to by her, they have but to arm themselves with the leverage of a bank charter, with which to ensnare her people; you will then first establish the decoy, then spread the snare; and after a generous, a patriotic, and confiding people shall have entered into it, draw the cords upon them. Finding them no longer free to act, but closely engaged in extricating themselves from the meshes of your net, you will, with impunity, drive down your stakes all around them. But only let them burst their bonds asunder, and your day of retribution will be at hand.

Sir, I shall oppose this appropriation, but for very contrary reasons from those I have been replying to. I think that to pay money to those Indians to induce them to quit fighting, will be to purchase an Indian war whenever they want money. Such, in effect, is the proposition offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

And now there remains but one idea more. This, sir, is an important crisis for the peculiar interests of the people of the South. What is transpiring here—in the canvassing—in the State Legislatures—in societies and churches, and conventions, both in this Union, on the ocean, and in Europe, admonishes us to take heed? Now is the time; not to-morrow, next week, nor next year; but this is the time, when the happiness and interests of the South demand that they should wisely, gravely, and prayerfully consider what they will do—whether they will demand that this subject be arrested here, or whether they will adopt at home a domestic policy, which will be adapted to coming events. This much I feel bound to say; whilst I feel satisfied, for myself, to leave the subject in the hands of my constituents—of those to whom the State of Georgia has confided it.

REMARKS OF MR. WELLER, OF OHIO.

In the House of Representatives, February 26, 1841.—On the Naval Appropriation bill.

Mr. WELLER said he had not obtained the floor for the purpose of discussing the various subjects introduced into the debate. He was desirous of correcting some errors into which gentlemen in the Opposition have fallen, and to make an appeal to his friends on all sides to terminate the debate. We have now only four days left for the transaction of the public business, and unless this desultory debate is speedily closed, we must of necessity adjourn without any action being had upon many of the most important bills. These after-dinner speeches are usually spun out to an interminable length, covering the whole field of general politics, and, however interesting they may be to the galleries, are of very little use in enabling us to comprehend the subject upon which we are required to vote. The committee charged with the subject, have reported a bill appropriating the sum of $1,425,000 as necessary for the naval service during the present year. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] proposes to increase that appropriation to $2,400,000. This question is now fully understood by every man on this floor, and no doubt each member has made up his judgment as to the manner in which he will vote. Why, then, consume the important time of the House in useless debate? No one here has attacked the navy, and yet we have been compelled to sit for hours, and listen to bombastic eulogies upon our naval heroes, the importance of keeping up the navy, and the probability of a war with Great Britain. Gentlemen have displayed as much zeal and eloquence as though we were about to make an appeal to the God of battle. There are times (said Mr. W.) when I could perhaps listen patiently to this windy declamation, but now, at the close of the session, when our table is loaded down with important business, I confess I have no taste for such speeches.

We are all, said Mr. W. the friends of the navy. We all regard it as the right arm of our national defence—the arm upon which we must mainly rely if at any time we should unfortunately be involved in a war with a foreign country; and we are willing to do every thing in our power to preserve and maintain the dignity and importance of that navy. We would have it sufficiently strong and powerful to preserve untarnished the honor and integrity of the Republic. We are in favor of its gradual advancement, but we do not believe that it is expedient in a time of profound peace, to involve the Government in debt for the purpose of increasing it. Before we make large and liberal appropriations of the public money, we should look at our resources, examine the condition of the Treasury and see whether we have the means to accomplish the object. My colleague, said he, over the way, [Mr. MASON] has told us that the Treasury is bankrupt—that we have no money at all to carry on the Government, and very little credit; and yet, sir, we find him and others, who have expressed similar opinions, zealously advocating the amendment to increase the appropriation in this bill five hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars over the estimates of the Secretary of the Navy and of the Committee of Ways and Means! You have told us, said he, that the Government was already deeply involved in debt; and, instead of devising some plan to relieve it from its embarrassments, you propose to plunge it still farther in debt! Is this the course that prudent men would pursue in the management of their own affairs? If your navy requires an increase, next year, when you come to revise your tariff laws, let them be revised with an eye to such increase; but let us now, when our resources are exhausted, confine the appropriations to what the Secretary has deemed necessary. Our vessels are now found upon every sea, and the stars and the stripes have sufficient power to protect our commerce, wherever it may be found. It certainly is not the policy of this Government to keep up a large and splendid navy in a time of peace.

But, said Mr. W. my colleague [Mr. Mason] has told the committee that our navy was in a "ruinous and dilapidated condition;" that the present and preceding Administrations had most shamefully neglected it. Sir, said Mr. W. my colleague is mistaken; he ought to have examined into the facts before he made this sweeping declaration. I have evidence before me which I trust will satisfy every my colleague that his assertions are unfounded in truth. In 1829, when General Jackson came into power, our naval force in commission consisted of—

One ship of the line	-	-	74 guns.
Three frigates, first class	-	-	44 guns.
Nine sloops, second class	-	-	18 guns.

The whole number of men in active service at this period was 3,875. Now, let us see how it stands in 1841, and then we can readily determine with how much truth the charge has been made against the present and preceding Administrations, of neglecting this important branch of the public service, and suffering it to fall into "ruin and dilapidation." The whole naval force in commission at this time is as follows:

One ship of the line,	74 guns.
Three frigates, first class,	44 "
Two frigates, second class,	36 "
Eight sloops, first class,	20 "
Five sloops of the third class,	16 "
Three brigs,	10 "
Six schooners.

The whole number of men in actual service in 1841, is set down at 6,000, or nearly double the number employed in 1829. In addition to this, the marine corps was, in 1834, increased from 750 to 1,000. Liberal appropriations have been made every year to the improvement of navy yards, the construction of dry docks, wharves, ship houses, the purchase of ordnance, naval stores, &c. &c. Besides all this, the report of the Secretary shows that arrangements have been made, which will enable the Government, at a very short notice, should the situation of the country demand it, to put in commission—

15 Ships of the line.
18 Frigates.
15 Sloops of war.
9 Steamers.
9 Brigs and Schooners.

The materials for these vessels are being prepared, and whenever a war is apprehended, they can, in a very short time, be put upon the ocean. In a few months a naval force could be set in motion, amply sufficient to defend the American flag, wherever it may be assailed. In the face of the facts which have been given, gentlemen of the other party ask too much, when they require us to believe that the navy is in a "ruinous and dilapidated condition." No, sir, the charge is untrue. The navy has not been neglected, but, on the contrary, has been gradually increasing; and gentlemen will see, if we are involved in a war, another exhibition of that daring intrepidity and unflinching courage, which characterized the American tars in 1812. Your navy has yet many a gallant hero, who would willingly throw himself in as a shield between his country and dishonor. The "ruin and dilapidation" about which we heard so much on yesterday, will be found to exist no where, but in the heated imaginations of vindictive partisans.

I will not (said Mr. W.) undertake to ascribe motives to gentlemen of the Whig party, for the course they are now pursuing; but this much I say, that their constant efforts to extend the appropriations beyond the estimates show conclusively that they have abandoned all their notions about economy, and that so far from reducing the expenditures of the Government, (as they promised before the election,) they intend to increase them. Prior to the late Presidential election, you harangued the people about the expenses of the Government, and no doubt, induced many honest men, who did not understand your propensity, to believe that the present Administration had squandered the public money. Now, it is said we have been "parsimonious" and "mean;" that we have neglected the navy and suffered it to fall into a "dilapidated condition." These charges are now made for the purpose of justifying you, if possible, in the large appropriations you intend to make. You say you do not ask a tariff for protection, but you will take care to extend the appropriations to an amount sufficient to make it necessary to keep up a high tariff in order to defray the expenses of the Government. When a large national debt is saddled upon the people, or when they are oppressed and crushed to the earth by an onerous tariff, the impolicy of the course you are now pursuing will be made manifest—then your constituents will ask whether this is the reform you promised them before they entrusted you with power. When you shall have increased the expenditures to forty millions the friends of economy will find how much they have made by placing your party at the head of the Government. Two years will be amply sufficient to expose your shallow trickery. But (said Mr. W.) I do not wish to say any thing to provoke farther discussion. My only object in rising was to correct the gross errors of some of the gentlemen who preceded me in relation to the present condition of the navy, and to invoke all parties to suffer the debate to close, and the vote to be taken. The party discussions which interfere so much with the business of this House, ought to be dropped for the remainder of the session. In other words, let us quit talking, and spend the balance of our time in voting.

SPEECH OF MR. THOMPSON,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

In the House of Representatives, January 23, 1841—
On the Treasury Note bill.

Mr. THOMPSON rose and said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I have contented myself, heretofore, with giving a silent vote, for the most part, on all the questions which have been brought up for the consideration of this House; nor would I, on the present occasion, deviate from that line of conduct, but that questions were involved in this discussion deeply affecting the interests and welfare of my constituents. I know well the party organization of this House—the blindness, deafness, and stubbornness it engenders; I know the impotence of argument and the futility of reason and principle here; but my constituents do not; and they expect me, frankly and openly, to meet these various questions and maintain their interests. I yield not with the view of exhibiting my poor powers, nor with the hope of winning pro-clytes to my views here; but that they may know, what course duty required me to take on these questions.

The authorizing the issue of five millions of Treasury notes has now become a subject, comparatively, of minor importance. Other great and absorbing questions are now before the committee. Among these, are the present financial condition of the country—its future wants and its future income—involving the distribution and the tariff questions; and, also, the fidelity with which this Administration has carried out the great objects of the Constitution. In my opinion, sir, the debate now progressing in this House is not very unlike that which is taking place at the other end of the Capitol, on a very dissimilar question, in which are involved every great leading principle which has divided the politicians of this country for the last quarter of a century.

The bill before the committee (said Mr. T.) meets my approbation, and shall receive my support, and I shall oppose all the substitutes which have been yet submitted.

The Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. JONES] stated that the revenue of the Government was received very irregularly; that, owing to the credit allowed on customs during the first quarter of the year, the receipts of the Government were usually the smallest, and, during the same time, its disbursements were the largest. This fact rendered it necessary, when the annual income of the Government was about equal to its annual expenditure, as was now the case, to make some provision to enable the Secretary of the Treasury, on an emergency, when the current revenue was not sufficient to meet the demands against the Government, to raise money to save the honor and credit of the United States. That this is the case during the first quarter of this year, is a fact admitted on all sides. The Secretary of the Treasury has repeatedly asked for a permanent law, to give full and free action to his department; but this has not been granted, and hence the necessity of this bill as a temporary law. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] proposes a plan to obviate this difficulty, to which I dissent altogether; and that is, to keep five millions of dollars always in the Treasury, and that the honor of the Government is not safe without it. Sir, I would be willing (said Mr. T.) if it were at all practicable, that the Treasurer of the United States, at the close of each day, should strike a balance between the debits and credits upon his books. I prefer for him to strain a point to make the ends meet, rather than to luxuriate in plenty, and never apprehend want. I feel unwilling for any set of public officers to hold the money of this Government when there is no probability that, at any early day, it will be demanded. That feeling alone will constitute their strongest temptation to mismanagement and corruption.

The necessity of raising money to meet the exigencies of this quarter being admitted, what is the proper mode of affording relief? By a loan, or in the manner proposed?

All who have addressed the committee on either side admit the power of Congress, under the Constitution, to authorize the issue of bonds, scrip, or promissory notes, as a means of raising money, except the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON.] And he, with a singular air of triumph, asserts that his argument as to the constitutionality of Treasury notes, delivered during a preceding Congress, has never been successfully answered.

Sir, (said Mr. T.) it is not my object to answer the argument of the gentleman; but it is my intention to examine this question to a sufficient extent to satisfy my own mind. The Constitution being the power of attorney under which we act, and a strict and uniform adherence to its provisions being our only ark of safety, every argument which takes its rise from that sacred instrument commands my respect. And when that hour shall arrive that consigns to neglect and contempt constitutional arguments, then, indeed, are the days of the Republic numbered.

No provision in the Constitution is more explicit than the power to borrow money; yet, to exercise this grant when the income of the Government was amply sufficient to meet its demands, would be a gross and palpable infraction of the genius and spirit of that instrument. It is the time, the occasion, the emergency, that throws around the act the mantle of truth, and honor, and justice, and propriety. Now, there is an immediate, but temporary, want of money; and to raise that money, we must issue some evidence of indebtedness. We may either issue bonds or scrip, with interest, payable annually, semi-annually, or quarterly, reimbursable at the end of a term of years, or at will; or we may issue our promissory notes, bearing interest to a certain day, and no longer. We may make them both receivable in payment of public dues, and, being once received or redeemed, they both die ipso facto. The only difference consists in the different channels in which they will move, after leaving the hands of the Treasurer. In the one case, bonds are issued—they become stock; the capitalist, broker, and stock-jobber rush to obtain them. No sooner are they possessed, than they become the basis of exchange, and soon find their way abroad; and, as the holders will prefer that their bonds should not be paid, no desire will be felt, and no effort will be made, by Congress to make an early provision for their redemption, and thus a permanent debt will grow up insensibly. Whereas, in the case of Treasury notes, they are issued in small sums; they bear interest only for a certain time; they are unsuited to permanent investment; and here a little and there a little will be taken. And if they should collaterally be used as a remittance from State to State, or as a means of discharging debts between citizen and citizen, this is not a less acceptable service to me, than to be used as a remittance between capitalists at home and abroad. But they are continually knocking at your door for redemption, and create, of necessity, only a temporary indebtedness.

But, it is said, they are "bills of credit." Well, sir, what is a bill of credit? In the case of Craig vs. the State of Missouri, which has ever been considered as deciding leading points on this subject, Chief Justice Marshall defines a bill of credit to be "a paper issued by the sovereign authority, and intended to circulate as money." This intention is to be gathered from the face of the act and the phraseology of the bill. The act under discussion, the debate, the cancelling of these notes, and not issuing them when returned, all show the intent to be to raise money, and not to form a circulating medium. Thus, all the argument based upon their being bills of credit falls to the ground. But, even if you consider them bills of credit, it appears, by a note in vol. 3 of Madison's Papers, that the power to issue bills of credit was stricken out of the Constitution, because it was thought useless, as conferring no new power. By remaining in, it might lead to an improper use of them, and serve "as a pretext for a paper currency."

The question of constitutionality and necessity being conceded, the only additional inquiry remains: Is the sum of five millions sufficient?

It is perfectly apparent, from the remarks of the gentlemen who have preceded me on the opposite side of this question, that an extra session of Congress has been determined upon in their party councils, and it is necessary to keep this fact steadily in view, to understand their remarks, and to appreciate aright their singular views and differing calculations. Truth, sir, said Mr. T. is the basis of all excellence; and the unbiassed mind will follow on in whatsoever paths may direct its footsteps. But here a certain conclusion is assumed, a certain purpose must be carried into execution, and, of course, there must be a due adaptation of the reasoning. The lawyer assumes that the cause of his client is just, and directs the energies of his mind to the elucidation of the grounds of its propriety and justice. Every fact that interposes and militates against his purpose is either rejected, or so colored as to destroy its force upon the minds of others. This is the great source of sophistry and false reasoning.

It is in this way alone, we can account for the amazing difference in sentiment, opinion, and principle among mankind. Our feelings, our desires, our interests, control our reasonings and our judgments. Sir, said Mr. T. to my mind my friend from South Carolina (Mr. RUTHERFORD) has demonstrated, with great force and clearness, that neither a new tariff nor a loan is called for by the exigencies of the Government; and that the sum specified in the bill would afford ample relief to the Treasury of the nation. And, from the examination which I have given these subjects, aided by the suggestions of the best informed minds as to the necessary expenditure of the current year, I am free to admit, that, had the Administration been successful before the people, 3,000,000 would have been the ultimatum to which I would have gone in the present instance. But, in providing ways and means for an opposing party, I shall adopt such a course as to cut off all just ground of complaint; and, for all mal-administration, I shall hold them responsible.

I have been not a little amused at the mathematical talent which has been exhibited in this debate. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] leads off with the most extensive and varied calculations, showing not only what will be expended, but what ought to be expended, in the year '41; and at length concludes, that the probable deficit in the Treasury, at the termination of the year, will be seven and a half millions. He is followed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] whose learning and ability are acknowledged on all sides of this House. He differs very widely in his estimates. He joins no issue with the Secretary of the Treasury, as to the probable amount of receipts for the current year; but prefers rather to admit their correctness, and, if the appropriations should not exceed the estimates, or even the expenditures of the last year, the means in the Treasury, with the proposed relief, will be sufficient to meet the current demands. But he objects to what he calls the miserable parsimony of the Secretary; and, in a bold, manly manner, he admits that it has ever been his rule of conduct to vote for the largest appropriations on every subject, for he viewed that as the best policy. Then came the gentlemen from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] who developed a wonderful talent for figures. In early life he must have outstripped all others in this branch of study. He considers them all wrong. He enters into the calculation, and soon the answer is presented: The deficit at the end of the current year must be, he asserts, ten or twelve millions; but more probably fifteen millions.

Sir (said Mr. T.) I have been amused at these calculations; for, however much they differ in the rationale, yet all agree in the result—an extra session of Congress will be necessary. It is not required of me, at this stage of the debate, to make out an estimate for myself. I am neither prepared or willing to do so. Now, sir, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] has commanded my respect and regard since I have been honored with his acquaintance; but, in this instance, the motive, the guiding principle, the quo animo, was too apparent not to be perceptible to the most negligent observer. Men's desires, in a great degree, control their reasoning; and the gentleman himself has furnished me with an apt illustration of the principle. In the spring of 1837, just before Mr. Van Buren was inaugurated, when the fortification bill was before this House, that gentleman proposed an amendment, which provided that the balance in the Treasury at the end of that year should be deposited with the States, in accordance with the provisions of the act of 1836, usually called the deposit act. In his speech on that occasion, he is reported in the Register of Debates to have said: "All must admit, not only that there will be a surplus, but that it will be a very large one; and the question is now presented, and must be decided by the vote which we are about to take, whether the fifteen or twenty millions in the Treasury, over and above the demands of the public service, will be more secure when deposited with and distributed among the several States of the Union, or in the State banks." Now, sir, (said Mr. T.) it is a matter of history, that, at the end of that year, not only was there no surplus, but, during the year, the President of the United States was under the painful necessity of calling together the members of Congress, at great expense and trouble, to devise the necessary ways and means to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government. Then, however, the gentleman's calculation was, that there would be a surplus of 15 or 20,000,000 in the Treasury; now his calculation is, that there will be a deficit of 10 to 15,000,000. Then his desire was to make out the largest possible surplus; now his desire is to make out the largest possible deficit. Then he came with 15 or 20 millions of the truth; now, I suppose, he will come within 10 or 15 millions of the truth: which will show a considerable improvement on his part in the sciences of figures.

It is in vain (said Mr. T.) to try longer to destroy the confidence of this House in the integrity and fair dealing of the Secretary of the Treasury. The more his statements are attacked, the more impregnable they appear. Discussion and investigation, as they shed light upon these subjects, demonstrate the more clearly the justness and propriety of his estimates. This circumstance, alone, has great weight in my mind. Last year was an extraordinary commercial year. It was evident that the country was poorly supplied with goods, and reasonable expectations were formed that the imports for the year would be large; but the singular and uncommon fact occurred, that the exports exceeded the imports more than 26½ millions. Yet the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury came within about two millions of the amount actually realized.

Sir, (said Mr. T.) these calculations must all prove uncertain. To man is not given the power of foreseeing events. He cannot tell what a day, or an hour, may bring forth. At seed time, the farmer cannot decide upon the extent of his harvest. Nor in the blossom can we determine the abundance of the fruit. Nor can the financier foretell, with certainty, the per annum receipts from impost duties. They are uncertain, and must be so from their very nature; they depend upon the wind and the wave, the caprices of society, the mutations of trade, the fluctuations of commerce, and the intercourse of nations. But the Secretary bases his estimates, I learn, from information derived from the revenue officers scattered all over the face of this continent, and, therefore, is more entitled to credit for his conclusions than a member on this floor, who has not the facts on which his judgment may act; and, therefore, gentlemen must not consider me as calling in question their mathematical talent by adhering to the estimates made by the Secretary of the Treasury. Then the account will stand thus:

The receipts from every source of public revenue will make the whole means for the year 1841,
$24,723,473

The whole expenditure, including the funded debt for the cities of this District, and the redemption of outstanding Treasury notes, for the year 1841, will be - - - 23,899,200

Balance in the Treasury, at the end of 1841, after all payments whatever are made - - - $824,273

This is the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury; I attach more faith and credit to it than any other calculation I have seen. But can gentlemen of the opposing party have the least possible pretext for complaint, when we propose by this bill to give them the power to raise five additional millions. Justice forbids a murmur, and fairness and candor could ask no more at the hands of unbounded liberality.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] enters into a formal and serious complaint against this Administration for endeavoring to cut down the expenditures. He asserts your public works are suspended; your fortifications are neglected; your harbors, and roads and canals, which have been auspiciously commenced, are now going to ruin for the want of appropriations of public money; and, to my surprise, he was followed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] in the same vein. He accuses the Democratic party of being guided by a spirit of mean "parsimony." Sir, (said Mr. T.) are we in the same House? Is this the same body that met here in council twelve months ago? Is the present or the past all a dream? The profligacy, extravagance, and wastefulness of this Administration, are still ringing in my ears: these walls have scarcely ceased to reverberate the sound. But now, how changed! It is now guilty of a mean "parsimony." Three months ago, the cry of prodigal expenditure was echoed from one end of the nation to the other. It was the charge, above all others, relied upon to prostrate the present Executive before the people. But being defeated, even before he lays down his brief authority, the same lips turn upon him, and accuse him of a mean "parsimony." I will not say, consistency, thou art a jewel! But I will say, oh, shame! where is thy blush? Will the American people endorse all this? No, sir; they will not—they cannot. When they find they have been deceived, they will spurn those arts by which it has been effected.

Sir, before my constituents (said Mr. T.) I admitted that the expenditures of the Government were too large, and accounted for them on the ground that too much money had been collected from the people; for if Congress found the money in the Treasury, they would assuredly spend it—they would not leave it in the hands of the officers of the Government. And however strong their principles of economy might be, and however much the Executive might inculcate the doctrine of a cheap Government, yet the members of Congress would not withstand the seductions of an overflowing Treasury, and the true way to treat the Government was to adopt the practice of the provident parent towards the profligate youth at college—to cut off the supplies. Now, sir, the supplies have been cut down, in pursuance of the revenue laws which were enacted long before this Administration came into power. For the last four years, the taxes upon the people have been rendered lighter and lighter; your revenue has been gradually diminishing, and they are still in the process of further diminution. These circumstances required retrenchment. At this time, no surplus money is found in your Treasury! Shall we blame the Secretary? Surely not; justice and candor forbid it. On the contrary, he deserves the highest compliment, the gratitude of every patriot, in devising the means of curtailing the expenditures to keep pace with the diminution of the revenue of the Government, without permitting any great interest materially to suffer.

But, sir, there is another word which has been rung through all the changes. The cry was first raised within these walls; the winds caught up the sound, and bore it along over every hill and every valley, over every city, village, and neighborhood, throughout this vast Republic. Upon every party pennant which was flung to the breeze, was written, in bold and conspicuous letters, this word of magic power. It was repeated by day and by night, in the bustling crowd and in the social circle—"reform! reform!" And, sir, what was the meaning of all this? Among my constituents, it assuredly meant the spending of less money. The people, it was asserted, had been unnecessarily taxed, to pamper and feed the office holder; the President was represented as living in princely pomp and splendor; and change was demanded. Well, sir, that change has been granted by the people. What now is the meaning of the word "reform?" The honorable gentlemen who have preceded me, are leading and conspicuous members of the triumphant party, and they have given us their definition. Now they call this Administration "niggardly," straining every nerve to avoid expense; and that your public works are rapidly going to decay. Now reform means a liberal expenditure of the public money, the building up of forts, the cleaning out of harbors, the constructing of roads and canals. If this be its meaning, then have the people indeed been deceived. These things, for the most part, are rejected and forbidden by the well known opinions of my constituents, by the Constitution itself, and by my own convictions of expediency.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] complains of the Democratic party for their refusal to act upon private claims; thus enlarging the necessary expenses of the current year. This charge is gratuitous and unjust. I have seen no party action since I have been a member of this House, on private claims. I speak for myself, when I say that few have been more punctual than myself in attending to this branch of our legislative duties. Some few of my constituents are interested, and I have felt eager and anxious to reach and act upon their cases. But the inference that the Democratic party were opposed to every private claim, would impel us to the conclusion that the Whig party favored and advocated every private claim. And, take either horn of the dilemma, and the whole would seem to be ridiculous.

But another charge of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD] which struck my mind with surprise and astonishment—he asserts that the furniture of the President's house is "unfit even for a private gentleman;" and that it should be sold out and other furniture purchased. That this constitutes an additional necessary charge upon 1841. Has it come to this? Are the services of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OGLE] so soon to be forgotten? Is this the treatment he is to receive at the hands of friends, who claim to be of the "more decent" order? That gentleman's speech was sent, during the last summer, into every corner of the State of Mississippi. It described the furniture as regal, princely, extravagant! The drivelling politicians were repeating it at every tavern and cross roads; and it was held up as astonishing, that a Democrat should be permitted to live in such pomp and splendor! Now, however, a change has come, a different order of things prevails. General Harrison is called by the people from his log cabin to the White House, and the cry is raised, the furniture is unfit for such a man!

Will not the country hold the Whig party responsible for the unhallowed stories which have been circulated abroad? And, if the furniture is to be sold, I ask, will not a sufficient amount be realized from the sale to replace the same? Other Presidents have been content with the furniture; and will the President elect feel himself dishonored by its use? I wish the country to know these facts. I shall be content with their decision.

But still another charge upon 1841, as made out by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD;] and the "niggardly" Democrats are to be saddled with its postponement heretofore. They have refused to do justice, because, in doing so, money was required. I allude to the claims of the Choctaws for lands of which they have been deprived by this Government. These Choctaws live within the State of Mississippi. Their petitions have received my special attention; and I am truly gratified that the gentleman has introduced this subject, as a matter of complaint against the Democratic portion of this House, as it will afford me an opportunity of bringing to the notice of this committee the present condition of these claims.

By the treaty of Dancing Rabbit creek, made with the Choctaws in 1830, it is provided, in the 14th article, that those Indians who desired to remain in the State of Mississippi should be entitled to certain land, by signifying their intention to the agent appointed for that purpose. This agent failed faithfully to discharge his duties, and consequently the Government sold the lands to which they were entitled, and they were driven from their homes. These Indians are still in the State of Mississippi, and are insisting upon a due compensation for the injuries they have sustained. In 1837, Congress authorized a board of commissioners to collect the testimony in these cases. That board continued in existence till the 1st day of August, 1838. These commissioners were unable to complete their undertaking. At the succeeding session of Congress, unsuccessful efforts were made to revive the commission. As soon as I took my seat on this floor, I called the attention of this House to this subject; and some time before the close of the last session, the chairman of the Committee on Indians Affairs informed me he was prepared to report a bill. But, sir, he was unable to do so, and no action of Congress was had. At the very beginning of this session I introduced a bill, which will mete out ample justice to the miserable Indians, who are in a state of want and wretchedness; which bill is now in the hands of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I hope for an early report; and then I hope the gentleman will join me in repairing this supposed breach of good faith. Justice to Mississippi, as well as to the claimants, demands early action. My party friends all around me have given me every assurance of their assistance. The departments, time after time, have reported the facts and requested action. I blame no party for this delay: it has grown out of the manner in which we have done business. Moreover, the claim here is not for money, but for land; and we have, as yet, a large surplus on hand. But, Mr. Chairman, why dwell upon these topics of such minor moment? these pretenses to keep out of view the real design? These are but skirmishes on the outposts, to cover the main movements of the army. There is behind all this another question, involving principles of the first magnitude. Already has it appeared before this House as a party movement; and at the other end of the Capitol, a distinguished party leader, who speaks as one having authority, openly avowed it as a leading principle with the incoming Administration. I refer to the distribution of the revenue, arising from the sale of the public lands among the States. This, I believe, is the true cause of the manifestation of a disposition to impose additional taxation upon the people. I will not cloak my fears on this subject. This distribution is but the beginning of a series of measures which, when carried into full operation, will subvert the whole genius of our institutions. In morals, it is the first step alone that costs;—in politics, the importance of a principle depends upon the consequences to which it may lead. The present condition of the States constrains me to fear the success of that accursed measure.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] spoke of the public lands as a great electioneering fund, to be used by the ambitious, aspiring politicians of this country. He said, that it was true that they could not, like the Roman Emperors, divide to each man his measure of corn but they were able to do that which was equivalent—give to each man his quota of the public lands. There is another illustration, interwoven with the Roman history by the great master of human passions, better suited to his purpose; for, on that day when the proud usurper of his country's freedom was laid prostrate in the dust, liberty would have triumphed, had not the fortunes of the hour been changed by the proclamation of Cæsar's will, which assigned to every Roman citizen a piece of silver. This dividing the money among the States is not to be compared, in its influence, to your pre-emption laws, your graduation of prices, or your cession of public lands to the States in which they lie; it far outstrips them all.

When I first heard the saying of that distinguished man, [Mr. RANDOLPH] whose voice once struck terror into the hearts of loose constructionists, that the day would come when a gentleman would be considered out of order in this House to quote the Constitution, I viewed it as an idle prophecy. But, sir, I view it as such no longer. We have lived to see that day. I now feel its force on this very question. Where, in the Constitution, I would ask, is found the power in Congress to raise money and divide it among the States? I care not to be shown the specific grant, for we all know that is not to be found. What is there in the genius, the spirit, the nature of this Government, which clothes us with that important power? Why then is this question to be dreaded? Because of the present condition of the States.

Sir, in casting my eyes over the twenty-six sovereignties which composed this happy and glorious Confederacy, and reflecting upon their present pecuniary embarrassments, I tremble for the honor of my country. Already their faith is pledged for the payment of about two hundred and forty-four million of dollars; and the annual interest to be paid to foreigners, is more than twelve millions of dollars. If the difficulty is now so great to meet the interest, how will that difficulty be enhanced when the principal is to be paid. Does it never occur to the minds of honorable members, that posterity will inquire, what have we received for all this? Do they not discover in all this stock being held abroad, a fruitful source of future jealousies and dissensions? The revenue derived from the public lands will fall far short in meeting the demands upon the States. The residue must be supplied from taxation: Yes, sir, onerous and grinding direct taxation; unless this Government takes one step further, which will be an easy one; this being taken, to pledge the revenue arising from imposts to pay this interest. That being done, this Government assumes the payment of the State debts indirectly, when all deny it the power to do so directly.

The proposition to assume the debts of the States is not openly advocated by any respectable portion of either of the great parties of this country. All deny our constitutional power to pledge the faith of this Government for the payment of debts contracted in the execution of local objects. But wonderful discovery this, that while we have not the power to assume, we have the power to place in the hands of the States the means of discharging their debts.

Mr. Chairman, kingcraft and priestcraft have had their day; witchcraft and brankcraft have lost their influence. A new era has dawned upon the world, and is characterized by the craft of politicians; and it is perceptible in nothing more clearly than in this great political movement. It resolves itself into this; we cannot undertake, but we can pay the debts of the States; and I shall now endeavor to prove, that we have the same power to distribute among the States the revenue arising from our tariff laws, as we have to distribute the revenue arising from the sale of public lands.

In the adoption of the articles of confederation by the original thirteen States, the first difficulty which presented itself, was the waste unappropriated lands in the Western country. The State of Maryland refused to ratify the articles of confederation, until there was a prospect of quieting that question. Shoulder to shoulder with her confederates, she had will nigh gone through the war of the Revolution, before she had sanctioned the articles of compact between the States. In 1789, the Continental Congress urged upon the States, a liberal surrender of their waste lands, for the use and benefit of all the States. On the first day of March, 1781, New York patriotically stepped forward and executed her deed of cession for all her waste territory west of a designated line, "for the use and benefit of such of the United States as shall become members of the Federal alliance of the said States, and "for no other use or purpose whatsoever;" and on the same day, the State of Maryland ratified the Articles of Confederation. On the first day of March, 1784, Virginia executed her deed of cession; Massachusetts does the same, April the 19th, 1785; and Connecticut, September the 14th, 1786. On the 4th of March, 1789, our present Constitution having been ratified by a sufficient number of the States, went into operation; and in that instrument is found this section:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States."

Is it not as clear and evident as language can make it, that the waste lands which are here referred to are recognised as the absolute property of the United States; and being the property of the United States, can it, or the money arising therefrom, be disposed of, but for objects in which this Government, as separate and distinct from the respective State sovereignties, are interested? It seems to me that the proposition is self-evident; and to prove it, by a regular process of reasoning, would be as unnecessary as in mathematics to attempt to demonstrate the axiom, that the whole is equal to all its parts; it is such a truth, as all men's minds should readily assent to it upon a naked statement.

But a common error has prevailed, that the Government is a mere trustee of these lands. That they were ceded to this Government merely for the purpose of meeting the debts then existed against it, and that these liabilities, having now been discharged, the States, in their individual capacity, have a right to demand their respective shares of this public domain. Nothing can be more unfounded or unjust.

Let us recur, for one moment, to the causes which led to the adoption of our present happy form of Government. The money power is the greatest in every Government. In England, for ages, Parliament possessed scarcely any other effective power than to raise the necessary means of carrying on the Government; and at that very time her people boasted of their freedom. Under the articles of confederation, the common Treasury was supplied by each State, in proportion to the value of all land within the same surveyed for any person. This system was found unoperative. The Federal alliance incurred debts, but was not possessed of the power of raising the necessary funds to discharge them. The amount realized from the public domain under the Confederation was trifling. Hence the patriotic men of that day (and purer and wiser men never lived in any age or country) sought to enlarge the powers of the Federal alliance; and the States came forward and surrendered to the General Government the power of laying impost duties. For what purpose? To enable that Government to pay the debts already incurred, or to be incurred in future. In 1790, Congress passed an act, entitled "An act making provisions for the debt of the United States," in which they pledge the faith of the United States, the revenue arising from customs, and the revenue from public lands, for the redemption of the debts of the United States.

Now, sir, those debts have been paid; and by the very same process of reasoning by which you take the money derived from the sale of public lands, and give it a broad cast among the States, you can show that the proceeds from impost duties may be distributed. And, I repeat, commence this system, and you bury your Constitution. You do violence to its plain meaning, and letter, and intent. Many of the States are now hungering and thirsting for their share of the spoil. Their appetite's keen. Their local politicians have loaded the States with grievous and foolish indebtedness, and they have not the nerve and fairness to face their constituents and ask them to pay their debts. They are directing the eyes of the people to Congress, to hide the enormity of their own conduct. Let the States once feed upon it, and their voracious appetites will not be easily appeased.

But, let it not be said that I distrust the honor or the patriotism of the States, or their ability to discharge all their liabilities. This Government is the work of their own hands; they created it for their own mutual benefit and protection; they invested it with sufficient power to carry out the great leading purposes of its creation. But once admit the idea that any portion of the revenue of this Confederacy can be seized upon by the States, and used by them individually; once grant that the property of this Government, held by the States in their federative capacity, can be sold, and the money appropriated by them severally, and you destroy all restriction upon the powers of this Government. The metes and bounds of the Constitution having once been broken down, they can never be erected again. If you can sell your ships of war, or the public lands which lie beyond the Mississippi, and divide the money among the States, then there is no limitation upon the discretion of Congress in the use of the public money. And, is it not easy to perceive how State politicians can convince their several constituents of the facility of this Government to take money from impost duties? Direct taxation is an abomination in the sight of such men, because the people then know and mark every cent which is abstracted from their pockets by Government. This leads them into too close a scrutiny of their prodigal appropriations. Few men understand the operation of our system of taxation, and the people do not know how much they pay for the support of the General Government. It is on this account that I dread the introduction of this principle.

But, sir, there are other objections to this distribution. One of the Revolutionary principles was, that taxation and representation went hand in hand. This constitutes one of the main pillars on which our free institutions rest. This distribution will practically overthrow that principle. By this, Congress will become the collectors of money—the State Legislatures will appropriate it. Now, sir, the true meaning of the principle above referred to is, that every legislative body should collect the money which they spend. He who takes the responsibility of using the people's money should also incur the responsibility of raising that money from the people. Sir, this distribution will be demoralizing in its tendency, ruinous in its practice, unjust in its operation, and will terminate in a vile, contemptible scramble, among politicians, for the spoils of this Government.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another ground for a large deficit in the Treasury at the end of '41. It was stated by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] that he had no doubt that, during the succeeding Administration, the third instalment would be paid to the States.

[Here Mr. EVANS interposed, and said he had stated no such thing.]

Mr. T. then said: It is unnecessary to be so technical. I mean the fourth instalment; and I certainly could not have misunderstood the gentleman in that particular. But it matters not. One of his own party, the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY] has brought forward a bill to pay this fourth instalment to the States. This amount is about nine millions. The money requisite to pay this sum is not now in the Treasury, as it is admitted on all hands. It must be raised by taxation. Gentlemen may say that this Administration has squandered this money. I will not go into that subject now. Enough for me to know, at present, that the money is not in the Treasury. And are we now to be taxed to raise this fourth instalment for the States? In 1836 we had a large surplus collected from the people under a most iniquitous tariff. For the safety of the fund, we deposited twenty-eight millions of this surplus with the States, with the pledge of the faith of the States that it should be returned whenever wanted by this Government. Now, it is alleged, we want the money; but instead of calling on the States for what they have already received, it is proposed to raise (for we must raise it before we can compass the object) nine millions of dollars, to be paid over to them. And why? Because, in 1836, we believed we were able to deposit with them thirty-seven millions of dollars. This is sufficient to convince us of the danger which besets our path in dealing out largesses to the States.

It is proper, before I leave this part of my subject, to remark, in relation to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. NESBITT] that I am truly rejoiced to hear him denounce the distribution. And did I believe that the President elect would be guided by his counsels, and those of his friends who agree with him, I should be slow in taking any position in advance, in opposition to the coming Administration: for that gentleman agrees with me in opposition to the distribution, internal improvement by this Government, a National Bank, and in opposing a protective tariff, though we may differ somewhat as to the amendment under discussion. It is said, none are so blind as those who will not see. Is it not apparent to that gentleman? Do not the developments of every day in this House, at the other end of the Capitol, convince him that the hour is at hand when he is to be read out by his party? One of two things is inevitable: either he is to deny his principles, or desert his party. And why, I ask him, in all kindness and sincerity of feeling, will he longer tarry and strengthen the hands of the adversaries of his principles?

Having thus examined the real or supposed liabilities of the Treasury, it is now proper to go one step farther, and inquire into our resources.

I again repeat, so that I may not be misunderstood, that, with the passage of this bill, the means of the Government will be amply adequate to meet all demands falling upon the year '41, without changing or amending, in any the slightest degree, the revenue laws of the country.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] spoke of the proposed graduation and pre-emption bills, as bills of revenue. I agree with the gentleman; but little, if any, additional income was to be expected from their passage. I do not know, however, that the friends of pre-emption placed their support of that bill on any such basis. They believe, and I am sure I could not misunderstand their view, that its provisions are founded in justice and sound policy; that it secures to the emigrant his humble home, facilities and accelerates the settlement of your desert wastes, strengthens your frontier, develops the resources of your country, enhances the value of your public lands, and promotes the general good.

I am aware, however, that some of my political friends have placed the graduation bill on the ground of a revenue bill. And from the results in the Chickasaw nation, where this principle has been in operation, there is some just ground for such a position; but the reduction of price, as proposed in this bill, is so slow, and the lands on which they would operate have been so long in market, and so thoroughly culled, that I do not expect a large increase of revenue from the passage of this measure. I base my advocacy of that bill on other and higher ground. When this Western domain was ceded to the Federal Government, the thirteen original States agreed with themselves, and, of course, with the States then in fieri, to divide this territory into States of suitable dimensions. They agreed, furthermore, that, "whenever any of the said States shall have sixty thousand free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever."

And again: "That the States so formed shall be distinct republican States, and admitted members of the Federal Union—having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States."

Here, sir, is the covenant. I call upon you to keep your vows, redeem your pledges, abide by your compact. Long, long have the new States waited for their promised redemption. The hour of deliverance like the ignis fatuus, seems to recede as we advance. Is it not mockery to say that Mississippi is "sovereign, free, and independent," "on an equal footing with the old States," when more than one-third of her soil is held in manu mortua, on which she can levy no tax, and over which, without permission, she can run no public road? It requires no argument to illustrate my meaning. The words themselves, interpreted by plain common sense, will lead every mind to the same conclusion, that you have failed to do your duty to the new States. I know we consented to this arrangement. But how was this consent extorted from us. You made it the condition, the price of our admission to the enjoyment of our acknowledged rights. Well, sir, hitherto we have submitted without a murmur. Mississippi has not only abstained from taxing the public lands, but for five years after these lands have been purchased by individuals, she has levied no tax upon them; because this Government being a very kind landlord, she has claimed this privilege for those who deal with her. These lands have been in market ten, twenty, thirty years, and longer. No one has been found to give the price demanded. Time and again she has asked for the reduction of these prices. She desires to extinguish your title. If your good lands are worth no more than one dollar and a quarter, it is idle to ask the same for your refuse lands. But pass your proposed distribution bill, and nothing but a bold and decisive assertion of our rights will wrest these lands from your miserly grasp. In future, the inquiry will not be how we may conduce to the settlement of these lands, and the strengthening of these States; but in what way we can wring from these new States the last dollar. You must then have the pound of flesh; but take heed in that event, that you do not take the blood also.

The new States on an equal footing with the old States! No, sir. Our fathers of the original thirteen paid but a paltry pittance for their right of soil; they received it, as usually expressed in the old charters, from the "abundant grace" of the king; but we have been required to pay the uttermost farthing.

[Mr. LINCOLN said: The Indian titles to the whole of the lands of New England were extinguished by the contract of the settlers. There was not an acre that was trod upon by the white man, but what had been purchased. Mr. LINCOLN only wished the gentleman to know that the people of New England purchased the fee simple of their lands by treaty with the Indians, for which was paid the full value by that portion of our country.]

Mr. T. resumed: I thank the gentleman for the information. All I ask for the people of the new States is, that they may be placed on some ground approaching the same footing of the old States. If the Eastern people paid for their lands the Indian price, which, in those days, was a mere trifle, surely they cannot complain of us, after we have freely paid so much more than the Indian price, when we ask you to reduce, to a reasonable rate, the price of your refuse lands.

But one remark of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] seemed to me to be unlike himself. For him I have ever entertained the highest respect and defence; and he is one of the last in this House of whom I would speak in terms of disparagement. But I must be true to myself. In speaking of pre-emption and graduation, he said the advocates of these measures do not desire their passage, but prefer to keep them up as electioneering hobbies. This remark, when applied to a large and worthy portion of this House, is harsh, unjust, and, in my opinion, unjustifiable. But I advocate those measures. I think their passage is demanded by every dictate of a sound and liberal policy; and, if the gentleman intends to give his remarks a personal application, I pronounce them false and slanderous.

But the main source of revenue to this Government is derived from impost duties: and a proposition is now before us, to increase that revenue by levying an increased duty on silks, wines, bleached and unbleached linens, &c. which is to meet the deficiencies in the Treasury which will be created by the distribution of the income from lands and the payment of the fourth instalment to the States.

I regret that this disturbing question of tariff is again to be raised. There is no method yet devised by man, by which the legislator can so adroitly thrust his hands into the pockets of his constituents and steal away from them their substance, as is found in this system of taxation. To tax a people under any circumstances, is by no means a pleasing task. But under this ingenious device—this legislative legerdemain—you impose heavy burdens upon the people; you fill to overflowing your public coffers, and strip them of the profits of their labor; and then turn, and, with apparent candor and fairness, attempt to flatter them into the belief, that it is for their good to submit to the tax; that they will prosper in business more when they pay, than when they do not pay, their duties. Sir, there is no power in the Constitution which is more liable to abuse, ay, which has been more abused, than that simple grant to lay and collect imposts. It operates secretly and deceptively. The laborer and the planter know not at the end of each year what amount they have paid for the support of Government; they do not perceive and mark, that when they buy a pound of iron, or a bushel of salt, or a yard of cloth, a portion of the consideration goes in to support Government; they do not perceive and mark, that the importing merchant paid the duty, and added it to his bill as the original cost; that he makes a profit upon that duty, selling it to the wholesale merchants; that the various hands through which the article may then pass, till it reaches the consumer, each add their per centum; and thus he pays his tax to the Government with fourfold interest. Yet he knows it not; he submits to it cheerfully; and politicians are ever ready to impose it upon him. Its indirectness constitutes its charm. It is circuitous—felt in its results, but not seen in its operation. The tax gatherer stands behind the curtain; and, though his exactions may be heavy and oppressive, yet few understand, or undertake to trace, the ramifications of trade; and room is ever left to the wily Representative to argue with his constituents that others, and not they, bear the burdens of this kind of taxation; or what they pay the Government with one hand is reimbursed into the other hand by the operations of the system.

But it is right and proper to deal fairly and candidly with the people. Nearly all the States are involved in debt; and domestic taxation is heavy now, with a fair prospect of an oppressive, if not ruinous increase. Will, then, the Federal Government be in haste to increase her taxation, and thereby aggravate the present unavoidable pecuniary difficulties of the people of the States? Shall we, when no necessity is laid upon us, be in eager haste to impose additional taxes? Is it not best to let this tariff question alone till we can possibly ascertain what shall be the salutary effects of the reform demanded by the people?

In a Government embracing every variety of interest, agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing, like ours, inherent difficulties will always exist in fixing upon a proper and equal system of taxation. If all party distinctions could now be wiped out of the public mind as with a sponge, society would again immediately divide into tax-paying and tax-consuming parties, and interest, no doubt, would be the controlling principle. The North and the South, I fear, will never agree in their financial policy. I hold that the following constitutes the first principle of a sound political economy, on which all just and equal legislation is based:

That it is the duty of Government to leave capital free to seek its own investments; giving protection and security to all—advantage to none. Thus each citizen will reap the reward of his own skill and industry, and envy not the success and prosperity of his neighbor. Capital, in a free Government, should be left untrammelled, unmolested, undirected, by legislative enactment: like water, it will seek its own level; like air, it will always rush it, to fill a vacuum.

With us in the South, we consider it a settled maxim, that the exports of the country suffer by the duties upon imports. And those who grow the exporting staple, had just as well pay the duties upon the articles for which their staple is exchanged in going from home as in returning into our own ports. I will endeavor to illustrate.

The State of Mississippi produced, in the year 1839, as it appears by the late census, 685,568 bales of cotton; which, at ten cents per pound, (and this I consider less than an average price,) is worth near twenty-seven and a half millions of dollars. But it is due to remark here, that there must be some mistake, either by the marshals or their deputies, in making out this amount. I am confident that this is too large an estimate; but, sir, I will suppose that Mississippi was separated from the Union, and stood, an independent Government. I will suppose, for convenience, that her exports are worth twenty millions; on a fair circulation, it is right to suppose that she will import twenty millions, which is obtained as an exchange for her staple. The rate of duties agreed upon in the compromise act is twenty per cent, ad valorem. Suppose Mississippi imposed an indiscriminating duty of twenty per cent, as before stated, then she would receive, as a Government revenue, one-fifth of the whole imports; and the citizens of the State would receive sixteen millions for their twenty millions of exports. This tax the people of Mississippi could the more cheerfully bear, as it would be expended, for the most part, in improving their rivers, in constructing their public roads, and in educating their children. With a revenue of four millions per annum, in the course of ten years, with a prudent expenditure, Mississippi could not fail to bloom as the garden of the world. But, sir, she is a member of this Confederacy; she loves its institutions; and though its burdens fall heavily upon her, thus far she submits quietly to its exactions. If there be truth in this reasoning, and she pays even the half of what she appears to pay, how great are her sacrifices for the sake of the Union! Her representation on this floor is so small in number as scarcely to be felt. When money is to be disbursed, she scarcely receives a crumb that falls from your table. It is true, however; that many years ago, out of your great munificence, you erected a light-house on the bluff at Natchez; but, sir, of so little consequence and utility is that favor, that it is seldom, if ever, lighted up by the citizens. If this reasoning be true, or even approaches truth, how unjust, and unequal, and impolitic, to take the money which arises from the sale of public lands, which comes equally from all the people of the Union, divide it among the States, and supply the deficiency thus created in your Treasury, by this unequal and burdensome system of taxation. It is our inability to trace, to ascertain, to define the extent of these ills, that makes the system tolerable. We submit; and it would be honorable for us to submit, only on the principle that "He who is robbed, not wanting what is stolen, Let him not know it—he's not robbed at all."

Now, Mr. Chairman, said he, a great difference of opinion has been expressed by those who have preceded me in this debate, as to the compromise act. Such were the peculiar and striking circumstances under which that act became a law, that I hope there is no portion of this body, or of this country, who would disregard the principles therein contained. But, so strange and so singular have been the constructions placed upon that act, that it is but due to myself that I explain to this House, and through this House to my constituents, what interpretation is to be placed on that act; what was its object, and how we ought to meet this great question; which will soon be upon us.

Previous to the passage of that act, the Southern people were contending and protesting against the principle of protection. They believe the lightest duties for the people would be those derived from taxes upon luxuries. On the other hand, the tariff party not only advocated protection, but averred that the sudden overthrow of the system would destroy expectations, and prove ruinous to capitalists who have made investments in manufacturing establishments. Such was the condition of the country, when, in the latter part of the year 1832, the gallant State of South Carolina, appealing to the genius of our free institutions, solemnly vowed before Heaven that she had submitted to the oppressive burdens of that accursed system till submission ceased to be a virtue; and that a passive acquiescence in its unjust exactions was no longer to be expected. This independent avowal presented an awful issue to the Congress and people of the United States; either the protective system or our beloved country must fall. Congress met the crisis, and the compromise act was passed. In that act, the South yielded much. They conceded to the continuance of the protective principle till the month of June, 1842; unwilling, by its sudden overthrow, to afford any ground of complaint to the manufacturers. They conceded to the admission of sundry articles of luxury into our ports free of duty; because the revenue arising from protected articles alone, under their first arrangement, was considered sufficient for an economical administration of the Government. And what were they to gain? 1st. That, after 1842, no duties were to be imposed, but with an eye single to revenue; and that "such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government." 2d. No duty on any article shall exceed twenty per centum ad valorem. It is further provided in that act, that, in case of excess or deficiency of revenue before 1842, the remedy shall be to lower or raise the duties on articles which bear a less rate than twenty per cent. ad valorem. This act has remained undisturbed by any movement from any quarter, till we are now within less than eighteen months of its limit. And my determination now is, no act of mine shall be such as to be tortured into a plea for the tariff men to refuse to carry out the principles of the compromise act.

Some difference of opinion, however, exists among honorable members as to the necessity of a revival of our revenue laws before 1842. Sir, said he, I contend that no one can read the act itself, the speeches which were delivered on the occasion by its prominent advocates, or understand the circumstances of its passage, and not freely admit that the compromise act was merely preliminary; setting forth principles, and leaving details for future adjustment.

Section third of that act begins thus:

"And be it further enacted, That, until the 30th day of June, 1842, the duties imposed by existing laws, as modified by this act, shall remain and continue to be collected."

The residue of that section is taken up in setting forth the principles of all future acts on this subject.

"And from and after the day last aforesaid, all duties upon imports shall be collected in ready money, and all credits now allowed by law in the payments of duties shall be, and hereby are, abolished; and such duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government; and from and after the day last aforesaid, the duties required to be paid by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be assessed upon the value thereof at the port where the same shall be entered, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law."

A fair interpretation of this section inclines me to the adoption of the opinion expressed by my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT], on yesterday, that, after the 30th day of June, 1842, not a dollar could be collected from duties on imports, unless there was a re-enactment of the present existing revenue laws, or some other.

But to return to the act itself. The fifth section, after enumerating a long list of articles which shall be admitted to entry free from duty after the 30th day of June, 1842, thus concludes:

"And all imports on which the first section of this act may operate, and all articles now admitted to entry free from duty, or paying a less rate of duty than twenty per cent. ad valorem, before the said thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, from and after that day, may be admitted to entry, subject to such duty, not exceeding twenty per cent. ad valorem, as shall be provided for by law."

And again: In the sixth section, power is reserved to guard against excess or deficiency of revenue till the 30th of June, 1842; leaving Congress to be guided after that date by the principles contained in the third section.

From all this, the inference to my mind is inevitable, that the compromise act of 1833 was considered as settling principles merely, and contemplated other legislation to fix the details.

This conclusion is strengthened greatly by the remarks which were made by Mr. CLAY and Mr. CALHOUN, who have ever been considered the high contracting parties on that occasion. A short extract from the speeches of each will be sufficient to settle that question.

In the remarks made by Mr. CLAY, when he introduced this compromise act, we find the following:

"What was the principle which had always been contended for in this and in the other House? That, after the accumulation of capital and skill, the manufacturers would stand alone, unaided by the Government, in competition with the imported articles from any quarter. Now, give us time; cease all fluctuations and agitations for nine years, and the manufacturers in every branch will sustain themselves against foreign competition. If we can see our way clearly for nine years to come, we can safely leave to posterity to provide for the rest."

Again: Mr. CALHOUN on the same question remarks:

"There may indeed, at the termination of the series, be a question raised likely to produce some excitement. He meant that of the distribution of the duties under the maximum rate of duty of twenty per cent. as fixed by the bill. But he had no fear that even then, with the light of our present experience, any will dare attempt to propose any distribution which shall not act with substantial justice between the great sections of the Union and the country."

Now, sir, it must be obvious that this question of tariff must soon be met. The principles of the compromise I trust will be held as sacred as the principles of the Constitution. But I regret to see this attempt to interfere with that question at the present session. In the first place, there is no necessity for it. In the second, we have not sufficient time to discuss and settle the details of a bill which I hope, when adopted, will prove perpetual. And, in the third place, the Democratic party, which is supposed to be in a majority in this House, (but certain indications on this subject, which I have lately observed, have led me to doubt that fact,) being in a minority before the country, ought not to undertake, from a due regard to the popular will, as evinced in the late elections, to settle this great and vexed question. And, in the fourth place, an overflowing Treasury is the bane of economy. The incoming administration has promised reform, and a straitened revenue will be the surest guarantee for the faithful performance of that promise. Before we adjust this tariff question, it is but right and proper to wait till we ascertain how far reform and a "vigorous reduction" will diminish the expenses of the Government.

But if we must go into this question now, I have insuperable objections to the plan proposed. The Opposition raise the cry, tax articles of luxury; the poor people do not consume silks and wines, and therefore they will not feel a tax upon these articles. Gentlemen need expect to get no advantage of me on this subject. Whenever it is proper to touch this subject, I will go as far as he who goes farthest in taxing luxuries. That has ever been the favorite policy of my constituents. For every cent which they will agree to take off of an article of necessity, I will give them two on an article of luxury. For every cent taken off of salt, I will give them two on silks; so that the humbug of the poor people shall not redound to the advantage of one side, at the cost of the other.

But of all the articles, which are admitted free of duty, why are silks selected? Are not teas as much articles of luxury? From my observation, I consider that the poor people consume as much of the one as the other. If ten per cent. on silks alone will raise sufficient revenue to satisfy the wants of gentlemen, two or three per cent. on all articles of luxury now admitted free of duty would raise the same amount, and interfere less with the regular course of trade. This, it seems, is to be a shot aimed at France and French trade. And what has France done to justify this movement; this attempted punishment? What was the reason which led to the present admission of French silks, free of duty, into our ports? Mr. Clay, in his speech on this very compromise act, makes known the real motive. He says:

"By the bill now proposed, the duty on French silks was proposed to be repealed, leaving the others untouched. He would frankly state why he made this distinction. It had been a subject of anxious desire with him to see our commerce with France increased. France, though not so large a customer in the great staple of our country as Great Britain, was a great growing customer. He had been much struck with a fact going to prove this, which accidentally came to his knowledge, which was, that within the short period of fourteen years, the amount of consumption in France of the great Southern staple of cotton had been tripled."

Upon observing this remark, I was induced to refer to the statistical tables to ascertain the effect of that law which went to the encouragement of French commerce with this country; and I was truly struck with the result. The following table shows the quantity of cotton exported to France:

			Pounds.
For the year ending 30th Sep. 1832			77,467,807
Do.	do.	do. 1833	75,119,894
Do.	do.	do. 1834	78,080,047
Do.	do.	do. 1835	99,586,448
Do.	do.	do. 1836	100,155,742
Do.	do.	do. 1837	98,551,299
Do.	do.	do. 1838	119,624,822
Do.	do.	do. 1839	89,109,737

This table clearly shows a fulfilment of that Senator's wishes. It shows, that as we have enlarged our consumption of French silks, she has enlarged her consumption of our cotton. I have carefully examined these ponderous tables of our exports to, and imports from, France, and the results are most favorable to the principles of "free trade." All commerce is but an exchange of the productions of one country for those of another, and unless we take French silks and French wines, she cannot and she will not take our cotton. The tendency of this measure will be, as I believe, to diminish the demand for cotton; (for it must be remembered, that fifteen-sixteenths* of our whole exports to France consists of raw cotton;) to depress and injure its sale; and consequently, to affect seriously the interests of my constituents. Therefore I deprecate the passage of this proposed tariff on silks at this time. It aims a blow, without adequate necessity, at a good and profitable market for our staples.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] joins issue with the President in a remark he makes at the opening of this session, that, during his administration, "the great purposes, for the attainment of which the Federal Government was instituted, have not been lost sight of." And, after enumerating a long list of objects which involve heavy expenditures of money, which have been withheld during this Administration, in all of which we differ, toto calo, he concludes, that it is the duty of this Government to regulate the State banks, and furnish to the people a sound uniform currency in the establishment of a National Bank, which has been neglected. On this subject history will do justice to this Administration. In a moment of great pecuniary pressure and difficulty, when ruin and bankruptcy stared us in the face on every side, when the stoutest heart began to quail, and the firmest nerve to tremble, it met the crisis and restored the Constitution. It would be a reproach to the wisdom of our ancestors to suppose, that in the formation of our Constitution, they had been silent on the subject of the circulation of this Government, which is the life-blood and soul of every society. They have not been silent. They say, "Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin;" and, also, "no State shall coin money, or make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." This is the sum and substance of all the power they deemed it safe to entrust into the hands of Congress over this delicate subject. They repudiated a National Bank when asked for in the convention, "as incompatible with the rights of the States and the liberties of the people." They declare that all power not conferred by the Constitution on the General Government, is reserved to the States and to the people. This, then, is the whole range of the authority entrusted to us to furnish the people a sound and uniform currency. The line of duty is plain. Let us but walk in the path prescribed by the founders of our institutions, and happiness, prosperity, and liberty, will be our rewards. Depart from it, and we enter a dangerous sea, without bounds or shores. Congress has no power to bank, directly or indirectly. We are bound to fix a standard of value, to coin money, and regulate the value thereof. Having done this, we have reached the terminus beyond which we dare not go without usurping power from the States and the people. We have twenty-six sovereignties. These can make banks at will, and unmake them when they fail to effectuate the objects of their creation. But they can never make their paper, money, or receivable as money, but with the consent of the citizen. Thus, by discharging our duty, and no more than our duty, the people will be induced to repudiate all paper promises which are not convertible into specie. And thus the framers of the Constitution intended Congress to aid in securing to our people a sound, uniform, and stable currency. Thus we will leave to all the States the full possession and enjoyment of all their reserved rights. But create your National Bank to regulate your State banks, and furnish a paper currency, (it may, and perhaps will, do it, if you will confer upon it plenary powers;) but, in so doing your trench upon State sovereignty, in creating an engine whose object is to control and govern the institutions of the States. You imply that the States, who have the power to create banking corporations, are unable to rule and manage the workmanship of their own hands; to restrain and keep within metes and bounds their own offspring. You create a master to regulate with stripes, with the infliction of condign punishment, the freaks and caprices of these disorderly and unmanageable children of the States. Well, sir, suppose I admit the State Legislatures cannot regulate the State banks, in which I fear there is some truth, does not the question recur, Who will regulate a National Bank? Let every citizen in this wide spread Republic ask himself, what authority can or will regulate a National Bank? Can you depend upon this House? I intend no reflection upon this body; but create this mighty giant, whose strength, and power, and influence can, almost in a day, reach and pervade the remotest corner of this vast continent, and, instead of being regulated by Congress, it will regulate Congress.

But suppose you create a bank with the capital and power contemplated; (and to make it efficient you must clothe it with these powers,) you put into its keeping the money of the people, and thereby you confer upon it the whole credit of this Government. Its notes will be received as specie; perhaps will be preferred. These notes will find their way into the vaults of all the State banks, and become the basis of their issues. Instead of specie, the local banks will redeem their circulation in United States paper. Gold and silver will not be wanted, and will be considered an inconvenience and an incumbrance; and, obeying the necessary laws of trade, will disappear from our country, and find their way to that nation where they are in demand. When the sympathetic chord is once arranged—and, to reach that point, most afflicting will be the pecuniary distresses of the country—when the National Bank expands, the State banks will expand; and when the National Bank contracts, the State banks will be forced to contract also. Thus, in practice, in point of fact, the notes of the National Bank will become the standard of value. What principle will guide the movements of that bank? Avarice—the soul, if it has a soul: the ruling principle of every banking corporation is avarice. Thus, as it may suit the interest, the views, or the policy of the majority of the stockholders, money in this country will be plentiful or scarce. The standard of value is to be changed at the will of selfish speculators and stockjobbers. Is this your stable, uniform currency, which to-day stands at fifty millions, to-morrow at seventy, and next day at one hundred millions, and on the fourth day returns to fifty millions? Would that be considered a stable, uniform measure, which to-day measured three feet, to-morrow six feet, and on the third, measured only two feet? From such a currency, when the makers of it will feel interested in its variability, may Providence save my country. It will be as changeable as the wind; as fickle as the "shade of the aspen leaf."

On this subject the gentleman is surely mistaken. This Administration has done its duty, and deserves the thanks of the people; and I doubt not will receive them, for adhering, in the most trying emergencies, "to the sacred obligations of law;" in executing all Government contracts "according to the requirements of the Constitution;" and thus, in presenting, "when most needed, a rallying point by which the business of the whole country has been brought back to a safe and unvarying standard."

The great purposes for which this Government was created, are few and simple. To conduct our intercourse with foreign nations, to provide and maintain a navy for the protection of our commerce with the world, to raise and support an army to guard our defenceless frontier from the incursions of the ruthless savage, to coin money and fix the standard of weights and measures, constitute the main objects designed by our Revolutionary ancestors in the formation of this confederacy. Where is the just ground of complaint under these heads?

Exports to France.

	1835.	1836.	1837.	1838.	1839.
	Dollars.	Dollars.	Dollars.	Dollars.	Dollars.
Exports	20,075,066	21,441,200	19,750,253	15,822,405	18,336,854
Cotton	17,460,415	17,519,787	15,265,679	12,360,073	13,323,142
Tobacco	937,129	954,846	723,842	1,232,410	810,093
Rice	245,817	413,548	274,625	139,525	320,911

The wisdom, firmness, and forbearance, which have characterized our foreign intercourse, have challenged and received the approbation of all parties. Our navy has enlarged and strengthened; and though our commerce has increased, and the canvass of our trading vessels whiten every sea under the canopy of Heaven, yet our flag is honored, and our name respected every where. Our army has proved sufficient for the defence of the country; and the constitutional standard of value maintained under the most trying circumstances.

My ideas of government evidently differ widely from those of the honorable gentleman. They are drawn from the writings and sayings of the great Republicans who have gone before me, "A splendid Government, and an impoverished people," such as we find in Great Britain, I abominate. In my estimation, the following constitute the outlines of a perfect Government, and consequently light taxation; and a pure and speedy administration of justice.

Though I have detained the committee longer than I intended, it would be considered unpardonable in me to conclude these remarks without noticing the reference of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Evans] to the present embarrassment of the State of Mississippi. In speaking of the present condition of the country, he asks, can Mississippi be in a state of prosperity when, but a year or two since, the United States marshal received $37,000 for fees? I take it for granted that this reference was made in no spirit of unkindness to that people. Every representative, I presume, feels proud of his constituents; but no member on this floor has stronger reasons to entertain that sentiment with heartfelt sincerity than the humble individual who now addresses you. For intelligence, energy of character, enterprise, noble bearing, a lofty sense of honor, and a generous confidence in public agents, my constituents stand second to no people on earth. And I will seize this occasion to explain their present condition and future prospects.

I begin with the odious tariff of 1823, as the fruitful source of all the ravages which have swept like a tornado over this fair country, leaving the most palpable and striking marks of their severity with the people I have the honor to represent. The immediate consequences of that act were felt in the diminished demand for exports. Our cotton was carried abroad, and instead of being exchanged for the productions of other countries, it was sold for American funds, which were brought into this country and invested for the most part in American manufactures. This enabled our banks to enlarge their issues, our circulation became enlarged, the cost of producing domestic articles enhanced, till, at last, our merchants were able to pay the price of foreign articles, import them into this country, add on the heavy duties, and then successfully compete the market with domestic manufacturers. This state of things began about the year 1832, four years after the passage of that tariff law which constitutes an era in the history of this Government. Simultaneous with which, was the enactment of the tariff law of 1832, which was modified by the compromise act of 1833, which caused a progressive reduction of duties on foreign articles. This was followed by an increased demand for the products of this country for exportation. The importation from foreign countries increased pari passu. Cotton being the chief article of export, invited capitalists from every quarter. Mississippi lands were in high demand, and the production of that article increased with a rapidity unparalleled in the growth of this country. To prove this, it is but necessary to cast our eye over the following table:

The exports of cotton in 1829 were -	$26,575,314
" " in 1830 -	29,674,883
" " in 1832 -	31,724,682

It is yet in the memory of all those who were engaged in the growth of that article, that, during these four years, their crops yielded them a less amount than at any period of four years, since cotton has been an article of any consequence, previous to or subsequent to that time. Both land and negroes were at a remarkably low price, and all business in the Southern States pined and dwindled. But take another period of four years.

Exports of cotton.
1833 -	$36,191,105
1834 -	49,448,402
1835 -	64,961,302

Thus it will be seen that in four years, the production of cotton was more than doubled. It will be recollected, however, that the demand was increased, and the prices greatly enhanced. Mississippi now became the centre of all moneyed operations; it was viewed as the El Dorado of the South. Your Southern and Western highways were thronged with emigrants to that fair land. Men congratulated themselves when they were able to place their foot upon Mississippi soil. Fortune was thought to be there, freely dispensing her favors to all her votaries; and the ardent fancy saw boundless wealth blooming in her cotton fields.

But, sir, it is necessary to notice in this connection two other events which have had a material bearing upon the State of Mississippi. In 1830, the Government of the United States made a treaty with the Choctaw Indians, by which it acquired 7,796,000 acres of cotton lands. In 1834, a treaty was concluded with the Chickasaw Indians, and more than 6,000,000 acres of land were brought into market; all in the State of Mississippi. These lands opened a wide field for speculation, and had a direct influence upon the legislation of the State. Capitalists, as it was before stated, gathered in from every quarter in flocks and swarms, to purchase fresh cotton lands. At home, the want of money was felt by our citizens, to compete with citizens from other States in the purchase of these rich and fertile lands. The reasoning on the part of our Legislature, under the principles which then obtained, was most natural to induce them to create capital for the use of their own people. They made banks to make money to buy lands, and thus enrich their constituents; for it must be remembered that, in those days, it was the received opinion of many, however ridiculous that opinion may now appear, that the creation of a bank was bringing into existence of so much additional capital. In hot haste bank charters were obtained; in hot haste these banks were put into operation; in hot haste the money was loaned out to adventurers. The loss of an hour was considered well nigh the loss of a fortune. The discounts were had; wild lands were bought, farms were opened, negroes and stock were purchased and placed upon them, and all went on most prosperously. Cotton alone was produced, however, and every thing else was obtained from abroad. But, as long as the banks could expand their issues, all was well; all was life and animation, and prosperity and happiness. Rumor was ever busy in pointing to some lucky wight who had grown rich by a fortunate turn of speculation. This led on hundreds in eager pursuit. It is true, morality suffered. Mechanics, though they received the most ample reward for their labors, deserted their trades; the various professions neglected their pursuits. The toil and pains-taking which distinguished our frugal ancestors were subjects of ridicule. A nearer road had been found, by bank makers, to the attainment of the great desideratum of our people: the philosopher's stone had been discovered. Speculation was the secret.

But, in the spring of 1837, the cord was snapped, and reality burst upon us. The delusion which had enwrapped our senses, suddenly vanished. The banks had strained their credit till public confidence was destroyed. Consternation was seen in every countenance. The hope which buoyed up the heart of the parent, and the bright prospects which delighted the fancy of families, in a moment were swept away. The cup which had been all sweetness and exhilaration was now dashed with gall and wormwood. And then it was that the fees of our marshal reached the enormous sum of $87,000.

But, sir, I verily believe the crisis is passed. We have sowed to the wind, we have reaped the whirlwind. We have experienced the bitter fruits of our own misdoing. And, in many instances, our legislation has been unwise, without question. By such a reverse, any other people would have been thrown back for years in their onward march. We have tried, to the uttermost, legislative relief and bank relief, but all in vain. Energy, industry, enterprise, and honor, yet remain; dear-bought experience has taught us salutary lessons of economy and frugality. Our genial climate, our fertile soil, and our rich staple, are all our own. On these we base our hopes. On these and a kind protecting Providence we rely. Nor will our reliance be in vain. It must be evident to all, that with an annual production of a surplus staple worth twenty millions in specie, without unjust and prejudicial legislation on the part of the General Government, Mississippi must ere long become the fairest daughter of the South.

BANKS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, February 23, 1841.

The bill to revive and continue in existence the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia being taken up,

Mr. CLAY of Alabama rose to propose an amendment. He moved first to strike out the figure two in the 9th line of section and to substitute three, thereby extending the existence of the charters to the fourth day of March, 1843, instead of the same day of 1842. He next proposed to strike out all after the section and insert as follows:

Provided The said banks shall each for itself redeem all its notes and specie liabilities in specie when demanded from and after the passage of this act, and throughout the whole period for which the said several charters are hereby extended. And in the event that any one or more of said banks shall decline to meet its liabilities in specie as aforesaid, or having commenced to pay a specie, shall, hereafter, during the period aforesaid, cease or fail to do so, any bank so declining, ceasing, or failing to pay in specie, shall, ipso facto, forfeit its charter, and shall proceed to wind up its concerns under the provisions of the law passed on the 3d of July, 1840, entitled "An act to continue the corporate existence of certain banks in the District of Columbia for certain purposes," which said act is hereby made applicable in all its provisions to every of said banks failing as aforesaid, for the period of two years from the date of any such failure or neglect to pay in specie. And any attempt by the officers of any of said banks so as above said forfeiting its charter, after any such forfeiture, to exercise any of the banking privileges conferred by this act, shall subject such officers to all the penalties of illegal banking.

The object he had in view would be apparent on reading the amendment; it was to continue the corporate existence of the banks for two years from the fourth of March, but it was on consideration that they pay specie on demand for their notes under the penalty of a forfeiture of their charters.

Mr. MERRICK said that circumstances connected with this subject had recently occurred, which were very different from what they were when this bill was reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia—many important changes had taken place in the banks and the currency, since that time, of so important a character that he was now induced to think that the amendment was better than the original bill; and he had risen to say that he should offer no opposition to its adoption.

Mr. PRENTISS made a few observations, which were not distinctly heard.

Mr. MERRICK was understood to reply that the bill of last session would still be applicable, and compel them to wind up their affairs.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT desired to make a further amendment to the bill, to prohibit the banks discounting and paying out notes not their own—of banks that were not paying specie, and of railroad companies, that were not redeemable in specie.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama would agree that the banks should not pay out, but he objected to a provision that would prevent their receiving such notes.

Mr. WRIGHT submitted his amendment in the following terms:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That neither of the said banks shall, by virtue of any thing in this act contained, be authorized to issue or pay out any note, bill, check, or draft of any bank company, incorporation, association, or individual, which said note, bill, check, or draft, shall not be payable and paid on demand in specie at the place where it is made payable; and any violation of this restriction shall be, ipso facto, a forfeiture of all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act in the manner specified in the first section thereof as to a failure of specie payments.

Mr. MERRICK was sorry this amendment had been offered. He desired to restore the banks to the condition of those in the surrounding districts, but their business was limited, and he did not wish to place them in a different condition than those in the adjacent country of Virginia and Maryland. He wished them to be specie paying banks, but he did not wish them to be restricted from the use of paper, which was commonly received by the people of the District. He was sorry that any gentleman should be disposed to make a distinction in the mode of doing business between these and surrounding banks.

Mr. WRIGHT did not desire now, at this late stage of the session, to occupy much time on the subject of these bank charters. He had very settled views in reference to proper charters for banking institutions, but it was not his intention to present them here. The proposition before the Senate as now amended by the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] was simply to renew, or rather revise the charters of these institutions, and extend them a sufficient time to enable a new Congress to act permanently upon the subject of banks for the District. He did not, in reference to legislation so temporary, wish to discuss the general subject of banking and bank charters. If he could see simple provisions adopted which would make the institutions safe, and their currency sound for this short period, he should be content. Such was the provision and the object of the amendment of the honorable Senator which had been adopted, and such was his object in offering the amendment now under consideration, to prohibit these banks from paying out irredeemable paper. The amendment of the Senator was good as far as it went, and made the banks specie paying banks in terms, but it did not go far enough. If, while compelled to redeem their own notes in specie on demand, these institutions were permitted to issue and pay out at pleasure the notes of other banks, of railroad companies, and the like, which were not redeemable, and not redeemed in specie, the specie paying provisions of the honorable Senator would be useless in fact, and in practice, though sound in principle, and unexceptionable in form.

Look at the banks of Maryland. He did not know that any of them were specie paying banks now, even in form, but he had seen that, by a recent law of the Legislature of the State, they were all authorized to pay out the notes of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company; a company which has no other power to issue notes to circulate as money, than a blind and doubtful implication from the provisions of a charter, intended simply to confer the power to construct a railroad; and which, assuming banking powers upon such a basis, he believed did not make its notes, even in form, payable on demand in specie, and certainly did not either so redeem them in fact, or even make the pretence of doing so. With such notes for the currency of the banks of Maryland, of what use were specie paying provisions in their charters? To the public, for whose benefit the banking powers were conferred, or should have been conferred, none whatever.

In reference to these District banks the Senate was not without abundant experience. These charters had been several times extended since he had been a member of the body, and what sort of a currency had they commonly paid out? The notes of this very Railroad Company, the notes of the corporate cities of the District, and various other descriptions of irredeemable paper. Indeed, much of the currency which had been heretofore circulated by these banks was not in fact redeemed any where, and could not be collected by law any where. It was the paper of incorporations declaredly insolvent, and as unable, as apparently unwilling, to pay.

Were they then constituting specie paying banks, with the right to issue and pay out such paper? With the right to furnish to the community such a currency? Would the Senate delude itself by so preposterous a supposition? But gentlemen urged that the banks ought to be permitted to take uncurrent and irredeemable paper upon deposit, and so receiving it, to pay it out upon the checks of depositors. What broader power than this did the banks want, or could they wish, to enable them to transact all their business in irredeemable paper not their own? Certainly none. The moment this authority was given, nothing was to be done but to make their arrangement with the Railroad Company, or any other corporation or individual, for the use of a sufficient quantity of irredeemable notes, place them in deposit in the bank to the credit of its officers or clerks, and pay them out at pleasure upon their checks. Thus the banks would be in fact, what the Senate does not intend to make them, irredeemable banks of the worst character—banks of issue of an irredeemable paper which they do not even promise to pay, nor make themselves legally liable to pay at any time, or in any manner. Instead of issuing their own notes, which they are bound by the bill to pay on demand, and in gold and silver, they will merely issue paper which is not simply irredeemable, but absolutely uncollectable.

What was the honest and practical banking rule upon this subject every where? That a bank refuses to receive all paper which is uncurrent, or not equal to its own, whether offered in payment, or for deposit, or receives it at par? Surely not. It receives such paper at its value and gives credit for that value, not for the nominal amount. It is not the custom of solvent banks to receive uncurrent paper as par and pay it out again at par. The value of the paper is fixed before it is received, and the depositor has a credit for that value as for a deposit of current paper or specie. His own experience had been extensive upon this point. His residence was upon the frontier, where the paper of the Canada banks had always had an extensive circulation, frequently as great as that of the banks of the States, and yet it never was current. All the banks upon the frontiers take that paper at its market value, either in payment, or for deposit, the value being agreed upon when the paper is received, and none of them have ever thought, nor have the citizens, of going to the Legislatures of their States for authority to pay out this uncurrent foreign paper. The citizens would not endure such a law, because it would retain the uncurrent and depreciated paper among them and make it their exclusive currency. The sound rule takes it from them. It centres in the banks and is sent home for redemption.

Is the practice under this sound rule injurious to the just interests of any of the parties? It seemed to him not. The depositor loses nothing, because he receives the value of his uncurrent paper. If he sustains loss at all, it was sustained when he took the paper for more than it was worth, or because it has depreciated in his hands, not because he sells it for money and for what it is worth. The bank loses nothing, because it merely pays the present value for depreciated paper. So far, therefore, the transaction is equal and just. How then is the great interest affected? The community? Most beneficially. The uncurrent paper is taken from circulation, and its value, in gold and silver, or in paper which is convertible into gold and silver, is substituted in its place, as a part of the currency. The sound rule, then, is safe to all parties and essentially beneficial to the whole public. The mischievous operation of the opposite one, that of permitting banks to receive uncurrent paper upon deposit and again pay it out upon checks, has been glanced at; and the experience of the last few years, and the condition of the banks of the country at this moment, supersede the necessity of further remarks upon it.

In but one way could this view of the case be obscured. It might be said, if the depositor were permitted to deposit his uncurrent paper as at par, and check upon the bank for it, he would sustain no loss. This might be true in fact and in practice, but it could only be so because the depositor would, by this legerdemain of legislation, be able to throw off his loss upon his creditors; and in that case, upon what class of his creditors would the loss be likely to fall? Not upon the wealthy, for they would not receive his check payable at the bank in uncurrent funds in payment of their debts. They could command dollar for dollar and would have it. Upon what class then? The laborers. They must have their pay to obtain bread, and the question of time with them was more material than that of loss upon depreciated paper. They must take the checks, because they must eat.

It was this very consequence which he wished to avoid, and he could not tolerate the idea that the wealthy were to have a deposit of spurious funds in the banks, out of which they were to be permitted, by the express terms of our laws, to compensate the poor for their sweat and labor.

A desire for special deposits of this character seemed to exist. Permit them to any extent. As he understood special deposits, they may be made of any thing; of plate, of valuable papers, of pictures, as well as of that which is called money, and in any shape are only to be returned to the depositor. In that shape let uncurrent and irredeemable paper be deposited, and he would not object to it. If there were those who wished to preserve such paper, he was not one of them, nor was he an enemy to them. If the vaults of a bank were requisite for the preservation, while he could not doubt the power of any bank in the world to receive such a special deposit and return it, he would be the last man to refuse the right, in legislating upon the subject; but to check upon special deposits was, to his mind, like a proposition to check upon the title deeds of an estate, upon family pictures, or upon any other property of the like character. And the authority to check upon uncurrent money, as such, in deposit is a bank, was merely to ask general authority for the bank to issue uncurrent notes as a currency.

His amendment did not interfere with the receipts of the banks. He would not, if he could, prohibit them from receiving, upon their own terms, any circulating paper, however uncurrent; but he would not, by his vote, permit them to pay out any other than a currency of gold and silver, or a currency of paper convertible into those metals at the pleasure of the holder. This was the mixed currency he was prepared to favor, and no other, and this was a limitation of banking powers which he could not forego, for any time, or upon any consideration.

If a different course could foster the true interests of the people of this District, about whose helpless condition they were accustomed to hear so much, and so eloquently delivered, from the honorable chairman of the Committee on the District, he was unable to see the legislation in that light, and, therefore, could not be a party to it. His impression had been, that, if these institutions were to benefit the people in their currency, their most useful agency was to consist in the fact that any thing which passed into them, in the shape of currency of an uncurrent character, was never to pass out from them in the same character. In this sense the utility of banks was to him apparent; but if they were to be mere institutions for the issue and circulation of uncurrent and irredeemable paper, to circulate as a currency, he should be ready to deny their utility, and to consent to their perfect termination at the earliest possible period. If banks were to be revived for this declaredly poor District, which should be authorized by our law to flood the markets of the District with a paper, called money, which mortal man cannot collect any where, and any how, he must be pardoned for refusing his assent to their existence for an hour, much less for months or years.

His impressions had ever been, that one of the most useful offices of sound banks was to take the uncurrent paper of the bad ones, and of the other irredeemable incorporations and associations, as well as individuals, from circulation, and to substitute a currency of value in its place. If this was not to be so in future, he should be compelled to call upon the friends of banks for some further grounds for their utility before he could favor them.

His earnest object was to give these banks life for the shortest period, which would fairly enable the new Congress to act permanently upon the whole subject, and to have that brief life given upon principles which could be sustained in the permanent action, and which, in any event, would not compromise his settled views upon the great question involved.

Mr. MERRICK said it would be observed that under the bill as amended by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] the banks could not pay out any thing but specie, unless by consent of the person receiving it: they would be compelled to pay on demand all their liabilities in specie. But the amendment goes further, and denies them the right to pay what the citizens were willing to receive as a currency. He had been told that the paper of specie paying banks of the District, as compared with notes of non-specie paying banks of Baltimore, was at one per cent. discount; and there were many cases in which the notes of other banks would be much more valuable to persons having a debt to pay in Baltimore. He thought they had given the citizen all he could require when they gave him specie on demand for the issues of the banks.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said the proposed amendment of the Senator from New York would act as an inhibition of the banks receiving the notes of non-specie paying banks at all; for if he were to bring notes of non-specie paying banks of Alabama—and unfortunately there were such banks in Alabama—and wished to deposit them with the banks here, he could not do so under this proposed amendment, as it would prevent him from drawing them out again. He therefore proposed to amend the amendment by the addition of this proviso:

Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall prohibit either of said banks from receiving the paper of any non-specie paying bank of special deposit, and returning the same to the depositor on his check.

The honorable Senator's amendment distinctly prohibited the paying out of non-specie paying bank notes, no matter how the banks became possessed of them. He (Mr. CLAY) might deposit with them notes of non-specie paying banks in Alabama, and this amendment would deprive them of the right to pay him back his own money, as the banks would be prohibited from paying out the money of an individual which was not of the description contemplated. Now, to some persons it would seem, from what he had understood some days ago, that the paper of the non-specie paying banks of Baltimore would be better than the paper of Virginia now paying specie; and, therefore, as well as for the reasons he had before given, he hoped his amendment would be adopted.

Mr. WRIGHT said, if the words "on the payment of his check" were stricken out, he did not think the amendment would amount to any thing, and, therefore, he should not oppose it. He was as willing that the banks should take irredeemable paper on special deposit as the honorable Senator could be, but he did not wish to see it paid out again. Now just see the effect of the honorable Senator's amendment—and he would detain the Senate but for a moment. Suppose that he, as a business man, deposited ten thousand dollars of irredeemable paper with these banks, and he then gave his check to a friend for five thousand dollars, and another check to his honorable friend for the residue of the ten thousand dollars, was not this a distribution of that irredeemable paper amongst the community, as much as if it were paid out by the bank? But what did the honorable Senator tell them? Why in effect that the charters were good for nothing without the privilege. But would they call it a special deposit, and yet direct that it should be paid out on his check? Why it would thus become as general a deposit as can be made in a bank. If it were made as a special deposit, it must be returned identically to the depositor; but the moment they authorized it to be checked upon, they authorized it to become the currency of the country.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama explained that the usual practice was to pay out even special deposits on the check of the depositor; and he hoped the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] would not prevail.

Mr. SEVIER desired to ask his friend from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] a single question, to which he hoped the honorable Senator would, in candor, say yes or no. Would the honorable Senator from New York vote for the bill, if his amendment were adopted?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. SEVIER. That was better than he had expected; and he should therefore make no speech.

After a few words of explanation between Mr. MERRICK, Mr. BENTON, Mr. WRIGHT, and Mr. CLAY, the words objected to by the Senator from New York were withdrawn; and in that shape the proviso of the Senator from Alabama was adopted without a division.

The question then came up on the amendment proposed by Mr. TAPPAN to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert as an amendment a bill embracing the following features:

Every stockholder shall record his stock in the clerk's office, the schedule of the same to be published every three months in the newspapers of the District; every sale and transfer to be placed on record, and published within ten days.

To issue no notes of less than $20, under a penalty of five hundred dollars.

If specie be refused, enabling any justice to enter up judgment with 20 per cent. damages, and cost of suit.

Making the passing of any note by any individual, of less than $20, liable to a forfeiture of double the amount of the note.

That if any person shall establish a bank and issue notes as money, without means of redeeming the same in current coin, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; and on conviction shall be imprisoned not less than three nor more than ten years.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama hoped the Senator from Ohio would now consent to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. TAPPAN rose, and spoke in support of his amendment at length, ultimately giving way for a motion to adjourn.

REMARKS OF MR. CARR,

OF INDIANA.

In the House of Representatives, March 2, 1841.—The House being in Committee of the Whole on the bill "making appropriation for surveys and other purposes."

Mr. CARR said he was desirous of offering an additional section to the bill as an amendment, if it were in order so to do; and in order that the CHAIR might judge whether the amendment he desired to offer would be in order, he would send it to the Clerk's table to be read, and it was read as follows:

'And be it further enacted, That the sum of five thousand dollars be appropriated for the purpose of making a survey and examination of the Louisville and Portland Canal as to its capacity to do the business required, and also as to the propriety or impropriety of expending money to improve the same, with a view to suit the state of trade and commerce of the country, and the coast thereof.

Also, a survey and examination of the Indian chute through the falls of the Ohio river, with a view of judging of the propriety or impropriety of improving the navigation through the falls. And also a survey and examination, with a view of judging of the propriety or impropriety of constructing a canal round the falls of the Ohio river on the Indiana shore and the probable cost thereof; suited to the state of the trade and commerce of the country, said surveys and examinations to be made under the direction of the Secretary of War."

which amendment was decided by the chairman [Mr. WISE] to be in order.

Mr. C. went on to state that he had been induced to offer this amendment upon an estimate made by the chief of the Topographical Bureau, and the recommendation of the Secretary of War, sent to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in favor of such appropriation, for the purposes designated in his amendment, which estimate and recommendation of the Secretary of War were made in pursuance of a letter which he had the honor to address to the Secretary of War; which letter and answer were read as follows:

WASHINGTON, June 4, 1840.

Sir: I beg leave to present to you the amended bill, as reported to the Senate by the Committee on Roads and Canals, having for its object the improvement of the navigation at the falls of the Ohio river, and which provides that the money expended shall be done under the direction of the Secretary of War, and

It further provides for an examination, survey, and report, but that no expenditure for improving the navigation, at the point mentioned, shall be incurred until an examination, survey, and report thereof be made.

I also enclose to you the letter and answer of Mr. Anderson of Kentucky to twelve questions propounded to him, relating to the above mentioned subject. There are many other statements made by gentlemen of high standing, relating to the same subject, which have been presented to Congress, and referred to the committee in the Senate having charge of the subject, with the reading of which I do not desire to trouble you, all expressing a desire that something may be done to relieve the commerce from the burdens now imposed upon it, by improving the navigation at that point in some way, either by improving the present canal, or the navigation through the falls of the river, or to improve both, or to construct a canal on the Indiana shore.

This is a subject of vast importance, in which a large portion of the people of the United States is deeply interested; near one half of the whole number of the States of the Union are directly interested in it.

From the advanced period of the present session of Congress, it is feared by many who feel a lively interest in this matter, and who desire that something may be speedily done, that Congress will not find time to act upon the before mentioned bill during the present session; I therefore most respectfully inquire, in the absence of the passage of said bill, if the Secretary at War would have the power to cause such survey and examination to be made during the present season; and if not, I beg leave to suggest, if, in the judgment of the Secretary it be deemed proper, to furnish the Committee of Ways and Means with an estimate, with a view to an appropriation for the making said survey, examination, and report, to wit: as to the capacities of the present canal to do the business required, also as to the propriety or impropriety of expending money to improve the same, with a view to equal the state of the trade and commerce on that river, and the cost thereof; also, as to the propriety or impropriety of improving the navigation through the falls, and the probable cost thereof; and also as to the propriety or impropriety of constructing a canal on the Indiana shore, suited to the state of commerce of the river, with the cost of constructing it; which appropriation might be engrafted on some of the appropriation bills yet to be acted upon, and passed during the present session; then the survey and examination might be made, and a report made the next session of the present Congress, when the members could act understandingly upon the subject.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN CARR.

Hon. J. R. POINSETT,
Secretary of War.

BUREAU OF TOPOGRAPHICAL ENGINEERS,
Washington, June 11th, 1840.

SIR: In reference to the letter of the 4th instant from the Hon. J. Carr, I have the honor to report:

The letter desires information if, "in the absence of the passage of said bill, (a bill to authorize the purchase of stock for the United States in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company,) the Secretary of War would have the power to cause such survey and examination to be made during the present season; and if not, I beg leave to suggest, if, in the judgment of the Secretary it be deemed proper, to furnish the Committee of Ways and Means with an estimate, with a view to an appropriation for the making said survey, examination, and report, viz: as to the capacity of the present canal to do the business required; also, as to the propriety or impropriety of expending money to improve the same, with a view to the state of trade and commerce on that river, and the cost thereof; also, as to the propriety or impropriety of improving the navigation through the falls, and the probable cost thereof; and also as to the propriety or impropriety of constructing a canal on the Indiana shore."

The foregoing extract states so fully the object of the survey that further remark in reference to the same is unnecessary. The power of the Department to order it is embarrassed only by the want of funds, of which there is at present none at its disposal admissible of such an application. The cost of such a survey has, in my judgment, been estimated judiciously in the bill before referred to, at $5,000: which amount I respectfully recommend to your consideration as necessary to make the survey indicated, and as requisite to be appropriated before the survey can be made.

Very respectfully, &c.

J. J. ABERT,

Colonel Topographical Engineers.

Hon. J. R. POINSETT, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, JUNE 12, 1840.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 4th instant, asking if, in the absence of the passage of the bill now before the Senate, to authorize the purchase of stock for the United States in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, the Secretary of War would have the power to cause a survey and examination to be made, having for its object the improvement of the channel of the Ohio river at the falls of the Ohio, and offering certain suggestions, I have the honor to inform you that the power of the Department to order it is embarrassed only by the want of funds, of which there is at present none at its disposal admissible of such an application. The cost of such a survey has, in my judgment, been estimated judiciously in the bill at five thousand dollars, which amount is thought to be necessary to make the survey indicated, and requisite to be appropriated before the survey can be made. The matter will, however, be brought before the Committee of Ways and Means for its consideration and action.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Hon. JOHN CARR,
House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT, JUNE 12, 1840.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit you a report of the Colonel of Topographical Engineers, prepared in answer to a letter of the Hon. J. Carr, of the House of Representatives, on the subject of an appropriation, to be expended in causing an examination and survey to be made of the nature and extent of the improvement of the channel of the Ohio river at the falls.

In transmitting this report, I beg leave to state that the subject is deemed of sufficient importance to justify the Department in asking an appropriation for it to the amount mentioned in the report, ($5,000), and I therefore respectfully ask, through you, the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means in bringing the matter before the House.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. R. POINSETT.

Hon. J. W. JONES,

Chairman Com. Ways and Means, House of Reps.

Mr. CARR went on to show that the agricultural, and, in fact, all interests of the country, were heavily burdened in the way of tolls levied and collected for the passage of boats and tonnage through the canal; that it was important that something should be done to relieve the community from the burden now imposed. He said he believed it was limited that the present canal was not capacitated to suit the state of the trade and commerce of the country; and inasmuch as there was great diversity of opinion as to the best and proper mode to improve the navigation at that point, and to reduce the burdens now imposed, he had been induced, by the petition and solicitation of very many persons interested, to take the course he had taken in this important matter, and to ask for an appropriation for the purposes designated in his amendment. When this was done, and a report made, Congress could act understandingly on the subject. Mr. C. trusted, inasmuch as this was a matter of much moment, the appropriation being small, and having been recommended by the Secretary of War as being proper, that no objection would be made to it.

SPEECH OF MR. STEENROD,

OF VIRGINIA.

In the House of Representatives, February 18, 1841—

On the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1841.

Mr. STEENROD rose and said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I had hoped that, after the Presidential election was over, the partisan warfare would, at least for a time, be suspended; that the public mind would be satiated with the past, and return to its accustomed pursuits and engagements; and that we would reassemble here, at this session of Congress, to see carried out these principles of reform and economy, for which certain gentlemen professed so much regard. I do not believe, sir, the professions of gentlemen here, in favor of economy and reform, are supported by the principles which they advocate and sustain. I have heard advocated on this floor, the proposition for an extra session of Congress: that may require State Legislatures to be convened, to order special elections; that will call the people from the fields and workshops at an unusual time; and will require the members of Congress to meet here in the dog-days, (as remarked by my colleague, Mr. Wise,) at an extraordinary public expense. I hear advocated the proposition to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States; when we are told by the same gentlemen, that the Treasury is bankrupt. I hear advocated the raising of the revenue of the Government, and increasing the expenditures for the public service. Each and all of which propositions, I deem alike opposed to economy, and the genius of our institutions. Now, the economy with which the people of this country expect this Government to be administered, is of no vague and uncertain character. It stands defined on the statute-book; it has passed the ordeal of the people's scrutiny, and become, by public approval, interwoven with the past policy of the Government. It is to collect no more revenue—to impose no more taxes on the people—than are necessary for an economical administration of the Government, and to limit the expenditures for its acknowledged constitutional purposes, to the smallest possible amount consistent with the public interest. This is the policy established by the preceding and the present Administrations.

In 1829, when the Republican party were restored to power and place, they found the country in debt, and taxed to the highest point of endurance, for purposes unwarranted by the Constitution, and unknown to its Revolutionary framers. The then President's aim was to restore the Constitution, and to put the Government again on its

Republican track and destination, to confine it to the few and simple purposes for which it had been instituted, and to leave the State authorities free and untrammelled, to guard the rights and the municipal interests of the citizen. The course then recommended to effect this policy, was to reduce the revenue of the Government to the wants of an economical Administration; and this policy was adopted by the act commonly known as the compromise act. I do not now mean to refer to that act as reconciling the great and opposing interests of the manufacturer of the North and the planter of the South, which had so long agitated this country with its earthquake-like commotion, and not only portended a dissolution of the Union, but threatened to deluge the land with blood, and crowd the scaffold with some of the country's most gifted and distinguished sons. Nor do I intend to refer to that act as having reduced the revenue of the Government during the last and present Administrations, nearly one hundred millions of dollars, on those articles which entered into the daily use of every consumer; nor do I design to refer to that act as the pre-eminent indication given by this nation of its purpose to sustain and advance the doctrines of free trade, in opposition to the restrictive policy of the nations of the old world. But I would refer to it as a declaration of policy by the Government, that the revenues shall not exceed an economical administration. This is the pledge given to the tax-payer: that the Government will not extort from him; that it shall not have unlimited control over the earnings of industry; that it will not require any more taxes from him than what are necessary for an economical Government. That is what I conceive the most valuable in this act—the declaration of the policy—the establishment of a principle by the Government which has been sanctioned here, and approved by the constituency. I said, sir, that the declared policy of this Government was, that the expenditures for the acknowledged constitutional purposes of the Government, should be limited to the smallest possible amount consistent with the public service. Here, sir, permit me to invite your consideration to the deposit act of 1836. There you see, sir, that, while the other nations of the globe were scheming and planning to impose the utmost farthing of taxation that human industry could endure, to sustain large standing armies, superb systems of fortifications, magnificent naval forces, and the splendor and idleness of privileged orders; this Government we see planning to return back to the people, by constitutional means, money collected by the Government, that was not needed for an economical and constitutional expenditure. And we there see, by this act, that, instead of making large and extravagant expenditures for acknowledged constitutional purposes, the surplus revenue was ordered to be deposited with the States, for the use and benefit of the people, until required for the public service, or the defence of the country. That economy, which was deemed one of the chief virtues in a Republic, might not be perilled; that great patronage in any one of the departments, which is dreaded as one of its chief vices, might not be here fostered by the expenditures of large sums of money for the public service; and that the burdens of Government might rest lightly on the citizen, it was deemed wise policy to deposit this money with the States, until it should be required for the defence and service of the Government.

Am I not right, then, Mr. Chairman, in saying that the declared policy of this Government consisted, in an eminent degree, in a revenue for an economical Administration—in an expenditure, limited to the smallest amount consistent with the public interest?

All gentlemen here say that these acts, which have given peace to the country, and satisfaction to the people, should remain undisturbed—that they should be held inviolable. I have heard no one on this floor say he would disturb the one act, by asking for protective duties; nor the other, by asking that the revenue deposited with the States be demanded, and required to be returned. But gentlemen here strive secretly to undermine this policy, by asking that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands may be divided among the States; and that the revenue may be increased, to make up the deficit which would be caused by this distribution; going to work to figure the country in debt, in opposition to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, and asking more revenue to meet the emergency. And they tell us that, under the "niggardly policy" of the past and present Administrations, the army and navy, and the fortifications of the country, have been neglected; and demand more revenue to build up these interests, and to meet the desired increase of the public expenditures for them.

Mr. Chairman, has the public service been thus neglected? Is not our navy now sufficient to protect our commerce in every sea on which it floats? Have not liberal appropriations been made to improve our fortifications? And have not our army, and its interests, been as well observed, as was required by the policy of our institutions? which does not regard a large standing army as the safest means of protection; but a well organized militia, as the proper constitutional bulwark of public liberty.

Here, sir, is a letter in reply to one which I addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, propounding to him several inquiries in relation to the naval service:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
February 4, 1841.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 2d instant, enclosing a series of queries addressed to this department, and requesting as full an answer as possible at the earliest period convenient.

Answers to the three first queries have been prepared, and are herewith enclosed. The information required in the others will occupy much time in its preparation, and will be given in substance in reply to a call of the Senate. The papers containing it are on file in the office of the Navy Commissioners; and their whole force is now employed in compiling the document ordered by the Senate.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

J. K. PAULDING.

Hon. LEWIS STEENROD,
House of Representatives.

A part of the information enclosed in the letter of the Secretary, is as follows:

Statement of the naval force in commission, with the number of men in active service in 1829 and 1841.

NUMBER AND RATE OF SHIPS IN 1829.

One ship of the line - 74 guns.
Three frigates, first class - 44 guns.
Nine sloops, second class - 18 guns.

NUMBER AND RATE OF SHIPS IN 1841.

One ship of the line - 74 guns.
Three frigates, first class - 44 guns.
Two frigates, second class - 36 guns.
Eight sloops, first class - 20 guns.
Five sloops, third class - 16 guns.
Three brigs - 10 guns.
Six schooners.

The number of men in active service in 1829 was - 3,875

The number of men in active service in 1841 is - 6,000

This statement exhibits the increase of our vessels and naval force; and the Secretary of the Navy, in his last annual report, says: "Neither the persons nor property of our citizens have any where suffered outrage or wrong for the want of due attention in affording the means of protection and redress."

Within the period referred to above, the apprentice system has been introduced into the navy; which, we are told, in the report of the Secretary, "continues in operation, and thus far its results are highly satisfactory. The conduct of the young lads is generally exemplary; and such is their rapid progress in the art of seamanship, that, by the time they are of age for sea-service, our commanders generally prefer them to older seamen. I take this occasion," he says, "to recommend that this system be fostered to the utmost extent of which it is susceptible, being fully of opinion that it presents one great means of partially, at least, remedying that increasing scarcity of competent petty officers and able seamen, which greatly embarrasses the operations of the navy, delays the sailing of our public vessels," &c. The marine corps has been increased, under the act of 1834, from seven hundred and fifty privates to one thousand; besides many commissioned and non-commissioned officers; and the pay of the navy has also been increased.

In addition to this, great expenditures have been made for the improvement of the navy-yards, dry-docks, wharves, buildings, machines, shops, ship-houses, materials, and naval stores.

I have here a statement, showing the increase of the army within the period heretofore referred to; from which it will be seen, I think, that this branch of the public service has not been neglected.

NOTES.

1. Figures marked with an asterisk, (*) show the reductions made.

2. By a law of March 24, 1833, the army was increased by 9 officers and 55 privates; but not being embraced in the call, no mention thereof is made in the tabular statement. This increase, and the battalion of mounted rangers, constitute the present 1st regiment of dragoons.

3. Six assistants adjutant general, eight additional assistant quartermasters, and four additional commissaries, were authorized by the act of July 5th, 1838; but being of the line, and not increasing the aggregate of officers, no account is taken of them in the table.

4. Chaplains, not to exceed twenty in number, and wagon-masters, not exceeding twenty in number, were also authorized by the law of July 5, 1838.

L. THOMAS, Ass't. Adj. Gen.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, Feb. 2, 1841.

In addition to this statement, permit me here to read an extract of a letter from G. Bomford, Colonel of Ordnance, in reply to some inquiries put by me to the Secretary of War:

"With regard to the second inquiry, viz: 'Has there been any increase in the several kinds of ordnance and ordnance stores since 1829?' I would state that there has certainly been a great increase since that period, the annual appropriation devoted to that object having always been expended. To furnish a detailed statement of each item which has been increased, would require a long time to prepare, and would make a document too voluminous to be of material use to the interrogator. I therefore beg leave to refer, for a detailed statement under that head, to tables C and G, which accompany the annual report of this Department each year to Congress, with the exception of the year 1840, where the papers B and C furnish the same information."

"With regard to the last inquiry, viz: 'Has there been issued to the States, for arming, &c. of the militia, since 1829, the estimated amount under the law of 1808?' I have to state, that the annual appropriation, under the act of 1808, for arming the militia, has been regularly expended, and the proceeds distributed to the several States for the use of the militia thereof, according to the returns made by the proper officers to the Adjutant General, as required by law. These distributions have generally been made within the year, except in cases where the States interested chose to let the arms accumulate for a longer period."

To this may be added $1,572,585 10, which has been appropriated for the improvement of the two armories, fourteen arsenals, and one depot, existing in the year 1829, and subsequently to that period; since which period, there has been expended, in constructing six new arsenals and one depot, $658,375 31. There has been expended on the fortifications on the Atlantic and lake shores, finished and under construction, from the 4th of March, 1829, to the 1st of February, 1841, $8,014,342 24.

While I am free to confess that the appropriations for these great interests have not been exorbitant, I maintain that they had not been "niggardly," but have been such as accord with the policy of our institutions.

If it be the policy of England to have one hundred and twenty ships of the line, one hundred and thirteen frigates, fifty-eight steamers of war, and two hundred and eighty-seven sloops, her immense standing armies, her superb fortifications, her numberless foundries, armories, and garrisons, and her standing police—more than sufficient to do battle to all Europe; to keep in subordination the citizens, under the burdens imposed to support this magnificent policy—our policy has been, in time of peace, to impose light burdens on the citizen; to foster our national resources; and should war come, every citizen will pour out his humble store, and every State its might, for the protection and defence of the country that has been so lenient in its burdens, and so economical in its guardianship of the public good.

But, sir, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GRAVES,] who addressed the committee on last evening, has charged that the number of officers and the patronage of the Government have greatly increased under the past and present Administrations, under the policy which I have been endeavoring to sustain.

It is the duty imposed upon the President, to see the laws faithfully executed. The framers of the Constitution deemed it wise to confer on him this authority. But he cannot nominate or appoint any officer, nor create any office, that is not authorized by the Constitution, or by laws made in conformity with it. And as the great principles of this Republic become developed, as our commercial and agricultural interests extend, as our population advances, as our immense and boundless domain passes from the Government into the possession of the citizen, as our innumerable rivers and lakes become covered with the living throng in the engagements of trade and commerce, as State after State is added to this Republic of Republics, when all here is prospering and advancing, the power, patronage, and officers of this Government must increase, must go on, must advance. The immense number of acres of public lands, which this Government has thrown into market, requires officers to survey and dispose of them; your revenue laws require ports of entry, and officers to prevent smuggling and to enforce the revenue laws. Since the year 1829, there have been erected one hundred and thirty-two light houses and beacons, and four monuments. These require keepers, superintendents, and other officers. The extension of the judiciary to the new States, and over the increasing population of our territory, has increased the number of judges, marshals, and other officers of the courts,

The branch mints, too, which have been established to coin money, and to furnish the country with a constitutional currency, require superintendents, and other officers to conduct them. In carrying out various treaties and engagements with the Indians, agents of the Government were necessarily required and employed. We have now forty four thousand pensioners, to whom this Government will pay, this year, two millions forty-eight thousand and sixty-three dollars. To perform these duties, offices are created and agents are appointed by the Government. The post routes now covered by mail service, as near as can be ascertained by the Postmaster General, amount to one hundred and fifty-five thousand seven hundred and thirty-nine miles; and the annual transportation on them is about thirty-six million three hundred and seventy thousand seven hundred and seventy-six miles. This extension of the mail routes to almost every section of the country has required the increase of the post offices, since 1829, from 7,651 to 13,638.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GRAVES] should recollect, that, while this policy of our institutions has been sustained, it has not been by imposing additional taxes on the people; but under reduced duties, and a system of economy which has extinguished a debt of fifty-eight millions of dollars, and returned back to the people, by depositing with the States, twenty-eight millions of dollars.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] told us, a few days since, when addressing the committee on another bill, then under consideration, that the late election had proven that the people were not satisfied with the present Administration, and that he himself was not satisfied with it. And is this to be the reason for changing the past policy of the country? for legislating into existence all those bastard and dangerous principles forbidden by our Constitution, and condemned by our Revolutionary fathers in framing our free and equal institutions? Is this Government now to commence its municipal and local legislation, encroaching on the province of the States; and have ascribed and conferred upon it the same powers over the fortunes of the citizen, that it has over the general concerns of the States and the foreign relations of the nation? Is the Constitution to be legislated away, to administer to that spirit of gain that thirsts for place, and for that desired favoritism in legislation, with which the public mind was imbued during the last Presidential canvass, that then seemed resolved on oversweeping public justice, public liberty, and the limits of the Constitution?

The propositions I have here heard advanced and sustained by the members of that great party which, in the last Presidential canvass, was triumphant, are portentous of this, and will be alarming to the friends of the Constitution.

What, then, are they? The propositions to increase the revenues on certain articles. For what? Necessary revenue? No. For protection? No. To take off a corresponding duty on the necessities of life? No. But to supply the deficit in the Treasury, which would be caused by the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States. This is what was stated by a gentleman in the other end of the Capitol, [Mr. WEBSTER,] who is soon to take his seat as a member of the new cabinet. Thus the taxing power is to be employed to extort revenue from the citizen, to enable this Government to be a bountiful alms-giver to the States. But not only the taxing power is thus to be employed, but the money power is to be seized upon; not to coin money, and regulate the value of foreign coin—no, sir; but we are asked to strike down your branch mints, by withholding the appropriations necessary to sustain them. And thus are we to have the paper system permanently fixed on this country, by the creation of a Bank of the United States, which shall be the fiscal agent of this Government, and have the use of our revenues to bank upon; shall have its notes receivable and paid out for all public dues; shall have its paper the exchangeable measure of value of the property and the labor of the entire country; and this power, too, is to be exercised by this Government. But, sir, it is not only the taxing power of this Government, and the money power that are to be employed, but the appointing power of the Executive is to bring the citizen in more humiliating subjection to the powers of this Government. Yes, sir, we have been told by a distinguished gentleman, one of authority in the land, that all the officers of the Government who are the friends, the partisans, if you please, of Mr. Van Buren, are to be displaced, and the partisans of General William Henry Harrison appointed in their places. Sir, these strong powers were conferred upon this Government by the friends of liberty with great reluctance; and this threatened abuse of them will alarm the people for the public safety, and the security of the citizen. It must humble the State Governments, by invading their power; destroy the constitutional guard of the citizen, by rendering him dependent on the caprice of authority; and peril the public liberty, by the infraction of its only security—a written Constitution; and build up here a great central power, a consolidated Government, that must ultimately settle down into a despotism.

Mr. Chairman, I opposed the coming in of this Administration with all my poor, but best exertions, at the sacrifice of my health, and at the peril of my life. I feared the overthrow of the past policy of the Government, and the introduction of principles alien to our institutions and disastrous to the country. This was the cause of the extent of my opposition to General Harrison. I hope, sir, that these apprehensions may not be realized. I sincerely hope that he may so demean himself in his high office as to prove himself entitled to the confidence of this great, free, and gallant people. I hope he will call around him able and patriotic advisers—men in whom the people confide, and whose lives abound with testimony of fidelity to the country. I hope that he will administer the Government as one with limited and specified powers, as one whose institutions are free and equal, and as one whose burdens should be just and light. Then, sir, all the friends of the country—all good men—will gather round him, and support him; and History will record his name on her impartial page with her favorite sons. But if he should not do this, and select as his chief adviser one who is suspected by many of being opposed to the interests and liberties of this people; one who, in a dark hour of the country, when our free institutions were in peril, and a merciless foe were within our borders, sacking our towns, pillaging our country, murdering our people—one who, in a season like this, refused to vote protection to the people and defence to the country;—if he should do this, and administer the Government on those principles which will encroach on the rights of the great masses, bearing heavily and burdensome on the people; then, I say still, for one, in honor to the people, in deference to one they have honored, and in clemency to the infirmities of age, spare him; but banish, banish his advisers for ever from place and public confidence.

REMARKS OF MR. COOPER,

OF GEORGIA.

In the House of Representatives, February, 1841.—In reply to his colleague, [Mr. NISBET.]

Mr. COOPER rose and said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I feel a little surprised that my colleague, who has just taken his seat, should have risen with a fixed and deliberate purpose to inflict what he supposed would amount to a chastisement on me; that this should have resulted from a candid and sincere effort to do my duty, by repelling the slanderous attack of a member from Ohio, upon our common constituents and their domestic affairs, in which I made no allusion to my colleague without a proper explanation. He has spoken at length, and with more warmth than he is wont to do. He evidently designed to be severe to the utmost of his ability. To avail himself of the advantage of his position, for the exertion of his utmost power, he has not hesitated to contrast himself and his position with mine. He has referred to the results of the recent election in our State, with a manifest air of triumph. He has not scrupled to define and designate what he conceived to be my purposes.

He has assigned to me a purpose and an object disclaimed by me when I spoke a few days ago; which disclaimer was accompanied with a reference to his private knowledge of my views of which he could not be dispossessed. I have not misunderstood him. His manner, his matter, and his words, establish what I say. He said my position and his were the antagonist of each other; that I was seeking to wield public opinion against him; that I was preparing the people of Georgia to believe, that the Whigs of that State were advocating a tariff; that I was seeking to put myself up, and him and his party down. He claimed for himself by contrast, an ardent zeal, in a statesmanlike manner, to promote the Southern interests. He says that his colleagues (meaning, I suppose, those to whom he directed his reply, ALFORD, BLACK, and myself) shall not claim to be the exclusive friends of the South; that I assume to school him—I, against whom the voice of condemnation had gone out, who have been disbelieved by the people, and who, he says, will be disbelieved again. Finally he said, in regard to Southern interest, there is a power in esse north of the Potomac, on which he will throw himself for aid; and whenever that power should manifest a disposition to meet him, he would not stand off on the rigid rules of party, and refuse to co-operate, but would meet them on common ground.

I ought to feel humbled, sir, in presence of my colleague, and, in spite of his physical dimensions, I should realize the necessity of looking up when I would behold him; but the considerations which have elevated him would place me lower than I now am. He has procured that elevation by an abandonment of his policy; I have lost it by a refusal to do the like. The same power that elevated him refused it to me, because I could not, like himself, compromise my opinions. He must feel the consciousness of versatility, and for that reason must think less of himself as he ascends; whilst I never knew what it was, and hence am not required to think any worse of myself, whatever your elevation may be. You are never so low as when you have lost confidence in yourself.

In this attempt to elevate himself by lowering me, my colleague is not entitled to the credit of originality, since the committee now know no more of my discredit than it learned from me when I last spoke. I was more happy in the voluntary admission than he can be in the charge.

In conceding to him the advantage of position, I have reference only to that accidental promotion which, with all a man's merit, often happens to him by force of circumstances, which he has but little merit in controlling, and which, for that reason, in the present case, may very soon place my colleague a little below the level of his starting point. That he won the prize, is true; but, in winning it, he lost that, which to me is of greater value, and therefore not to be parted with.

He says, I have endeavored to "wield public sentiment." How small this seems to me! That I should wish to wield public opinion. Would my colleague do me injustice? By no means. Why then make this charge? Why can't he understand me? Why not comprehend my movements? He has had the fairest opportunity to know me thoroughly. We were schooled together—have descended from a common ancestor. My life is all before him, in whatever station I have acted. He knows it all. Why then has he not perceived the very little respect I have ever paid to that "public opinion," which can be wielded by any man? Why has he omitted to observe, I have ever maintained that the only legitimate or reputable agents, with which to control or wield public opinion, are the facts as they exist, and the principles of right and wrong applicable to them? Why fail to remark, whatever act of my life shows, that I have not only been unwilling that it should be wielded by myself or others on any plan than this; but have refused to accept the benefits of a change induced by other means?

But, he says, I am seeking to wield it "for the purpose of elevating myself, and putting him and his party down." This is still more remarkable. It is unauthorized and unjust. If he and his party "are what they have been," I could not put them down without going down with them. I have preferred to set them up, though I might remain down. I would not have them up for any purpose not avowed in 1833, when they organized. I could not wish them down, therefore, except to establish their own views and policy. This, sir, is what certain practicable gentlemen are pleased to call an "abstraction," which renders me impracticable. Nevertheless, it is with me a pleasing "abstractish," one that I cherish as I love truth and rectitude.

Put this colleague of mine down? No, sir. He is bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh. For that, and other reasons, I do not wish to see him prostrate. His errors I would gladly put down in him, not through him. I feel too much interest in him, to see him made the instrument of effecting mischief: hence the freedom, the candor and fidelity I have always exercised towards him, above all others.

He says I endeavor to prepare the people of Georgia to believe that he and his party are advocating a tariff. In this he has made a mistake. He must allude to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and two other of his colleagues, [Messrs. BLACK and ALFORD,] each of whom directly charged him and certain others from the South, who spoke with him on certain questions, with yielding to tariff influences, and of indirectly supporting a protective principle. Why does my colleague forego the reply to those gentlemen, (two of whom are still in his own party alignment,) to make a thrust at me? I have made no allusion to the subject, being absent during that debate. But having seen my colleague's speech, I take occasion here to say, that the sentiments it contains, connected with what is doing and saying here, satisfy me that the charge made by those gentlemen is not without foundation. I regret that he made that speech. It shows too great indifference to the protective principle. In it he said just what the friends of protection wanted him to say. To make it safe for him to say this, they venture to aver that they no longer wish a high protective tariff. Here is the common ground of union; and when Southern members shall have gone thus far to meet the "power in esse north of the Potomac," another compromise will be necessary to distinguish between a high and a low protective tariff, and to enable Southern members who have taken this "power in esse" for their "auxiliary" to persuade the people at home, that a high protective tariff is within the compromise.

Again, sir: that speech shows too great indifference to the views of a very large portion of that party in Georgia to which I belonged, and still belong, if there be one such, called the State Rights party. I know there is none such, however, since it has dissolved. From Flint river to the western border of Georgia, almost every man of that order agrees with me, and differs from my colleague in this: they make no distinction between the doctrine of State Rights and Nullification, and do not expect him to claim the "exclusive" title of State Rights representative, and rise here to disparage the Nullifiers: they are identical. By his speech he shows a willingness to sink those principles, for the mere gratification of disparaging one distinguished name connected with their history, and is prepared to go out of his way to strike the blow.

But who does my colleague mean by "his party?" Does he mean the Whig party here? If so, I do charge, and would make the people of Georgia believe, (and my colleague also, if I were not sure he knows it,) that his party are the advocates of a protective tariff, and the only party that does advocate that policy. And I now claim the right, as a constituent, to address him, and tell him he must abandon all the policy heretofore supported by him and myself, or quit that party. I cannot too much admire the very upright view presented by the honorable member from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] who said "it is useless to try to argue when there are vital differences on principle; there must be a split or a yielding of principle." Take the ground of the gentleman from the Norfolk district, [Mr. MALLORY,] lay down your cardinal points, and say if the Harrison party oppose there, I oppose them; if they support these, I support them. Then my colleague and I could agree; for, if the Whig party sustain the measures proposed by that gentleman, [Mr. MALLORY,] I am willing to go with them. I know my colleague and his party are opposed to a protective tariff; but, with all his opposition to it, he is indirectly sustaining that policy by promoting and sustaining in power the only party who advocate it. He surely does this knowingly. How, then, can he object to their course, or to them, when they shall enact what every one knows to be their policy?

He says "I have attempted to school him." How? When or where? Not by my speeches—not on this floor. No, sir; that can't be said. It is true, that since 1832, he and I have been politically intimate, and always personally so. With a freedom and candor that was authorized and demanded by our relations, I have placed my views, and the reasons for them, before him, but never in a manner unkind or unbecoming those relations. Being of the same family, I had a strong desire to see him at all times in the position of strength—one that I could always sustain. Within the last twelve months, however, the prospect of realizing that has vanished. It has been put out of my view by the exhibition of a certain pliable material in him, which caused him to yield certain points I never expected him to surrender. But I have not attempted to "school him." So far from it, I made no allusion to him in my remarks in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] it seemed to suit his purpose, and that of others, to convert it into a "family quarrel," instead of joining me and my colleagues in repelling the attack of the members from Ohio and Maine. If my colleague had joined me in the defence, the entire forces of the assailants would have showed themselves, from Ohio, from Maine, from Massachusetts, from New York, Connecticut, Vermont, and elsewhere; and we all should have had enough to do. Instead of that, he chose to conciliate and keep down the assailant's forces, by turning upon his colleagues. In a very short time, his colleagues will be entitled to their discharge, leaving only him and those who agree with him the battle field. He will then have full scope for his "zeal for Northern interests." And we shall see how he will manage to silence the fire of the enemy's guns; and after taking them to his boom, and giving them the vantage ground, how he will repel their attack. We shall also learn what that "auxiliary in esse north of the Potomac" will avail him.

My colleague claims the peculiar office of representing State Rights men. We know, sir, he was sent here for that purpose; but why does he sit silent on this floor, opening not his mouth, whilst a host, with bitterness on their tongue, in the ranks of his own Whig associates, are daily abusing, reviling, and scoffing at the Nullifiers and their doctrines? Why does he unite with them and travel out of his way to ridicule and bring into disrepute what he and others call "Southern abstractions?" Why does he attempt to blend, confuse, and confound the principles of the State Rights party with those of the Federal party? Why does he give his sanction to the profession that Federalism is a State Rights view of our system? If this be representation, then indeed he will be perfectly in order to represent anti-tariff constituents and defend a protective tariff.

He says he is a "strict constructionist," "a Pharisee of the Pharisees;" and yet, to make himself practicable, he is practically yielding all construction. To avoid being called "rigid," he will meet the "power in esse north of the Potomac" on common ground.

What does he mean by this "power in esse north of the Potomac?" Will he designate it by measures, or interests, or the names of men? It is incumbent on my colleague to define his position. It is his error, or his weakness, that, amidst the flowery of rhetoric and the charms of oratory, he becomes conspicuously obscure.

He says I intimated in my reply to the member from Ohio, that my colleagues were missing. In this he is wholly wrong. Nothing was further from what I did and said. On the contrary, I gave evidence of their presence, by turning to them and asking them to bear witness to the grounds taken by the members. They were all present, and, as I thought, they prepared to repel the attack, and I doubt not would have done so, but for an apprehension that it might make the battle too conspicuous. We are glad they yet have influence enough by entreaty or otherwise, to silence a part of the enemy's artillery. It will at least enable those of us who have been in the front of the engagement, to retire, wounded, as we are by our adversaries in front, and our friends in the rear. We hope the post of honor will be soon assigned to our colleague, and that, freed from the annoyance of missiles from a friend at his back, he may have the glory of the victory. He asks you "who I am?" and answers his own question by saying, I am "one against whom the voice of condemnation is gone forth; that my constituents have not believed me, and will not believe me again." He states truly, in part, but, you have been told before, is not entitled to the credit of giving you the first information. He would not have repeated it, but to purchase to himself a momentary gratification, which being abstained from, would have done his heart and his head more credit. That my constituents have not believed me is admitted, but for that they are not to blame. If there shall be a loss, it is theirs. They are in pursuit of their own happiness, and should pursue it in their own way. They should effect it by agents of their own choosing. It would have been unwise in them to have attempted to effect their object by an agent who differed from them as to the course to be adopted. It is not for me to decide whether they have acted wisely in selecting one who has no policy of his own touching their happiness, that he may not yield, for the honor of serving them, no opinions which he holds too rigidly, to prevent a meeting between him and his "auxiliary power in esse north of the Potomac."

Whether they "will disbelieve" me or not, I have never stopped to inquire, nor do I now. So long as the duties of a station assigned to me by them require me to declare what I know, and testify to what I see, I shall not ask whether I shall be believed. It is my part to state truth—theirs to believe or disbelieve. Neither can I ever consent to remodel or mystify the truth, for the credit of being "believed."

My colleague says, "his is wholly the antagonist position to mine in politics." I am only surprised at the candid avowal on this floor. If he had said it twelve months ago, my surprise would have proceeded from another cause. But how is it we are antagonists? Is it in reference to our views of government? the principles of Jefferson, put forth by our party in 1833? I apprehend it is; and I hope he will deal as candidly with all his constituents as he has with me. I still hold to them, and act on them. If he is my antagonist, he has become so by an abandonment of them since we were elected. When we came here in 1839, we agreed also in measures. If we now differ, he has changed. Especially did we agree in the purpose to oppose the Whig party and their measures, Bank, tariff, internal improvement, national debt, etc. How is it he now is my antagonist? The fact that he chose Harrison, and I Van Buren, did not make us so, since by the former he expected to accomplish the same which I proposed through the latter. He was told before making that declaration, that if the Whig Administration policy should prove what he once thought, and what a State Rights Virginia member, [Mr. MALLORY,] a Whig, still thought; I, for one, should sustain it as freely as I had Mr. Van Buren's. This difference, therefore, can never make us antagonists; and I can now assure him, that if he is sincere in his profession of "strict construction," the State Rights principles of '98, in his opposition to a United States Bank, protective tariff, internal improvements, and a public debt in time of peace; I will consent not to yield these measures and principles, either to be "believed" at home or to conciliate "a power in esse north of the Potomac." He will find it impossible to be antagonistical to me, unless there can be an antagonist who is not an opponent.

What I have witnessed at this place, sir, reminds me forcibly of a remark once made to me by one of Georgia's most gifted sons, now no more—one who was eminently distinguished for the clearness of his conceptions, the brevity and force of his language, the eloquence of his manner, the power of his intellect, and the conclusiveness of his reasoning—one who, during a protracted service here, stood conspicuous for his zeal, his ardent devotion to, and consistent support of, the Republican policy: I mean the late Thomas W. Cobb. Speaking of this city, this Government and their influences during one of those moments of freedom in conversation, when he was wont to relax into a familiarity of expression, peculiar to himself, he concluded by saying: "By shot, Mark, we send Republicans to Washington, and they come back Federalists."

DEFERRED PROCEEDINGS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, February 25, 1841.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the Naval Appropriation Bill, Mr. SALTONSTALL moved to strike out $1,425,000 and insert $200,000 for the increase, repair, armament, etc. of the Navy.

Mr. SALTONSTALL spoke in support of his motion at considerable length. The appropriation reported in the bill was, he said, wholly insufficient for the demands of the Department. It is so, said he, in the opinion of the Board of Commissioners. That appears in every part of their reports to the Secretary of the Navy. The estimates presented to Congress were not the result of their own judgments, founded on their knowledge and experience, but were cut down so as to bring them within a certain amount, to which they were restricted. This was the course the last year as well as this. The Secretary of the Treasury forms the best conjectural opinion he can as to the amount of revenue for the year. This is reported to the President, and then it is parcelled out among the different departments and branches of the service. The Board say expressly, that their estimates were made "under the restriction that the whole estimate, exclusive of marines, shall not exceed $5,025,000." This is all wrong, said Mr. S.; the head of the Department, with the aid of the Commissioners, ought to state that the present condition of that great branch of our Government, the Navy, and the amount of appropriation required. I do not say that their opinion should be conclusive. There is a tendency in all boards of officers to magnify the importance and the wants of their respective departments. But they should make the estimates, in the first instance, and these should be submitted to the examination of the President or the Cabinet. Mr. S. then remarked on the duties of the Board, their experience, and the great consideration to which their opinions are entitled.

Mr. S. then referred to the act of 1840 which placed under one head appropriations which had before been made under several, and referred also to the report of the Commissioners to show that, after deducting from the amount appropriated in the bill the sum which the experience of twenty-five years had proved to be necessary "to preserve a value in vessels and stores equal to the original cost" the sum of $100,000 only will be left for the increase and improvement of the Navy.

One hundred thousand dollars for the increase and improvement of the Navy! Who will say that this is sufficient? It is a pitiful sum for the service for which it is required. Besides, we owe a large sum to the Naval appropriations. We have borrowed from the appropriation for the gradual improvement of the Navy, which was to be applied to other purposes, $670,000 for the two steam vessels now nearly completed. This ought to be restored; this House did restore it in the appropriation bill of last year, but it was struck out in the Senate, as was also an appropriation for beginning a third steam vessel, on account of the state of the Treasury. They applied to the Naval bill the process of incision, and annexed to the Army and other bills the extraordinary proviso submitting to Executive discretion a large portion of the appropriations.

Mr. S. then referred to the acts passed from time to time, by which at least $500,000 had been annually appropriated for the increase and improvement of the Navy since the year 1816, the last of which expired in March, 1840. The appropriation, said he, is wholly insufficient. No one can read the documents from the Navy Department and have a doubt about it. The Commissioners tell us what they want to do with the money; they want to complete the two steam frigates "if the necessary appropriation is made;" they want to build a third steam vessel to be propelled by Ericsson's propeller by way of experiment, and they say that "they were prevented from including this in the estimates for 1840 by the supposed necessity of limiting the estimates to a certain amount;" they want to complete the frigate Congress, a 60 gun ship, on a new model, the success of which it is important to try before building other vessels of the same class; and they are desirous of replacing the Guerriere, a name which excites a thrill in every American bosom, as it is associated with our first naval battle and naval victory—a name which ought to be forever preserved in our Navy. One hundred thousand dollars for all this! It is utterly inadequate. They must either stop and not go on to do what the good of the country requires, or they must draw the funds from other branches of the service, and of course throw additional burdens on the next year. Is this wise? Are we reduced so low as to render this necessary?

Mr. S. then spoke of the importance of the Navy; its importance was admitted, it had been ever since the last war. Time had been when the Navy had its enemies, but it had long since passed. It had gained universal favor by its gallant conduct—by the glory it had acquired for itself and the country. He referred, also, to what other nations were doing for the enlargement of their navies, their steamships, &c. What would be our situation (he asked) in case of sudden war?—not that he apprehended it. He trusted that we should be saved from such a calamity. But now was the time to prepare for an event to which we might be liable. But a navy (said he) is not required for war alone. It is essential for the protection of our vast commerce spread over the globe. That was one of the reasons for its original establishment. Our Navy is our best representative every where, and our best protection from insult and injury. We ought to have a naval force in every sea, where other maritime nations have established naval stations.

Mr. S. then adverted to the late seizures of vessels belonging to his constituents on the coast of Africa, and contended that if a proper naval force had been there, the outrages in all probability would not have occurred. Then why did not the gentleman agree to the proposed amendment?

The only reason which can be given is, the state of the Treasury! The money is all gone! Is this a good reason? Will the country so consider it? No. Let us, said Mr. S. issue Treasury notes, or resort to a loan, in any mode, rather than suffer our Navy to languish. Not a permanent loan, for I deny that there is now, or ever was, a party in this country in favor of a permanent debt upon principle; or a conflict of parties on this subject, as has been asserted in a high quarter. Think of the resources of this great country; with its immense commerce, its vast agricultural products, its swelling population, and such a population, so intelligent, so enterprising. Let us not then make stinted appropriations for our Navy. Let us grant all that the Department really needs. We owe it to the navy; we owe it to our country.

Mr. S. expressed the hope that no party feelings or considerations would be permitted to mingle in the debate, or to effect the decision of a great national question. Let one institution be preserved from the contamination of party strife—let that be our gallant Navy.

Mr. JONES of Virginia, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, replied, and expressed his entire concurrence in the sentiment that the Navy was a most important arm of the national defence; but said that it was necessary, in legislating in regard to it, to look further than this. What had the Department, whose duty it was to superintend the whole subject of the expenditures of Government, submitted as an estimate of the amount necessary to be appropriated to this branch of the service for the present year? $1,425,000. The Committee of Ways and Means had not reduced this amount by a single dollar, but had inserted it just as it stood in the appropriation bill. It was true this amount did not comport with the opinions of the Board of Navy Commissioners; but that alone was not to govern the House. If the wishes of those concerned in the expenditures of each Department should be complied with, the expenses of the Government would be enormous indeed, exceeding by millions any heretofore known. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] who proposed to augment the appropriations under this single item by the amount of $575,000, was himself the man who had the most loudly and thoroughly condemned the expenditures of the existing Administration as extravagant, and had promulgated that sentiment throughout every quarter of the country. So had his political friends. But the moment the estimates were brought down to a more reduced scale, they were the first to cry out and denounce the Administration for its parsimony. What would suit the honorable member? The estimates were carefully made up from a view of the whole subject. The President and the Secretary of the Navy had had the full benefit of the report of the Board of Navy Commissioners, on which the gentleman mainly founded his amendment; they had been in possession of the fullest information, and had acted on a deliberate consideration of the whole. The gentleman was mistaken if he supposed the Secretary of the Treasury alone was concerned in submitting the estimates of public expenditures to Congress. The estimates from the other Departments were not submitted to his correction, but were laid before a joint meeting of the whole Cabinet; they had agreed on the sum inserted in the bill; and what was opposed to it? The naked opinion of the Board of Navy Commissioners.

The estimates which had heretofore been submitted, under various heads, in separate sums, were now directed to be summed up under one head of the present item. The Commissioners now told Congress that 14½ per cent. of the whole value of the Navy was required for its repairs; but they had changed their opinion on this subject, having formerly considered 10 per cent. sufficient. In the British service, the rate allowed was 12½ per cent. but heretofore, in our service, 10 per cent. had been allowed, and it had proved to be sufficient. A large amount of the sum appropriated last year remained still unexpended, and the bill now added to that amount $1,425,000 more.

[Mr. BARNARD here inquired of the chairman on what data it had been that the Secretary of the Navy directed the Board of Navy Commissioners to graduate these estimates in such a manner, so that they should not exceed, in all, the amount of $5,025,000?]

Mr. JONES replied that he had not inquired into the reasons of the Secretary. Congress were in possession of the most ample means of ascertaining the resources of the Government. Mr. J. supposed that five millions were deemed as much as could be afforded to be applied to this particular branch of expenditure. But they were told by gentleman that they must not look to the means of the Government, but simply have regard to what amount of money it was desirable to expend, and go on forthwith to appropriate it. If the money was not in the Treasury, or to come into it, the Government could borrow; and why not? But could such a course be deemed wise in a man's private concerns? Prudent individuals, before running into debt, looked first to their means of payment; and the same rule would apply to the affairs of Government. Many gentlemen were ready to make appropriations to any and every amount that could be asked; esteeming a national debt a national blessing; but Mr. J. did not belong to that school; he considered a national debt a national curse, and never to be incurred save under the most urgent and unavoidable necessity. If we were at once to go on, and build up a navy that should compete with all the navies of European powers, it was not twenty, nor forty, nor one hundred millions that would pay the price of it. The gentleman had complained that a large portion of the regular fund for the gradual increase and improvement of the Navy had been diverted from that object; but who had done this? Congress. The fund had accumulated to the amount of $1,500,000; and Congress thought it best to take a part of the money, which would have gone back into the Treasury, and apply it to the building of two steam frigates. There were ample materials on hand; and contracts had been entered into for the means of constructing 15 ships of the line, 18 frigates, 15 sloops of war, 9 steamers, besides copper and iron, &c. These contracts were authorized by law; and it was ascertained that, in applying the money of the fund, no inconvenience would be sustained. The present bill allowed $750,000 for the gradual increase and improvement of the Navy, and it was founded on safer data than the suggestions of any individual member.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY EVENING, March 1, 1841.

After the recess,

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the fortification bill, reported by the Committee of Ways and Means,

Mr. POPE resumed his remarks. He urged the committee not to insist, at this time, on any new measures of defence: it was better to postpone it entirely for the new Administration, and let them take the entire responsibility. He was entirely without authority to speak for that Administration, but should lend it his honest and hearty support. He gave credit to Mr. Van Buren for the pacific course he had pursued. He warned gentlemen not to tell the nation they could not be kicked into a war: it was dangerous language to so excitable a people. Give the new Administration fair opportunity to ward off the national dangers if it could be done with honor and propriety. He should make no war speeches and no war reports. He concluded by advising his friends to suffer the bill to pass.

Mr. LINCOLN addressed the committee at some length in favor of an increased appropriation for Boston harbor.

Mr. HAND was opposed to amending this bill by inserting the items from another bill. Mr. H. was one who believed we should have war. England could not sustain herself long without it; he deprecated, however, all excitement of feeling. He hoped the conduct of the people on the borders would not be rashly condemned; they certainly had received great provocations. He believed the new improvements in war were no objection to forts; England did not think so, for she was repairing old ones and building new. What we chiefly wanted was sufficient fortresses and well-stored arsenals. This lesson was taught us by the experience of the last war. (He here paid some compliments to the militia, not very plainly heard by the Reporter.) Mr. H. observed that the whole sum needed for the entire system of fortress defence would cost us but sixteen millions. He pleaded the necessity and expediency of a fortress in his own district.

After some remarks from Mr. JAMESON,

Mr. STARKWEATHER of Ohio, gave notice that he should discuss the question at large, and should not address this committee alone, but the nation at large. It had been said the Northern frontier was at the mercy of her Britannic Majesty; but young Ohio was ready to meet her Majesty; they had there a fortification which she could not overcome, no, not with the aid of Russia and France. She invited the foe to come, and she would make a slaughter-house and burying ground of her soil. The East were a nation of beggars; a pale-faced people, who ran behind a fort; the people of the West meet the enemy on the open field. The American people have never yielded their stripes and stars to the British lion; (he meant on the water.) Perry had covered the whole lakes with glory. Mr. S. said he intended to speak the balance of the session—not on the question before the committee, for he did not know what that was. Connecticut gave him birth, and what little bringing up he had, he got there. He complimented their enter-prise, but charged them with a love of gain.

The CHAIR called the gentleman to order, and required him to confine himself to the question.

Mr. S. insisted he had a right to speak on the prospects of war, and the necessity of defence. He derided the idea of defending Maine, because one Cape Cod fisherman could whip twenty British sailors on the ocean; so could one Ohio ranger do the like to twenty British soldiers on land. We had now a hero in the chair—a hero at the head of the nation; he would whip them as he did at Tippecanoe. The Indians had carried away their scalps, but it was confidently said that thirty were killed. This hero was to fight—with whom? With a woman. Without money and almost without men he had whipped the British; and yet now it was said we should be whipped to death. No. Americans never were whipped with equal advantages. With General Harrison at our head, no nation dare attack us. He was a son of the mother of States, but he had lived in Ohio; they knew him when he was the clerk of a counting-house; and he had burnt more wigs which were deserted than any man living. This argument was conclusive. The House must be convinced; it was now time to convince the galleries. He here quoted some verses, and then said he should address himself to the fairest and most beloved portion of our people. Freedom of action and of speech were constitutional right, (this was an episode;) and if he had the power of keeping the committee in order till the 4th of March, he wished to reply to some remarks made three weeks ago. He had so no nation dared attack us with our beloved hero at the head of the nation. It had been said that the election of Gen. Harrison settled the question that a tariff law was to be passed.

The CHAIR interposed and reminded Mr. S. that the tariff was not in order.

Mr. S. insisted that it must be, to show how the money in this bill was to be raised. Some believed that a called session was necessary to pass a law laying duties on silks and wines.

The CHAIR again called Mr. S. to order.

Mr. S. said it had been said there was a deficiency in the Treasury; it had been full—was now empty, and did not contain money enough to jingle on a tombstone; yet gentlemen now asked more money to fortify a country that needed no fortification, and to increase a navy which, when not half its present number, whipped the navy of England. The treasures of the country had been squandered, it was said, in erecting palaces of more than Eastern magnificence.

Mr. S. was then about to speak of the inconsistency of the Opposition in relation to the furniture at the White House, when

Mr. EVERETT here called to order on the ground of irrelevancy.

Mr. BEATTY. Yes, that is always the case. When any of our party are about to tell gentlemen things they do not like, they always shout "order."

Mr. S. said he would relieve the committee of all unpleasant feeling. He had sat here for three months subject to the same inconvenience. If he believed that others, who could not speak a whit better than he, could be stopped in like manner, he would take his seat; but otherwise he could assure gentlemen he should speak till the blushes of the 4th of March appeared.

The question on the amendment of Mr. SMITH, proposing to insert $6,600 for Forts Preble and Scammel, in Portland harbor, and $4,000 for repairing forts at Wiscasset, Damariscotta, Castine, and Eastport, in Maine, was then put and decided in the negative.

Mr. CROSBY moved an amendment for Fort Wayne, $50,000. He earnestly pressed the necessity of such a work. The Indians were already much embittered against the Government; and if they saw it neglecting the frontier, would be emboldened to make an attack. They were not then in a condition to repel invasion; and the Government was bound by treaty to preserve peace among the Indians, and between them and the settlers.

Mr. JONES opposed the amendment. The present bill applied only to works begun; the army bill contained some provisions for the Western frontier; this bill was not the proper place for them. The site of this fort was notoriously unhealthy, and it was proposed to remove the site of the fortifications.

Mr. CROSS urged his point, saying that it would be destruction to that region for the Government to withdraw from points now fortified.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Hampshire opposed the amendment in a speech of some length. The object embraced in the amendment, he said, was not of sufficient importance to justify an increased expenditure. He had, at all times, labored to keep down expenditures as low as practicable, with a proper regard to the public interest, and to preserve a financial policy simple and economical; and he could not now, just at the time the people had been seduced into a belief that the expenses of the Administration were extravagant, vote to increase them, until the true character of the past expenditures were better understood by the people. He then proceeded to show that the expenditures of the Administration for the ordinary and permanent purposes of the Government had been reduced below that of any preceding Administration, and to defend its general measures, policy, and principles.

The question being put on the amendment, it was negative.

Mr. KEMBLE moved an amendment for fortifications at the outlet of Lake Champlain, $50,000.

Mr. KEMBLE moved an additional section, allowing the President power to transfer the appropriations in the bill.

Mr. EVANS moved to amend the bill by adding thereto the following section:

"For reappropriations of several amounts carried to the surplus fund for the objects hereinafter named:

"For continuing works at Buffalo harbor, $5,869.

"For erecting a mound or sea wall along the peninsula separating Lake Erie from Buffalo creek, $3,463.

"For the sea wall for the preservation of Fairweather island, and repairing the breakwater of Black Rock, in Connecticut, $2,800.

"For the construction of a road from Tallahassee to Iola, in Florida, $9,500.

"For the military road from Fort Crawford to Fort Howard, $232.

"For Wilmington harbor, Delaware, $2,411.

"For the improvement of the inland channel between St. Mary's and St. John's, $6,102.

"For the improvement of Dog river bar and Chocaw pass, in Mobile harbor, $7,134.

"For the removal of obstructions at Ashtabula creek, Ohio, $369.

"For the improvement of Cleveland harbor, $1,166."

Mr. EVANS explained the amendment to be for the reappropriation of certain small amounts which had gone back into the Treasury. It had been earnestly recommended by the War and Treasury Departments. The Secretary of War had been about to draw the money, but was dissuaded from doing so by the persuasions of the Secretary of the Treasury, under the assurance that it should be reappropriated. The sums were small, and were chiefly intended to keep in preservation the public property, now so exposed that the Department of War had not a dollar to pay a man to take care of tools. If this prevailed, Mr. EVANS should move a general sum of $50,000 for the preservation of public property in various other portions of the country. This was a mere reappropriation.

Mr. JONES inquired for Mr. EVANS's authority for what he had said relating to the understanding between the War and Treasury Departments.

Mr. EVANS replied that his authority was that of the Head of the War Department, from whom he quoted a letter in his hand.

Mr. JONES submitted whether this amendment was in order on an appropriation bill, to appropriate for roads, harbors, &c.

The CHAIR ruled the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. JONES moved that the committee rise and report the bill; but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. W. THOMPSON, who moved an amendment for the preservation of the site of Fort Johnson, harbor of Charleston, South Carolina, $16,000; the case was precisely similar to that in an amendment which had been adopted.

Mr. T. read documents from the Department showing the need of the appropriation.

Mr. HOLMES explained the facts and supported the motion of his colleague, urging the necessity of a speedy application of aid to save the fort from being undermined by the sea. He protested, in the name of a commercial people, against the meanness and parsimony which had marked the proceedings of the Administration on these subjects. He was a friend of that Administration, but he could not approve of this. Mr. H. said he did dread a war; and he reproached the committee with their inertness in making preparations to meet the case.

Mr. THOMPSON moved an amendment for the purchase of an arsenal in Charleston. In that city there was neither arsenal nor custom-house belonging to the United States. If this opportunity was lost, the building used would be bought by a private individual.

Mr. JONES objected to the amendment, and the CHAIR ruled it out of order.

The question now coming up on Mr. KEMBLE's amendment, giving the President power to transfer appropriations,

Mr. LINCOLN said it was unnecessary, the President having that power already by law.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. JEMESON moved to add an appropriation of $25,000 for Fort Leavenworth. He supported the motion by some remarks, observing that it was founded on an estimate. Fort Leavenworth was the key of the Missouri frontier. Why it was overlooked by the Committee of Ways and Means, he could not conceive.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. HABERSHAM offered an amendment of $5,000 for a fort at Savannah, to preserve it in some state of repair. The Department had recommended $50,000.

The item was rejected.

Mr. CRANSTON moved $13,000 for completing a dyke for the light-house on Goat Island. He stated the great want of the completion of this work. The want of it was a great annoyance to the commerce, not only of Rhode Island, but from all other quarters.

The amendment was ruled out of order.

Mr. CROSS moved an amendment of $10,000 for a military post on the western border of Arkansas.

Ruled out of order.

Mr. JONES moved for the rising of the committee.

Which prevailing, the committee rose and reported the bill and amendments to the House.

Mr. WELLER moved the previous question; which was seconded, put, and carried.

The amendments to the bill were read.

The item for Fort Macon, North Carolina, having been read, and the question being on concurrence, the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered; and, being taken, resulted as followed: Yeas 79, nays 53.

So the amendment was carried.

The other amendments having been then agreed to—

The bill was ordered to its third reading, read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate.

Mr. JONES sent a resolution to the Chair, suspending the joint rule of the two Houses which provides that "no bill or resolution that shall have passed the House shall be sent to the Senate for concurrence on either of the three last days of the session," so far as the Army, Navy, Indian, Fortification, Military Academy, and two other small appropriation bills which passed the House on Saturday night, are concerned, which resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina moved to adjourn, but withdrew the motion.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON moved to suspend the rules to take from the table the Senate bill to continue the corporate existence of the Banks of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON said he would not debate the bill; all he wished was, that a silent vote be taken.

Mr. WELLER moved to adjourn at a few minutes before 8 o'clock, p. m.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WELLER withdrew the motion, but it was immediately renewed by another member.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted as follows: Yeas 39, nays 103.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved a call of the House.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS moved to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were demanded, but refused. And thereupon the House, at a quarter past eight o'clock, adjourned.

REMARKS OF MR. NICHOLSON, OF TENNESSEE.

In Senate, February 16, 1841.—The amendment offered by Mr. Hubbard to include trading and other incorporated companies in the "bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy," being under consideration—

Mr. NICHOLSON addressed the Senate as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: I have no disposition to protract the debate, which has already been continued until it has lost much of its interest in the Senate. I should be content with giving silent votes against the bill and the proposed amendment, but for the fact that such votes might be subject to misconstruction. Without troubling the Senate, therefore, with an elaborate argument, I will only tax its patience with a brief statement of the reasons which will govern me in voting upon the measure under discussion.

Nothing but the high obligation imposed by a sense of duty could restrain me from gratifying my own feelings, by supporting a proposition which appeals so powerfully to our humanity. If evidence were wanted of the immense amount and extent of the distress and suffering which exist in every portion and in every rank and condition of our country, enough to satisfy any mind may be found in the memorials which are daily presented here, calling upon us to interpose relief by passing a bankrupt law. There are high considerations of public policy, as well as of humanity, which strongly incline me to lend a favorable ear to these numerous appeals. I am satisfied that whilst the passage of a bankrupt law would open a speedy way to the deliverance of thousands of honest, but unfortunate, debtors, who have fallen victims to the abuses of the credit system, it would, at the same time, restore their energies, and enable them to become again valuable members of society. I hold that, in too many cases, the man who is bowed down under a weight of indebtedness, from which he cannot hope to relieve himself by his own exertions, is worth but little to himself, his family, or his country.

But whilst I thus frankly acknowledged the force of these high and humane considerations, duty demands that I shall not forget the true nature and character of the remedy proposed for relief. We are called upon to step in between the creditor and his debtor, and, by the exercise of an extraordinary power, to annul their contracts entered into voluntarily, and upon valuable considerations. We are appealed to for relief, by pronouncing bonds, entered into with all formality and solemnity, null and void: to enter the very temples of justice, to close their door against the creditor, and even to vacate the very records of the courts; and all this we are called upon to do, without the consent, and even against the remonstrances of the creditor. That such a power exists in Congress, and in Congress alone, is conceded, at least so far as the trading part of the community is concerned. But the history of our country proves that it has laid dormant in the Constitution, with the exception of about three years, during our whole existence as a Government. I infer from this fact, that there is a settled repugnance in the American character to the exercise of a power which interferes with individual contracts. Our history is marked with periodical revolutions in the monetary affairs of the country, attended, time after time, with a degree of suffering and bankruptcy equal, at least in amount and extent, to that which now exists. In every such instance, except one, the native energies of our countrymen have enabled them to recover from their embarrassments without the interference of this Government. On one occasion only was a bankrupt law resorted to; and then, although enacted to continue in force for but five years, it was permitted to stand in force for but three years.

But there is another consideration connected with the subject, which goes far in determining my vote. Amidst that heavy mass of memorials under which our tables are groaning, I find not one from the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent. The citizens of that State have not escaped the calamities which have fallen upon the enterprising in other portions of the country. They, too, have pushed the credit system to an extreme point, and they, too, are reaping the bitter consequences. But, so far, they are enduring their fate silently, and, I trust, are appealing successfully to the resources of industry and economy for relief. It is certain, at least, that their voices have not been heard in this chamber.

Under the influence of such considerations, I cannot, at this time, consent to exercise a power so delicate and responsible. But, in coming to this conclusion, candor requires me to state, that if, upon more mature consideration, I shall become convinced that the exercise of this power ought to be resorted to, and especially if the developments of public sentiments in my own State shall indicate a wish for such relief, I shall not feel myself so committed by my present course, as to preclude me from acting differently hereafter.

Having said thus much in explanation of my vote on the original bill, I will now proceed to examine the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HUBBARD.] That amendment proposes to place banking and other trading corporations on the same footing with individual traders. If they are at any time unable or unwilling to redeem their notes with specie, and, upon demand made, refuse so to do, they are by this amendment to be declared bankrupt, and be placed in the hands of commissioners, their affairs wound up, and their effects distributed amongst their creditors. It is designed to operate as a preventive measure against the frequent recurrence of those fatal expansions and contractions of the bank paper currency, which lie at the bottom of the ruin and distress which never fail to follow these abuses of the credit system.

It cannot be denied that such a restriction would go far towards checking and limiting the issues of banks. That it would secure an entirely stable currency would be more than could be reasonably anticipated. So long as that radical defect in our system of banking continues, of uniting in the same corporation the right of lending and of creating currency, expansions and contractions to some extent must exist. Our whole experience fully demonstrates the necessity of adopting some some remedy which will limit the ruinous tendency to constant fluctuations in the currency of the country. On this question there can be but one sentiment in this country. The disasters which have from time to time befallen every interest in society, arising from rapid changes and vacillations in the prices of property and the rewards of labor, produced in every instance by sudden contractions of an expanded currency, have been so many powerful arguments, going to strengthen and confirm this sentiment.

The only question now open with the people is that which relates to the best means of securing some degree of stability in the currency.

A portion of the present Opposition party maintain, that a National Bank would furnish the most effectual remedy. In support of their proposition, they have a stereotyped argument, which they have urged for years with unceasing zeal and with no little effect. That argument is, that a National Bank is needed as a head to the banking system, to control, restrain, and regulate the operations of the State institutions. We deny that such an institution would have the disposition, even if it possessed the power, to restrain and regulate the State banks. We maintain that, from its very nature and organization, it would have the same interests, and would be actuated by the same motives; and would, consequently, follow the same line of policy which has characterized the operations of the State banks. Instead of acting as a regulator, we maintain that it would set an example, and lead the way, in expanding and contracting whenever its interest, or the interest of its political friends, dictated either course; and that the State banks would follow the example either from the same motives of interest, or because of their inability to resist the influence of the example. We maintain that the history of the late United States Bank, both as a National and State institution, fully sustains our positions.

The American people are jealous of a great central moneyed power, the leading recommendation of which is its capacity to control the State institutions. They see in it the power of regulating, without restraint or responsibility, the value of their property and their labor, whilst its political energies would be irresistible. Hence it is, that the friends of a National Bank succeed best in times of panic and embarrassment in urging their proposition. Seeing no other immediate prospect of relief, the people relax their antipathies to a National Bank, and lend a favorable ear to the appeals of bank men. But whilst we thus confidently controvert the efficacy of the measure proposed by our opponents, still we agree with them in the sentiment, that some remedy is necessary for our disordered and defective system of currency. One of the chief recommendations of the Independent Treasury system to the people, was the promise which it held out of restraining, to some extent, the excessive issues of State banks. Whilst that great measure rests for its claims to support upon other principles, I doubt whether it did not receive the public approbation mainly because it promised to operate as a partial regulator of the State banks. When the constitutional Treasury system was presented to the people as an antagonist measure to a National Bank, the condition of the times gave to our opponents a decided advantage in that issue. The people saw the bank paper rapidly withdrawing from circulation, the prices of property and of labor rapidly sinking, with ruin and bankruptcy following in the train of the contraction of the currency. They desired relief—more circulation. We presented the Independent Treasury system as a means of safety to the Government; but we did not propose relief by increasing the currency. Our opponents presented a National Bank; and with that they promised to afford relief, by gratifying the wishes of the people for an increase of circulating medium. Amidst the panic and pressure, the great purposes of the Independent Treasury were either overlooked or grossly misrepresented; whilst the National Bank interest was strengthened, because that measure was more in harmony with the feelings of the times. These two measures are by no means necessarily, or even properly, antagonists of each other. If a National Bank is ever established, I hope it will not be intrusted with the custody and the use of the public money; but that such an institution may be disconnected from the Government, and operate within its proper commercial sphere.

I have referred to the late issue between the Independent Treasury system and a National Bank, by way more fully of establishing the proposition, that the whole people, of every political division, are united in the sentiment that some effectual preventive against the disorders of the currency ought to be applied. Our opponents have proposed their remedy—it is a great central bank. We have proposed no remedy—literally none—which holds out the promise of a corrective.

Can it be wise to wait longer on the States? Surely we must now be satisfied that the States either cannot or will not apply the corrective to their banks. Upon the doctrine that their charters of incorporation are contracts between the States and the corporators, it is certain that the States, in very many instances, have surrendered the power of reforming their banking institutions. If they still possess the power, they can never act in concert in adopting the necessary measures. In the present condition of things, we must either submit to the creation of a National Bank, with all its dangers, or we must await the inevitable destruction which must, sooner or later, befall the present banking system, and then take our position on an exclusive metallic circulation; or, which would be worse, we must give ourselves up to a permanent inconvertible bank paper system. For my own part, I have no intention to abide by either of these alternatives. I believe the power exists in Congress to apply a remedy to the State banks, and I hold it to be our duty to exercise that power.

I know that there are some who cherish a jealousy towards the exercise of Federal powers, which amounts, in some cases, almost to fastidiousness. I do not yield, even to them, in my devotion to the reserved rights of the States; but, at the same time, I feel myself under obligations, equally as high, to maintain the powers delegated to this Government. But is the application of a bankrupt law by Congress to trading corporations any encroachment upon the rights of the States? If these corporations were parts of the machinery of the State Governments, and were constituents of the body politic, there would be plausibility in the objection. But they are private companies, organized for individual purposes of trade, endowed by legislation with certain peculiar franchises, to enable them to prosecute their trades with more convenience and benefit to themselves. They have been termed by some gentlemen "emanations of State sovereignty," and by others "creatures of sovereignty;" as if there was some great magic in these vague expressions. Why are corporations supposed to be endowed with attributes of sovereignty? How do they differ from other "creatures" or "emanations" of legislative power? In no respect, except that, according to the prevalent doctrine of the day, they are above the reach and beyond the control of the powers that gave them being. Upon this doctrine, they are not merely "emanations" of sovereignty, but they are genuine sovereignties—so far, at least, as the States are concerned. Do they derive this high endowment from the States? Most unquestionably not. They are made to assume the character of contracts; and hence, under the Federal Constitution, they are shielded and protected from State interference. That principle, then, which is supposed to attach to corporations the attribute of sovereignty, is not derived from the States, but from that Constitution whose powers we are called upon to exercise. Take from them the protection of the Federal Constitution, and you sink them to the level of all other State laws, subject to State legislation and control, and stripped of all pretensions to sovereignty. But if the doctrine be correct, that neither the State nor Federal Government can interfere with corporations, then this whole land is checkered over with thousands of sovereignties, in which are concentrated a vast amount of the wealth of the country, above law, and capable of giving law to the Union. How baseless, then, is the objection, that a bankrupt law applicable to trading corporations is an encroachment upon State rights. So far from being true, the measure is designed to curtail the high prerogatives of these little sovereignties, and to bring them down to subordination to law. It is the exercise of a power which comes in aid of the rights of the States, which are rendered inefficient and impotent from having surrendered the right of impairing contracts. How very little of State sovereignty is left unemanated, if the tens of thousands of corporations for various trading purposes are subject neither to State or Federal control.

But the great objection to this measure, which has been pressed with uncommon zeal and ability, is, that it is not warranted by the Constitution. I acknowledge the doctrine, that whenever Congress proposes to exercise a power, those who support it ought to be prepared to show their delegated authority. In compliance with this cardinal doctrine, I point to the power in the Constitution which authorizes Congress to "pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies." I shall not stop to inquire whether the framers of the Constitution used the term "bankruptcy" in its limited and technical sense, as applicable only to "traders;" or whether they used it in its broad and ordinary acceptance, as synonymous with "insolvency." This inquiry is unnecessary for my present purpose. In the limited and technical sense of the term, by the English law, and in our own country at the time of the formation of our Constitution, all individual bankers and traders were embraced as proper objects of the bankrupt laws. This is conceded on all hands; and it is further conceded, that Congress now has the power to include in a bankrupt law individuals who are or may be engaged in banking or trading in their individual capacities. But the argument is, that so soon as these individuals are vested with corporate powers and privileges, they are withdrawn from the operation of a bankrupt law, and may claim exemption under their charters of incorporation.

It becomes important to inquire for that peculiar principle in a charter of incorporation, which throws this impenetrable shield around the corporators. They have a common name, by which they transact business, and by which they sue and are sued. This privilege is given, merely to enable them to carry on business with more convenience. The magic principle cannot be located in the name. They have perpetual succession. This privilege is designed to avoid the consequences of the death of any of the members of the company, and surely communicates no peculiar right of exemption from the operation of a bankrupt law. They have a common seal—it will not be contended that there is any virtue in this privilege. The individual property of the corporators, in many charters, and protected from State interference. That principle, then, which is supposed to attach to corporations the attribute of sovereignty, is not derived from the States, but from that Constitution, whose powers we are called upon to exercise. Take from them the protection of the Federal Constitution, and you sink them to the level of all other State laws, subject to State legislation and control, and stripped of all pretensions to sovereignty. But if the doctrine be correct, that neither the State nor Federal Government can interfere with corporations, then this whole land is checkered over with thousands of sovereignties, in which are concentrated a vast amount of the wealth of the country, above law, and capable of giving law to the Union. How baseless, then, is the objection, that a bankrupt law applicable to trading corporations, is an encroachment upon State rights. So far from being true, the measure is designed to curtail the high prerogatives of these little sovereignties, and to bring them down to subordination to law. How very little of State sovereignty is left unemanated, if the tens of thousands of corporations for various trading purposes are subject neither to State or Federal control.

But the great objection to this measure, which has been pressed with uncommon zeal and ability, is, that it is not warranted by the Constitution. I acknowledge the doctrine, that whenever Congress proposes to exercise a power, those who support it ought to be prepared to show their delegated authority. In compliance with this cardinal doctrine, I point to the power in the Constitution which authorizes Congress to "pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies." I shall not stop to inquire whether the framers of the Constitution used the term "bankruptcy" in its limited and technical sense, as applicable only to "traders;" or whether they used it in its broad and ordinary acceptance, as synonymous with "insolvency." This inquiry is unnecessary for my present purpose. In the limited and technical sense of the term, by the English law, and in our own country at the time of the formation of our Constitution, all individual bankers and traders were embraced as proper objects of the bankrupt laws. This is conceded on all hands; and it is further conceded, that Congress now has the power to include in a bankrupt law individuals who are or may be engaged in banking or trading in their individual capacities. But the argument is, that so soon as these individuals are vested with corporate powers and privileges, they are withdrawn from the operation of a bankrupt law, and may claim exemption under their charters of incorporation.

It becomes important to inquire for that peculiar principle in a charter of incorporation, which throws this impenetrable shield around the corporators. They have a common name, by which they transact business, and by which they sue and are sued. This privilege is given, merely to enable them to carry on business with more convenience. The magic principle cannot be located in the name. They have perpetual succession. This privilege is designed to avoid the consequences of the death of any of the members of the company, and surely communicates no peculiar right of exemption from the operation of a bankrupt law. They have a common seal—it will not be contended that there is any virtue in this privilege. The individual property of the corporators, in many charters, is exempt from liability for the payment of the debts of the corporation. This extraordinary privilege cannot be supposed to carry with it the still higher exemption from the operation of laws which are binding on all other persons. These are the leading franchises which attach to trading corporations. Examining them singly, or in combination, I am utterly at a loss to comprehend the peculiar process by which they convert the individuals composing the corporation into a being beyond the reach of a law, which is admitted to apply to them as individuals.

But it must be admitted, that there is one principle connected with trading corporations, as the law is generally understood, which is peculiar, and endows them with singular rights. I allude to the principle, that by our law, trading corporations are endowed with the dignity of contracts and being contracts entered into with sovereign States, they are placed beyond the control of those States. Hence, the inference may be, that they are also beyond the interference of the United States. I will test the efficacy of this high principle of corporations, by a few familiar illustrations.

Brokers are a class of traders, who come strictly within the design of a bankrupt law. In some States, the trade of a broker is a franchise. It can only be prosecuted by those who pay a specific sum to the State for the privilege. When the specific sum is paid, the State issues a license authorizing the broker to follow his trade for a specified time. Here is a contract between the sovereign State and an individual, by which, for a valuable consideration, she parts with a small "emanation" of her sovereignty, and confers it upon a broker. Will any one contend that this broker could claim an exemption from a bankrupt law, upon the ground that he carried on his trade by virtue of a contract with the State? He could claim such exemption, with the same reason, and upon the very same grounds, on which it is claimed for corporations.

I next take the case of the merchants: they have ever been the peculiar subjects on which bankrupt laws have operated. In many States, they buy and sell goods, wares, and merchandise, under contracts with these States. They, too, are endowed with a small "emanation of State sovereignty," in the shape of a license to merchandise. I ask if they cannot claim an exemption from a bankrupt law, by virtue of their contract with the State, with the same force with which trading corporations can set up the claim?

But, I will take another illustration, which I think is still more forcible. Unincorporated bankers have always been subject to bankrupt laws. There is now, and has been for many years, in the State of Tennessee, a private bank without any corporation, whose notes have circulated as freely, and whose standing is as good as our incorporated banks. I refer to the Bank of Yeat-man, Woods, and Co. in the city of Nashville. The bill now on your table, if passed into a law, will operate upon this bank. It has no common name, no common seal, no perpetual succession, and the owners of the stock are liable, to the full extent of their property, for all its debts. Yet, this bank exists and trades under a contract with the State of Tennessee, by which the owners of the bank agreed to pay to the State, annually, five hundred dollars for the privilege of banking. This privilege is secured by an act of the General Assembly of the State, which is just as irrevocable, on the doctrine that it is a contract, as the charter of an incorporated bank. What one reason can the stockholders of the Union Bank of Tennessee, which is incorporated, set up, by way of exempting themselves from a bankrupt law, which cannot be urged with the same force by the Bank of Yeatman, Woods, and Co.? Both banks exist by virtue of acts of the State Legislature—both have a subsisting contract with the State—yet, that one which has the fewest privileges from the State, is admitted to be subject to a bankrupt law, whilst that which enjoys extraordinary privileges from the State, is said to be thereby exempted from a bankrupt law. To make the case still stronger: will any one contend, that if the Legislature of Tennessee were to authorize the Bank of Yeatman, Woods, and Co. to have a common name, and a common seal, and exempt the individual property of the owners from the debts of the company, that they could any more claim exemption from a bankrupt law than they can now?

If it be true that the incorporation of a company of individuals, for trading purposes, renders the bankrupt power in Congress inapplicable to them, then are brokers, merchants, bankers, and all other traders, who trade under license, also exempt, and the granted power becomes a dead letter. Under such a doctrine, the State Legislatures have the power of exempting every class and species of trade and occupation from the operation of a bankrupt law. They have but to extend over them acts of incorporation, and they completely annihilate the bankrupt power of Congress.

The question which I am now considering, has been discussed with great ability by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] That I may not do his argument injustice, by attempting to state it, I will read a paragraph from a speech made by him in 1840, in the Senate. He then said:

"But we have not yet reached the real difficulty. If the power was ever so appropriate, and the only one that was—if precedents were innumerable—it would only prove that this Government would have the right of applying the power to incorporations of its own creating. It could not go an inch beyond, and would leave the great difficulty untouched; the right of Congress to include State corporations in an act of bankruptcy passed by its authority! Where is such a power to be found in the Constitution? It seems to be forgot that this and the State Governments are co-ordinate Governments, emanating from the same authority, and making together one complex, but harmonious and beautiful system, in which each, within its allotted sphere, is independent and co-equal with the other. If one has a right to create, the other cannot have the right to destroy."

The paragraph which I have just read, contains the whole argument condensed and compressed, within a half a dozen lines. In the general principle laid down by the honorable Senator I fully concur. It is clearly true, that the General and State Governments are co-ordinate; and, within their allotted spheres, independent and co-equal. In framing the Constitution, the founders of our Government were too wise not to foresee, that, in exercising the powers of the respective Governments, there must necessarily be constant danger of serious collisions unless the harmony of the two systems should be secured by providing, in advance, against such contingencies. This harmony was attainable only by giving supremacy to the laws of one or the other system, in all cases of conflict. This supremacy was given to the laws of the General Government on that clause of the Constitution which provides that the Constitution and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land. It was impossible that any reach of human wisdom could have made an enumeration of delegated powers so definite and minute as wholly to avoid the danger of occasional conflicts. Conscious of its impracticability, the framers of the Constitution wisely provided against such emergencies, by giving supremacy to the constitutional laws of the Union. But to give to the laws of the General Government this supremacy over a conflicting State law, that Government must be clearly in its allotted sphere, exercising either specifically delegated powers, or powers necessary and proper for the execution of some one of those specifically granted.

I am thus peculiar in defining the sense in which the great principle assumed by the Senator from South Carolina is admitted to be correct, because I apprehend that the great error in that Senator's argument will be found in his having applied the principle in a wrong sense. He seems to regard the independence and equality of the two Governments as arising from the fact, that there are certain specific powers delegated to the General Government, whilst he would contend that all other powers are reserved to the States. I maintain, that not only the specific powers which are enumerated in the Constitution are delegated, but that all other powers necessary and proper for the execution of those specifically enumerated, are also delegated powers; and that laws passed in pursuance thereof, are as supreme as those passed in pursuance of the specifically enumerated powers. Whilst he will admit that State laws, coming in collision with United States laws passed in pursuance of delegated powers, must give way to their supremacy, he maintains that United States laws, passed in pursuance of the power to pass necessary and proper laws for the execution of the enumerated powers, must give way to State laws when they conflict. In this, consists the difference in our opinions as to the manner in which the two Governments are co-ordinate and co-equal. He regards one portion of the United States laws (those passed in pursuance of specifically delegated powers) as supreme; another portion, (those passed to execute specific powers, although constitutional, as he admits,) he regards as subordinate to State laws, when they conflict. I regard all the laws of the United States, passed in pursuance of powers granted in the Constitution, whether specifically enumerated or not, as supreme over all State laws coming in conflict with them. I know of no authority for assigning different degrees of dignity to different classes of United States laws passed in pursuance of the Constitution.

I come now to the inference which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] draws from this great principle. Because the two Governments, within their allotted spheres, are co-ordinate and co-equal, he infers that, "what one has a right to create, the other cannot have a right to destroy." The States have the right to create banks; hence, his argument is, that the United States cannot have a right to destroy those banks. In this position, the honorable Senator takes it for granted that a bankrupt law is a measure of destruction to the State banks. I will hereafter show that, in this, he wholly mistakes its operation. For the present, I will test his argument, even upon the supposition that it is a measure of destruction. I admit that the States have the right to create banks; but, at the same time, it must be remembered, that Congress has the right to "pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies." This is one of the specifically delegated powers; and, even upon the argument of the Senator, must be supreme. If a State creates a bank, which, by becoming insolvent, subjects itself to the legitimate operation of a bankrupt law, can any proposition be clearer than that the bankrupt law, which is supreme, must take its course, even though it is destructive of the bank. This consequence results necessarily from the supremacy of the bankrupt law.

But I am far from admitting that the operation of a bankrupt law involves the destruction of the banks, and other trading corporations to which it may be applied. It proposes to mete out to them the same remedy which it applies to other traders. If they become insolvent, and are unable to pay their debts, or if they become dishonest, and refuse to pay them, the bankrupt law takes hold upon the property of the corporation, winds up its affairs, and distributes the effects amongst its creditors. It does the same things with brokers, merchants, and other traders. The broker, or merchant, or private banker, can as well argue that the law destroys their trades, as can the corporation. It leaves them all with their franchises and privileges unimpaired. The broker has the same right, under his license, to resume his trade after his effects have been given up, as he had before. So also the merchant and private banker, and so also the incorporated bankers, have all their franchises left unimpaired. Their common name—their common seal—their right of succession—the exemption of their individual property—all these, which constitute their corporate being, remain in full force and existence—none of them are impaired, much less destroyed. If their effects are gone, they have still the right to proceed upon their charter, procure other capital, and again commence operations under the same corporate existence. The body corporate still exists, with all its immunities, faculties, and functions, as well after the bankrupt law has spent its force as before.

My conclusion is, that the argument of the Senator from South Carolina is unsound, in the first place, in denying to a bankrupt law that supremacy to which it is entitled, and, in the next place, in regarding the bankrupt law as the exercise of a right destructive of the right of the States to create corporations.

But there is still another argument somewhat relied on to show that we have no power to apply a bankrupt law to corporations. It is said that, up to the time our Constitution was formed, no instance is to be found, either in England or America, in which a bankrupt law had been applied to corporations. Hence it is inferred that the framers of the Constitution did not design to include corporations. The fact may be, and I believe is, true, that no such instance can be found; but it by no means follows, that an exemption of trading corporations is the necessary consequence. It could hardly have been anticipated by the framers of our Constitution, that in little more than half a century, nearly a thousand banking corporations, and tens of thousands of other trading corporations, would spring up under the patronage of State authority. The true question is, whether, if they had foreseen the evils that were to arise by the abuse of corporations, they would have granted to them a special exemption from the operation of the bankrupt power. It is indisputable, that trading corporations come within the scope and purview of the bankrupt policy, and it is altogether probable that, if the present state of things could have been foreseen, instead of exempting, they would, with even more clearness, have granted the power.

The result of my reflections on this subject is, that the power to include banking and other trading corporations in a bankrupt law is clearly delegated. I regard it as a power of great value, and the only one in the Constitution which enables this Government to furnish a corrective to the abuses of State banking. I regard it as unfortunate for the country, that it has been suffered to lie dormant so long in the Constitution. Much of the distress which the country has suffered from time to time from the excesses of paper currency, might have been averted by the application of this remedy; and, I trust, the time is not very remote, when it will be called into exercise, to operate as a permanent check upon the acknowledged evils of our banking system.

But, as well satisfied as I am of the existence of this power in the Constitution, and of its great value, I would be far from making an application of it at the present moment. Whatever excesses the banks may have been guilty of in times past, and however much we may be disposed to censure their misconduct, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact, that, in their excesses, they but went along with the spirit of the times. That they stimulated the public mind, and furnished the means for speculation, cannot be denied; but, at the same time, it must be admitted, that the state of the public mind seemed not only at the time to justify, but even to demand a liberal policy of discounting by them. In their present crippled condition, and in the present embarrassed condition of the country, it is a serious question, whether any measure should be taken to coerce the banks to a speedy and rigid collection of their debts. They are suspended, and unable to resume, because their debtors are suspended, and unable to pay to them their debts. A bankrupt law, either to take immediate effect, or to commence at a future day not remote, would inevitably operate to increase very largely the existing embarrassments of the people. A system of prompt and rigid collections would necessarily commence with the banks against their debtors, and, from them, extend throughout the whole community. It is estimated that the debts now due to the banks in the United States amount to about five hundred millions of dollars. It is impossible to calculate the immense distress which the sudden enforcement of the collection of this vast amount of debt would produce. There is no remedy for the distresses of the country which can be furnished by legislation. Any attempt at it must aggravate the hardness of the times. The establishment of a National Bank would but increase the present embarrassments. The passage of a bankrupt law applicable to banks would have the same effect. Mutual forbearance, renewed industry, and rigid economy, are the only certain remedies for the recovery of the country from its present distressed condition. When these infallible remedies shall have effected a restoration of the times, and enabled the solvent banks to resume in good faith, then, in my judgment, would be the proper time to subject them to the operation of a bankrupt law. It would then operate, not to the destruction of the State banks, or to the aggravation of existing embarrassments, but as a check on future banking excesses, and a preventive of future suspensions. If I should be called on, under such circumstances, to decide upon a bankrupt bill, I shall most cheerfully give it my support. But, at present, I cannot consent to exercise even that valuable power, when the consequences would be so fatal.

APPENDIX.

Since the foregoing speech was delivered, my attention has been drawn to a report, submitted to the Senate by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 12th of February, 1841, showing the losses of the General Government and of the people of the United States, from the use of banks and bank paper. The facts contained in this document present the evils of our banking system in so strong a view, and prove so conclusively the necessity of some measure that will regulate or check the abuses of that system, that I feel myself justified in appending the following statements, called and condensed from that document:

TABLE A.

Losses sustained by the Federal Government, by the employment of banks and bank paper before the year 1837, and since.
Loss on the depreciation of bank paper prior to 1837	$5,500,000
Loss by banks as depositories prior to 1837	900,000
Loss by using banks as depositories since 1837	100,000
Loss on bank notes taken and not redeemed prior to 1837	80,000
Loss on bank notes taken and not redeemed since 1837	40,000
Computed interest on aggregate losses	8,672,000
Total principal and interest	$15,492,000

In 1830, the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives estimated the loss on the depreciation of bank paper received prior to 1817, at $34,000,000. In this estimate, the committee are supposed to have taken into consideration the facts that, after August, 1814, loans were made to the Government in irredeemable paper, at a high premium, and which loans were finally discharged in specie, or its equivalent.

The number and capital of banks which have failed in the United States since 1789.
Capital of 20 banks failing before 1811	$3,000,000
Capital of 195 banks failing from 1811 to 1839	36,787,309

Capital of 150 banks failing from 1830 to 1841	12,000,000
Whole number 395, and their whole capital	$96,787,309

This computation does not include the United States Bank, which suspended whilst the report was preparing. If this third suspension turns out to be a failure, as many believe, an addition of $35,000,000 must be made to the above amount of $96,787,309.

Losses by the banks which have failed since 1789, computed on their capital circulation, deposits, and balances owing.
Loss on capital	$72,592,481
Loss on circulation	18,147,620
Loss on deposits, and balances to banks	18,147,620
Total	$108,886,721

TABLE B 3.

Loss by the community, through depreciation of bank paper, in cases of suspension of specie payments.
Loss by the suspension from 1814 to 1817	$22,500,000
Loss from 1817 to 1833	44,000,000
Loss from 1839 to 1841	22,500,000
Loss at other times by depreciation	6,000,000
Total	$95,000,000

TABLE B 4.

Aggregate of losses since 1789 to the people, through the existence of banks, and the use of bank paper.
Losses by bank failures	$108,886,721
Losses by suspensions and consequent depreciation of paper	95,000,000
Losses by destruction of bank notes by accident	7,121,000
Losses by counterfeit bank notes beyond losses by coin	4,444,444
Losses by fluctuations in paper currency, affecting prices, &c. &c.	150,000,000
Aggregate computed	$365,451,495

Amount paid by the community to the banks, annually, the last ten years, for the use of banking institutions.
The result of this estimate is, that the whole payments made to the banks for the use of them, their capital, &c. during the last ten years, has been, in the aggregate
This would be, annually, an average of	$282,000,000

The income or gross profits of banks are derived not only from loans of the capital, deposits, and circulation over and above the specie on hand, but from exchanges, and a larger interest than 6 per cent. in all cases; and hence, it is estimated, that the annual gross profits must average 12 per cent. on the capital. For the last ten years, the estimated average bank capital, yearly, has been $235,000,000; on this amount, a profit of 12 per cent. per annum gives $282,000,000 each year, and $2,820,000,000 for the ten years.

Whole bank capital in the United States owned in foreign countries.
Of the stocks in the United States Bank there is owned abroad	$24,405,500
Of other banks, there is estimated	11,250,000
Total	$35,655,500

REMARKS OF MR. PIERCE,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

In Senate, January 28, 1841.—On the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into expediency of changing the rates of postage on newspapers which are sent less than thirty miles from the place of their publication.

Mr. PIERCE said he desired to say a single word upon the resolution which had been submitted, not upon the suggestion of the proprietors of newspapers alone, but in consequence of letters received from other persons equally, perhaps more deeply, interested, although in a different way. He regarded the subject as important, and desired to draw to it the attention of the chairman, and ask as early consideration on the part of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads as they could with convenience bestow. Alterations in the existing laws were doubtless required far beyond that contemplated in the resolution. Changes in the rates of letter postage, so far at least as to strike off the vulgar fractions, the quarters, halves, and three-quarter cents, and substitute for the present rates the Federal currency, although trifling in amount, would be productive of great convenience, and, without sensibly diminishing the revenue, would probably save in the Auditor's Office 10,000 dollars annually in clerk hire. Changes in the rates of postage on newspapers and periodicals, having reference to weight as well as distance; changes in relation to the franking privilege, which was becoming so broad in practice as now greatly to embarrass the Department, not only by an almost incalculable diminution in the receipts, but by becoming itself a heavy and increasing charge, were manifestly demanded by views of sound public policy, by considerations of private justice, and what was more, by the distinct and unequivocal tone of public opinion throughout the country. Whether the franking privilege had or had not been abused, was a question upon which he expressed, and desired to express no opinion. Some facts disclosed in the Postmaster General's report, struck him with no little surprise. There were no data for determining the number of free packets conveyed in the mail, because a large portion of them were not entered on the post bills; but an account kept at the post office in this city for three weeks during the last session of Congress, shows that there were sent out during that short period, 435,669 free letters and packages, weighing more than sixteen and a half tons. Taking this as the average of a session of thirty-three weeks, the two cents allowed to postmasters for the delivery of free letters sent from this office alone, would amount to $95,627. How could a Department, depending wholly on its own receipts, and asking nothing from the Federal Treasury, be expected to sustain itself with the imposition of such burdens, especially with such draughts upon its ordinary accruing revenue? He ought not, perhaps, to expect that a resolution like that which he had moved—which, while it affected individuals of all classes and conditions in life, could have no political bearing—would receive much consideration here. If he had embraced the whole subject of the rates of postage—practical as it would be in its character, and interesting to every body—he would regard any final action at this session as utterly hopeless. He had, therefore, restricted the inquiry to a single point, embracing an object so manifestly for the advantage of the citizen and the Department that he would venture to hope that it might be taken up at some lucky moment and find favor. Since it was not only admissible to depart from the subject immediately under consideration, but so particularly in order that a Senator thought it incumbent on him to give notice yesterday that he would take care not to be out of order by speaking to the question, he (Mr. PIERCE) would avail himself of the privilege of digression, and state some of the reasons why he had not more confidence in securing final action upon this and other matters both of individual and general interest. In doing so, he would save a vast amount of labor, to which he would otherwise be subjected, in replying to numerous letters from his plain, practical, common sense constituents, who found it difficult to understand why it was that measures, the justice and expediency of which were unquestioned, could not receive the prompt consideration and definite action of Congress. He would give them the result of his nearest observation of the course of business here, and the chief obstacles which lie in the way of despatch. And they would judge, if, indeed, that judgment was not already made up, whether there was not too much evidence that elevated patriotism and an anxious desire to accomplish that legislation which was unequivocally demanded by the honor and the interests of the whole country, were absorbed in devotion to party purposes, and promptings of personal ambition. Without alluding to the character of debates, or to scenes that might have occurred elsewhere, calculated to wound the moral sense and the pride of our citizens at home, and to bring our admirable institutions into discredit abroad, he might, he trusted, without offence to either side of this Chamber, be permitted to say that party principles—the application of those principles to legislative measures—party action, and party triumph had, within the last few years, constituted the great stimulants to effort, and called out the speaking talent in both ends of the Capitol. It was quite immaterial what leading question happened to be brought forward at an early day; it was the one upon which the battle royal in either House was sure to be fought. The provisions of the bill might be simple, and its principles embraced within a narrow compass; not so the debate—like the circle created by casting a pebble into the smooth waters of a placid lake, it expanded and expanded until it embraced within its broad circumference all sorts of topics, and every great political question that had ever been agitated from the days of General Washington to the present hour. It did not become him to complain of this. To himself personally it had been edifying and instructive, and so it must have been to any person, provided he had not read the debates that occurred many years since upon the same subjects. He found no fault with it, but on this ground. A debate of a party character, springing up at the beginning of a session, was almost certain to exclude all sober and judicious legislation upon most of the great subjects involving the interests of the country. It was notorious that even the general appropriation bills were crowded into the last hurried hours of the session. And what was, if possible, still worse, it excluded the demands of honest claimants, who had been waiting and knocking for years at the doors of Congress. Hardly a day passed that he was not asked by some of these meritorious persons why this or that claim—a claim indisputably right, the justice of which no one could deny—had not been disposed of? And what was his answer? It was, that, which he now gave once for all, action upon matters of public concernment and private interest was deferred to debate upon political questions, and to party wrangling. The short session had usually been a session of business; and he took leave to say that, although they might disregard measures of public utility like that contemplated in his resolution, and set popular feeling at defiance, it was cruel to thrust aside the just demands of individual claimants. Some most extraordinary facts might be adduced on this subject. He could point to claims still upon the calendar, which had been presented to both Houses, favorably reported on in each, that had come down unliquidated through a period when there was an almost interminable debate upon the question what should be done with $40,000,000 surplus revenue; at that time individuals, honest and injured, had complained to him that while they were waiting for tardy justice, they were suffering not only pecuniary loss, but the deepest mortification from being unable to fulfil their engagements; because they were denied here that which was honestly their due. It was just so now. Yet here we were with a battle royal going on in both Houses—at one end of the Capitol on Treasury notes; and at the other on the public lands. When either would probably terminate, he believed no gentleman ventured to hazard a conjecture. During all this he had been forcibly struck by an impression made on his mind years ago, when he had heard little of politics and read less, that the habits of debate were from year to year growing worse and worse. It had come to that at last, that the powers and usefulness of gentlemen seemed to be estimated, not by what they said, but by the time they occupied. The usual announcement in the morning papers was, (after taking good care not to allow the singular ability and surpassing eloquence of the speaker, who is sure to demolish all the previous arguments of his antagonist, to go unnoticed,) that Mr. — spoke one, two, or three hours; one, two, or three days; and, upon this announcement, his mark upon the scale of merit was established. He believed that a happy change was taking place in popular opinion upon this subject, and that that scale of merit was likely to give place to another and a better standard. It might not perhaps retard this change in its progress, or be lost upon the younger aspirants for distinction, to remember that all the reported speeches of the most accomplished and dexterous debater of modern times, Charles James Fox, from 1768 to 1775, in the British House of Commons, were embraced in twenty-nine pages; less than the volume of one single Congressional speech of modern times.

He recollected with perfect distinctness some remarks made by that noble philanthropist, profound jurist, and sagacious statesman, Mr. Livingston, be believed during the year 1830. He would thank the Secretary to send him the volume of debates upon Foote's celebrated resolution.

The remarks of the distinguished Senator, pronounced in this Chamber ten years ago, were so apposite, so perfectly in point at the present time, that he would read a few paragraphs. After a brief exordium Mr. Livingston proceeds:

"The multiplicity and nature of the subjects that have been considered in debating a resolution, with which none of them seem to have the slightest connection, and the addition of new subjects, with which every speaker has thought it proper to increase the former stock, has given me, I confess, some uneasiness. I feared an irruption of the Cherokees, and was not without apprehensions that we should be called on to terminate the question of Sunday mails, or, if the Anti-masonic convention should take offence at the secrecy of our Executive session, or insist on the expulsion of the initiated from our councils, that we should be obliged to contend with them for our seats. Indeed, I had myself serious thoughts of introducing the reformation of our national code, and a plan for the gradual increase of the navy, and am not yet quite decided whether, before I sit down, I shall not urge the abolition of capital punishments. In truth, the whole brought forcibly to my recollection an anecdote told in one of the numerous memoirs written during the reign of Louis XIV. too trivial, perhaps, to be introduced into this grave debate, but which, perhaps, may be excused. A young lady had been educated in all the learning of the times, and her progress had been so much to the satisfaction of the Princess, who had directed her studies, that, on her first introduction, her patroness used to address her thus: 'Come, Miss, discourse with these ladies and gentlemen on the subject of theology. So—that will do. Now talk of geography; after that, you will converse on the subjects of astronomy and metaphysics, and then give them your ideas on logic and the belles lettres.' And thus the poor girl, to her great annoyance and the greater of her auditors, was put through the whole circle of the sciences in which she had been instructed. Sir, might not a hearer of our debates for some days past have concluded that we, too, had been directed in a similar way, and that you had said to each of the speakers, 'Sir, please to rise and speak on the disposition of the public lands; after that, you may talk of the tariff; let us know all you think on the subject of internal improvement; and, before you sit down, discuss the powers of the Senate in relation to appointments, and the right of a State to secede from the Union; and finish by letting us know whether you approve or oppose the measures of the present or the six preceding administrations.' The approximation, sir, of so many heterogeneous materials for discussion must provoke a smile; and most of those who have addressed you, while they lamented that subjects unconnected with the resolution had been introduced into debate, rarely sat down without adding to the number."

Mr. P. said he had no intention whatever to reflect on the course of any gentleman. It was not for him to dictate; but when he was importuned from day to day respecting measures in which the people whom he had the honor in part to represent were deeply interested—when they were continually asking him why the Post Office reform was not effected—why their private claims were not considered, he chose to state the true and only reason—one which no gentleman here could gainsay or controvert.

His people were not a complaining people; but they knew what was just and reasonable, and they usually insisted upon it. He would ray a word with regard to New Hampshire, not in a spirit of boasting, but to silence the scoffs and taunts of weak men and wicked men, of buffoons and petty politicians, whose jests and slanders had found their way into the partisan press under the caption of the "dark corners." That which had drawn upon her reproach was precisely the distinguishing characteristic of which every son worthy of the soil that gave him birth should be most proud—the sturdiness and inflexibility with which she had adhered to her political principles. In war, she had sent forth from her thousand hills vastly more than her proportion of men, with strong hands and stout hearts; to do battle for the common country; and, as their blood upon many a well fought field, both in the Revolution and the late war, would testify, they had not disgraced the land of their nativity. In peace, she called her sons to the ballot-box to stamp the seal of her reprobation upon miserable mummery of electioneering shows, and to smile back defiance upon any appeals made to them not supported by truth and reason.

"The dark corners!" She obnoxious to the charge of darkness and ignorance! He would not ask gentlemen to look at the number and condition of her literary institutions of the highest class—at her sixty-three academies, in which the languages and the higher branches of education were taught, with nearly six thousand scholars—at her two thousand common schools, all supported at the public expense, with more than eighty-one thousand pupils—at the circumstance that the means of education was brought, as it were, to every man's door—there being a place of public education to every one hundred and thirty inhabitants; but he would state a single fact, ascertained by the late census—it was this: that, with a population of 284,481 souls, there were only 927 persons over twenty years of age, foreigners included, within the limits of the State, who could not both read and write; and on that fact alone he would hold her up in the sunlight of her intelligence. He instituted no comparisons, but he might safely challenge them from others. So much, by the way of digression, which he had not only desecrated upon, but illustrated.

The Post Office Department itself presented a striking illustration of what he had said in relation to the course of business here. A few years ago, the condition and management of that Department were regarded as the salient points of party debate in both Houses, and a steady fire was kept up for weeks. The country was told that there was no such thing as hope of effecting a salutary reform. The Administration was thoroughly corrupt and profligate, and must be put down. The operations of that Department had been constantly enlarging, its revenue had risen from one million to four millions of dollars, and yet, from that day to the present, we had heard scarcely a word of abuse, or proposed reform there. Why? Because it was not material to the party issue made up before the people. He desired not to be misunderstood. He claimed no exemption from party feeling. He was ardently attached to the party with which it was his pride to be associated, not more from the force of education than from thorough and confirmed convictions of right; but he was assured that his constituents would be better satisfied with reform where reform had been constantly sounded, and was, in many respects, most needed—in Congress, by action, by reasonable despatch in the transaction of the people's business.

Thus much he had thought due to the subject, due to the people whom he had the honor, in part, to represent, and to the unfortunate claimants who had so long been waiting here for justice. He would only add, that the worst kind of a tax that could, by possibility, be imposed, was an onerous tax upon knowledge—upon the means of knowledge—upon the means of exchanging thoughts—upon letters, newspapers, and periodicals.

He had no doubt that a considerable reduction might be made in the rates, of which the whole business community would feel the great benefit without any sensible diminution of the receipts. The single change which he proposed might seem of trifling importance, but it was not so in fact. It would a great relief to printers of small sheets in the country, and to their patrons. Under the existing law, they were compelled to pay as much for a newspaper that had to travel but five miles to reach their door, as if it came one hundred, and for a little country sheet, as they would pay for Brother Jonathan or the New World. What was the effect? A law so palpably unjust was constantly evaded, and the papers found some other conveyance than the public mail. Limit your postage to papers coming from beyond the lines of the county, and have some reference to weight as well as distance, and you not only consummate justice, put a stop to the violations of the law, and secure more postage, but you will relieve both the printer and subscriber from a dependence upon the accommodating spirit, or, it may be, the caprice of mail contractors.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION BILL.

WEDNESDAY, January 20, 1841.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system in favor of settlers on the public lands being again taken up as the special order of the day—

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that, before the Senate adjourned last evening, he had suggested that he wished to offer certain amendments to the bill; and, as they were now in order, he would proceed to propose them. When, on a former day, he had made some remarks upon the general provisions of the bill, he had intimated it as his conviction that there was a majority of the Senate in favor of a pre-emption system of some kind, and the votes given since the present bill had been under discussion showed that opinion to be correct; he had further observed that, in his judgment, the bill, as it had been reported from the Committee on the Public Lands, was such a one as ought not to pass; and that he would, when the proper opportunity should present, make an effort to have it amended. The Senate, as Mr. H. understood it, had now settled certain principles on the general subject; in the first place that they would not adopt the plan of cession, as proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN]; and again, that they would not adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN] attaching the principle of distribution to that of pre-emption; and in the third place, that they would not assent to the substitute proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. PRENTISS], making pre-emption retrospective and not prospective. These points he considered as now settled; and the amendment Mr. H. wished to propose would not interfere at all with these decisions.

There were some provisions in the bill which he thought should not remain there, and some others which might with advantage be modified, and some new ones which should be added, the better to secure the nation and honest settlers from fraud and imposition. The design of the amendments he should offer would be to carry out the professed object of the bill, which was to give the honest bona fide settler the prior right of purchase of a quarter section of land he had settled upon, and they went to carry out the spirit of the pre-emption law of 1838—a statute which has been continued and the principal provisions of which are now in force. This had not been particularly alluded to, but so is the fact. We are now under the pre-emption law of 1838; it is, with some alterations, at this hour the law of the land; it was revived in 1840, and extended to 1842; and the present bill is a departure from that law, not merely by making the system prospective instead of retrospective in its operation, but by omitting important parts of that law, and altering essentially some of its provisions. On what grounds are pre-emption laws defended here, and in the nation? On the two principles of public policy and of private justice.

Is it not said to be justly due to the honest bona fide settler that he shall be protected in the enjoyment of the fruits of his industry? Are we not told that if a foreigner leaves his country and comes here, or one of our own citizens leaves his residence in an old State, and goes on our public domain, and erects a log cabin on it, justice requires he shall be covered by a pre-emption law, and secured in the possession of his land? Is not this assumed, everywhere, as the equity on which a pre-emption law is founded, so far as it respects the individual? And, with regard to its public policy, is it not said that such laws encourage the settlement and sale of the public lands? that they raise the price of the lands, and give an impulse to population, thus bringing strength to the country, and adding to the public wealth? Am I not justified in saying that these are the two principles on which the pre-emption system is made to hinge? Gentlemen may differ as to the expediency of the system, but its friends put it on the two grounds I have stated. If these be indeed the principles on which alone the bill can be defended, I hope its advocates will support them, as they are assumed and embodied in the amendments I shall offer, which go to protect the bona fide settler, and him alone.

With these views I offer the following amendment to the bill, and ask the Senate to compare it with the bill, and judge whether it is not in accordance with the principles on which any pre-emption law can rest, and ought not, therefore, to be adopted.

Mr. H. here read the amendment, as follows:

"Sec. 5. After the word 'divided,' in the third line, strike out to the word 'no,' in the fourth line, and insert: 'equally between them, but neither shall have any claim, by virtue of this act, to any other land; and' "

The bill now reads:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That where two or more persons shall have settled on the same quarter section, the same shall be divided between them, and the deficiency made up to each out of the contiguous vacant ground; but no wilful intruder on the known claim of another shall be entitled to any benefit under this section.

If the amendment shall prevail, the section will read:

"That where two or more persons shall have settled on the same quarter section, the same shall be divided equally between them, but neither shall have any claim, by virtue of this act, to any other land; and no wilful intruder on the known claim of another shall be entitled to any benefit under this section."

The bill, in its present shape, declares that if two or more persons shall settle on the same quarter section, the land shall be divided between them, and each settler shall be entitled to so much from the contiguous vacant land as shall be sufficient to make up to him the full quantity of a quarter section; but that no wilful intruder shall be entitled to the benefits of this provision of the law. It gives to every settler (not a wilful intruder on the same quarter section) an equal right in that land, and also a right of pre-emption to what is equivalent to a whole quarter section. He is not merely to have his interest in the quarter section with the rest who unite with him in seizing upon it, but enough is to be taken from the adjoining land to make up a quarter section to each. Will not this prejudice the interests of the bona fide settler, and promote those of the speculator? It does not prohibit the settlement on a quarter section by more persons than one; any number may agree to associate and unite in fixing themselves on a single quarter section, and thence spread themselves over all the contiguous lands. Will half a dozen individuals settle on one quarter section of land, if they all intend to become permanent residents or the soil. If they enter on the land with a sincere desire of making themselves homes in the wilderness, they will each take his quarter section and begin to improve it; but, by this bill, a family may go on one, and improve it together, and then when the time of sale comes, each of them embraced within the provisions of the bill will be entitled to a separate quarter section at the Government price. Nor is this all. If it were only families that could do this, their taking a tract together might furnish some evidence of an intention to settle permanently on the property. But what is to prevent a company of speculators from going on the land and inhabiting it, and raising one log cabin, to furnish a shelter for them all, and as soon as the pre-emption right is to be perfected claiming, each one, his separate tract of land, at a dollar and a quarter, and immediately selling it at a great profit? I have no disposition to benefit settlers of this description; and the pre-emption right should be confined to those who, in good faith make settlements with a view of becoming permanent residents. And this amendment effects this object, and therein carries out the principles avowed by the friends of the bill. Such was the provision of the act of 1828, and such is now the law of the land.

Its provision is, that if more than one person shall settle on a quarter section, each of the persons so settling shall have an equal share of the land, but shall have no claim to any other land whatsoever by virtue of that act. Such a bill became a law, and by an act passed in 1840, it has been continued in force two years longer. I presume the clause was introduced expressly to guard against the evils I have mentioned. I am disposed to carry out this policy. I wish to insert the guard which our predecessors thought it proper to adopt that they might shut out the rich man and the speculator, and bestow the benefits of the bill on non but bona fide improvers of the soil. I trust this amendment will not be objected to.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said that there were two ways to destroy a bill: one was to vote it down and another was to talk it down. He regretted that the gentleman had not brought forward his amendment sooner, when the bill was in progress of amendment, but after the bill had been rendered as perfect as it could be, a proposition had been brought forward to recommit it with instructions then another amendment had been offered to that, and now the whole ground was to be gone over again. What danger could reasonably be apprehended from the section of the bill as reported by the committee. It was rather retrospective in its character, and intended to refer to cases where several individuals had settled on the same tract. There might be a very good spring at a particular spot, and half a dozen families might settle around it for the sake of the water, while they cultivated elsewhere. Did the Senator desire to confine them all to the same quarter section? The section gave them no floating claim, but confined them to land immediately contiguous. In this respect it was more restricted than the law of 1830, for that allowed them each a floating claim. It had been said that great frauds had been perpetrated under cover of these floats, and the evil was not corrected by the most illiberal law Congress had ever passed. The gentleman apprehended great danger from speculators uniting to settle on a single quarter section; but it would be most extraordinary should a man come all the way from the old States, settling woods and making improvements, for the sake of the profit he might make on one single quarter section of land. Mr. C. adverted to the small profit gained by the Government from the auction system, and the advantage of parcelling out the land among numerous settlers. He demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. HUNTINGTON repelled the idea of offering amendments for the sake of impeding final action on the bill, and insisted that his amendment would be preventive of much fraud, and that it went no further than the law of 1838.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said the gentleman was mistaken. He supposed the law of 1838 to be the last pre-emption law, and that it was only revived in 1840; but the law of 1840 was supplemental, and was more liberal in its provisions than the law of 1838.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said that the honorable Senator from Connecticut had called the attention of the Senate to the fact that a general pre-emption law, retrospective in its character, had been passed in 1840, to continue for two years, thereby demonstrating that there was no pressing necessity at all for acting on the subject of pre-emption at the present session. He had risen to express his thanks to the Senator for the amendment he had now proposed, and, unless gentlemen did actually intend that the bill should operate in a manner different from that which it professed on its face, he hoped the amendment would pass. Mr. C.'s objections to pre-emption laws were founded on the abuses to which they always gave rise. They became, for the most part, mere instruments of speculation; the poor man, for whom they were professedly passed, derived little or no benefit from them. The benefit ensued to the speculator alone. How would this bill work in practice? A new and fertile tract of land had just been purchased from some Indian tribe. From the fertility of its soil and the advantages of its situation, it offered a most inviting prospect for settlement. The Indian title had been extinguished, but the land had not yet been surveyed. What would be the effect? A company of speculators would employ a number of men to go on this fresh and rich land, put up a log building by a spring, and thus obtain pre-emption rights to each man. The company will immediately purchase from them for a trifle, and, distributing their rights on the adjacent land, would thus possess themselves of a choice tract of the best land at Government price. The Senator from Alabama, however, had insisted on the limitation that the settlers must take their rights only from contiguous land; but could any thing be more vague than this? Suppose a hundred men should be employed to settle, and it should be found that they could not get their hundred quarter-sections on land immediately adjoining that on which they set themselves down, would they not spread themselves through the township, or over into a contiguous township? for the provision in the law must be interpreted so as, if possible, to satisfy the right of the party claiming under it; and if they could not lay their pre-emption on lands immediately contiguous, they must do the next best thing to comply with the law, and take their lands somewhere in the neighborhood. Such he was very confident would be found to be the practical result of this bill, and Mr. C. would here predict, in regard to the present law, as in regard to all other laws, so far as they departed from our old, venerable, and excellent land system, that it would redound to the benefit of speculators. As the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Connecticut was in the very spirit of the arguments advanced by the friends of the bill, he trusted that they would now demonstrate that they were not insincere in the grounds they had taken.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama now withdrew the call for the yeas and nays; and

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky insisted on the call.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama read to the Senate a section of the law of 1840.

Mr. HUNTINGTON observed that the section of the law just read had no reference to his amendment. His design was to provide that, if a number of persons should agree to settle on one small tract, they should not thereby entitle themselves, each, to a quarter section of land. There was land enough, which might be embraced by the term "contiguous," to extend this privilege to a thousand individuals.

Mr. HUBBARD briefly opposed the amendment, and could not conceive why gentlemen should be opposed to a provision, the sole object of which was to get the land settled.

Mr. KING of Alabama said he was prepared to go as far as any gentleman in favor of the pre-emption system, but he could not approve of that section in the bill now proposed to be amended. It was going back too much to the old system of "floats," under which frauds innumerable had been perpetrated and proved. The amendment was proper in itself, and he hoped it would be adopted without insisting on the yeas and nays.

The call for the yeas and nays was thereupon withdrawn, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTINGTON now offered an amendment, which proposed to strike out the word "eighteen," and insert "twenty-one," thereby confining the benefits of the bill to heads of families, widows, and single men over the age of twenty-one years. He said he thought the bill, in its present form, with the provision for minors, would be highly inexpedient. It was likely to produce one of two evils, and perhaps both. It would either encourage minors, who were under parental government, and who had not the capacity in law to enter into a valid contract, prematurely to leave their native home, under the temptation of getting a pre-emption right in the public lands; or, if an individual who went upon the land was the head of a family, and had sons over eighteen years, instead of obtaining a single quarter section—which was the benefit the bill professed to give him—he might, through his sons, obtain two or perhaps three quarter sections more. He believed that it had never before been proposed to grant tracts of the public lands to any but adults, unless they were heads of families. The law of 1838 confined its provisions, as to single persons, to such as were over twenty-one years of age, and Mr. H. was for following in the same path.

Mr. NORVELL said that he could not see any great necessity for the amendment, or any great danger from the bill as it stood, because there could not be very many minors in the same family between the ages of 18 and 21. Every body acquainted with Western habits knew that nothing was more common than for young men to leave their homes before they were of age.

Mr. HUNTINGTON demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama suggested that young men at the South were in the habit of marrying earlier than in the colder climate of the Senator from Connecticut. They often married before they were twenty-one, or at least had a contract on hand.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that undoubtedly the gentleman was correct; but, if his object was to provide homes for young gentlemen who married so soon as this, why was not the clause of the bill confined expressly to such cases?

Mr. PRENTISS said that he was in favor of the amendment, and hoped it would be adopted: for, although he was opposed to the principle of the bill, he wished to render its provisions as unexceptionable as possible. In the remarks he had taken occasion to make in the commencement of the debate, he had expressed his opinion upon the policy of pre-emption laws in general, and especially upon the policy of this particular bill—a bill, he was obliged to repeat, new and unprecedented in its character, and most extensive in its operation. While all former laws upon the subject had been retrospective and temporary, this was to be prospective and permanent. It not only enlarged and extended the pre-emption policy beyond all previous precedent or example, but in fact introduced new principles into the system. Not content with subjecting the whole public domain, surveyed and unsurveyed, to the operation of future pre-emption, without any limitation of time, the bill broke in upon the relations of parent and child, and invited minors, young men under age, to desert the family roof before their maturity, and seek their fortunes in the wilderness of the West. If the bill must pass, it was to be hoped, at least, that it would be divested of this very objectionable feature.

The bill, Mr. P. said, proposed a new and untried experiment, and he feared that it would be as mischievous in its consequences as he deemed it unsound in principle and disorganizing in tendency. An honorable Senator had yesterday, in justification and support of the bill, referred to certain laws which existed in some of the States of New England. The honorable member seemed to think that between these laws and pre-emption laws there was a striking analogy, and that both rested essentially upon the same principle. Nothing, in the opinion of Mr. P. could be more erroneous. The laws to which reference had been made were not of a mere arbitrary character, as was supposed, but derived their origin from an ancient and approved principle—a principle as old as the system of equity itself—as old as the code of the civil law. They were little more, in substance, than the enactment into the form of law of a well known rule of equity, making that a legal which was before essentially an equitable right, and providing for it a simple, cheap, and expeditious remedy. They allowed a party entering upon land under color of title, supposing himself to have a valid right, but whose title, on the trial of an ejectment, turned out to be defective, to recover compensation for his improvements, or rather, for what he had made the land better. But, to entitle himself to compensation, the party was obliged to show that he had entered under a deed, under a claim of title apparently good. The laws gave no relief, nor afforded any favor to mere naked, wilful intruders, nor did they hold out any inducement or encouragement to lawless invasions or wrongful intrusions upon the property of another. They were never prospective, but always retrospective, applying only to past cases, and were enacted from time to time, as the purposes of justice seemed to require. Nothing could be more just than that, if the legal owner would lay by, without asserting his title, and suffer a purchaser, for a valuable consideration, under a supposed but mistaken right, to expend labor and money upon his land, and thereby augment its value, he should not be allowed to turn the innocent party out of possession without remunerating him to the extent of the real worth of his improvements. Such was, in substance and effect, the laws which had been referred to, and it was quite a mistake to suppose that they afforded any countenance or support to pre-emption laws, and especially to a law like the one proposed by this bill.

If (said Mr. P.) there was no other objection to the bill than the powerful temptation it held out to emigration, that objection alone would be sufficient with him. It might be well to look into the statistics of some of the old States, and see what had been the progress and what was the present state of their population. That would enable them to judge whether it was wise or just, by acts of legislation, to create motives and inducements which could not fail to give a new and active impulse to emigration. He would ask attention to the condition of his own State. In 1820, the population of Vermont was over two hundred and thirty-five thousand; in 1830, over two hundred and eighty thousand; and now, a little short of two hundred and ninety-two thousand. It would thus be seen that from 1820 to 1830 the increase was about forty-five thousand, while from 1830 to 1840 it was only about eleven thousand. And how did the account stand in regard to the neighboring State of New Hampshire? In 1820, the population of that State was two hundred and forty-four thousand; in 1830, two hundred and sixty-nine thousand; and now, about two hundred and eighty-three thousand. From 1820 to 1830 the increase was full twenty-five thousand, while from 1830 to 1840 it was only about fourteen thousand. In some of the towns in Vermont, the population had diminished in the last ten years, and there was reason to presume that such was the case in New Hampshire. Had it not been for the manufacturing business, which, though greatly depressed of late, had built up considerable villages in different parts, it was probable that the aggregate of population would not have been augmented at all in either State, but might have been diminished.

In view of these startling facts, Mr. P. said it was quite impossible for him, representing, as he did, an old State, to give his support to a measure which offered a bounty, and a most tempting bounty, too, to emigration. While he would impose no restraints upon emigration, but leave every one to go where he pleased, he would give it no extraordinary facilities or encouragement, and especially such encouragement as this bill held out, and which no one could fail to see must operate very injuriously upon the old States. Emigration to the new States was rapid enough; and one would think that they ought to be satisfied with the surprising and almost incredible accumulations their population was annually receiving, without exacting new facilities and new encouragement at the expense of the old States. This was what their true interest did not require, and what they had no right to demand. At any rate it was what, coming as Mr. P. did from an old State, and meaning to perform his duty faithfully in the station he had the honor to occupy, he was not willing to yield.

Public attention (Mr. P. said) was awakened to the great and momentous subject of the public lands. The statesmen and patriots of the country were beginning to see and feel the importance, and even the necessity, of adjusting the question, and that speedily, too. It was not difficult to see that the public lands, if not made or used as a bribe for votes, would become, more and more, a cause of jealousy and collision of interest between the old and new States, tending not only to conflict of opinion, but to alienation of feeling. Every one knew, and well knew, that the question had already entered, more or less, into the politics of the country, and exerted a powerful, if not a corrupting influence in elections; and unless the question was soon disposed of, it would not only create a combination of interest, attended with concert of action, of a nature and aspect at once alarming and threatening, but engender a sectional spirit, fostered and inflamed as it might be by interested and ambitious politicians, of fearful influence, and most dangerous tendency. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had been so deeply impressed with the nature and extent of the evils which threatened the country from this source, that he had felt it his duty, as a public man, to bring forward a proposition for settling the question, by ceding away and disposing at once of the lands themselves. While Mr. P. agreed with the honorable Senator as to the necessity of a speedy adjustment of the question, he could not agree with him as to the mode of doing it. He did not think that the proposition to cede the lands to the States in which they were situated, would remove any of the evils they had reason to apprehend from suffering the question to remain open and undecided. Passing by all other objections to the proposition, it was enough that the cession proposed would create the relation of debtor and creditor between the new States and the General Government; a relation, above all others, to be deprecated and studiously avoided. Besides, if the new States, without a cession, would insist, as had been said, without even a plausible pretence of right, upon having all the lands to themselves to the exclusion of the old States, they would be quite as likely, after a cession, to insist, against right, upon keeping to themselves all the money which the lands produced.

In the opinion of Mr. P. the only plan which seemed to be at the same time practicable, constitutional, and likely to settle the question finally and satisfactorily, was a distribution of the proceeds of the lands among the States. A division in fair and just proportions among all the States could not fail to command general acquiescence, to secure general approbation, and give general satisfaction. It would put an end at once and forever to a dangerously disturbing and distracting question. There would no longer exist among politicians any motive for agitation on the subject. It was moreover the only conservative measure—the only measure which would preserve the public domain, save this great interest of the country from spoliation, and secure permanently, and for generations to come, its benefits to all the States.

It has been said, among other things, in opposition to the measure, that if they took from the Treasury the revenues arising from the public lands, for the purpose of distribution, they would be obliged to provide in some way for the deficiency it would occasion; and that it would be idle and foolish to distribute the money among the States, and then impose taxes to supply its place. Mr. P. would frankly admit that the reasoning of gentlemen would be unanswerable, and he should feel himself bound to vote against distribution, if, in his opinion, Congress had the right either to distribute or retain the proceeds of the lands at its discretion, and the question was simply a question whether so much money should be retained or distributed, and nothing more. In his view, the question went far beyond that, and involved other and higher considerations. It was a question which agitated and distracted the councils of the nation, and affected the peace, tranquillity, and harmony of the Union. It was on high considerations of public policy, for the sake of settling the question, and at the same time giving to the States what rightfully belonged to them, that he was in favor of distribution. It was his deliberate opinion, long since formed and settled, that the States were fairly and justly entitled to the proceeds of all the public lands embraced in the compacts of cession. He had given the reasons for this opinion on a former occasion, and he did not know that he could add any thing, either new or material, to what he then said. He then considered, as he now considered, that the question depended upon the terms of the deeds of cession, connected with certain provisions of the Constitution.

The deed from Virginia, the leading and most important deed, and the only one material to be noticed, declared that the lands ceded "shall be considered as a common fund, for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation or federal alliance of said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure; and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

It would be difficult, giving to language its fair and legitimate sense, to make this clause any thing more or less than a declaration of trust in behalf of the respective States composing the Confederation. Such was its obvious import and meaning. The words "for the use and benefit of such of the United States, &c. Virginia inclusive," could be regarded as nothing else than a declaration in terms that the cession was a grant to the use of the several States. But not only was the use declared to the States as States; the proportion in which the States should share in the use was also declared. A rule was given for apportioning the fund among the States; and the insertion of a rule of apportionment, of itself, necessarily implied a several, separate interest in the States in the common fund. They were to share in it "according to the usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure;" that is, they were to share respectively in the fund, each State to have its proportion, its distributive share, according to the ratio prescribed. This was the plain import of the language used, and there was nothing in the words "common fund" which at all varied or in any way qualified the meaning. In the case of a grant to A, in trust for the use and benefit of B, C, and D, the fund would be a common fund, whether so declared or not, but the beneficial interest would be several. Nor was the meaning at all affected, as some had contended it was, by the words in the concluding clause, "and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." Disposed of for what purpose? The words referred to an antecedent member of the sentence, and supposed the substantive object of the grant to have been previously declared and stated. And what was it? Why, to form "a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States, &c. Virginia inclusive," &c. That was the declared purpose of the grant, and that was the purpose for which the lands were required to be sold. The words "according to the usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure" were used not to designate the object or purpose of the grant but to give a measure of apportionment, and limit and fix the respective interests of the States in the fund. The short and true reading of the deed then was, that the cession was a grant to the Confederation by one member of it, for the use and benefit of itself and the several other members of it, respectively, to be shared by them in the proportions specified. Such was clearly the nature and effect of the cession under the Confederation; and had the substitution of the present Constitution and Government in the place of the Confederation worked any change in the rights of the States to the fund? Whether it had or not, would be seen from the Constitution itself:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claim of the United States, or of any particular State."

"All debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this Constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution as under the Confederation."

These provisions of the Constitution, which were the only ones having any bearing upon the question, instead of extinguishing or impairing in any degree, the obligation of the compacts of cession, saved and confirmed all the antecedent rights springing out of them. The new Constitution superseded the old Confederation, but the trust continued a subsisting and binding trust, and the beneficial interest in the lands remained, as before, in the States. If it had so happened that the trust could not now be executed in the precise manner designated and directed by the deed of cession, then, according to well known and established principles, it was to be executed as nearly in that manner as was practicable, or in such other way as would give effect to the trust. Congress could not apportion the fund among the States in the mode specified and prescribed, it was bound to adopt such other course as would approximate in its results the nearest to this mode.

Such, Mr. P. said, was his reasoning upon the question at the last session, and what he had now said upon it was little else than a repetition, in substance, of what he then said. Distribution, he would repeat, was, in his judgment, the right of the States. Justice not only required it, but it was demanded by considerations of policy of the highest and most weighty nature. He thought the thanks of the country were due to the honorable Senator who originally brought forward the proposition. It was a wise, just, and conciliatory measure; and Mr. P. would venture to say that among all the measures which the honorable Senator from Kentucky had originated, and which had rendered, and would, in future history render his name signally conspicuous, the measure of distribution, above all others, would be regarded by posterity as the highest and strongest evidence of his wisdom, his sagacity, his enlarged and enlightened patriotism.

Mr. P. said there was one other topic, not very intimately connected, it was true, with the subject before the Senate, upon which he wished to say word or two. It was a topic which had arisen rather incidentally in the course of the discussion, and he noticed it, not because it had any immediate bearing upon the merits of the main question, but on account of its general importance, and for the purpose of expressing his dissent from some of the doctrines which gentlemen had taken occasion to advance upon it.

It had been said that the States had the unqualified and exclusive right to determine and fix the qualifications of electors, and might by their Constitutions or laws admit whomsoever they pleased, whether citizens or aliens, to vote in elections either of State or Federal officers. To that doctrine Mr. P. could by no means agree. It was not only, in his opinion, repugnant to sound, acknowledged principles of national policy, but was incompatible with the express provision and plain object and intention of the Constitution of the United States.

The Constitution gave to Congress the power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." The power thus given was, from its very nature, national; and, though not made so in express terms, was of course exclusive, as much so as the power to regulate commerce, or the power to declare war. The States being one nation under the Constitution, and these powers being all equally and strictly national in their nature and character, they could be exercised only by the National Government. It would be inconsistent with the nature of the Union, and the objects of the General Government, to allow either of the powers to be exercised by the States. Congress was empowered to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and for the purpose of securing uniformity on a subject of such high national concern, the power was surrendered by the States and vested in the General Government.

It was to be borne in mind that no one could be a citizen of any State without being a citizen of the United States. The Constitution declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." A citizen of any one State, therefore, must have the rights and privileges of a citizen in every other State; and this consideration alone, if nothing else would do it, demonstrated the utter repugnancy and incompatibility of the exercise of the power by the States. It was true that it was once supposed, and indeed even held by the judiciary, that the States possessed a concurrent authority in the matter of naturalization; but, considering the nature and purpose of the power, and that such concurrent authority would render the power entirely nugatory and wholly defeat its policy, the error which prevailed for a time had at length given way to sounder reasoning and more comprehensive and enlightened views upon the subject, so that it might now be considered as settled and established that the power was exclusive.

The power of naturalization given in the Constitution, Mr. P. said, necessarily implied that no one could be a citizen, or enjoy the full rights of a citizen, who was not such by nativity of birth, except by naturalization. Every one, therefore, was an alien who was not a citizen, either native or naturalized; and the question was, could the elective franchise be given to aliens, to persons who owed no allegiance to the country, but were bound by allegiance to a foreign country, which was the legal condition of every alien? If the States could not exercise the power of naturalization, could they confer all the essential civil and political rights and privileges which naturalization gave? If they could not directly, in a legal and constitutional sense, make an alien a citizen, could they give him all the rights which belonged to a citizen, and thus indirectly, but substantially, exercise the power of naturalization? It appeared to Mr. P. to be very plain that they could not. The Constitution of the United States was the supreme law of the land, and it was hardly necessary to say that every State Constitution or law which was repugnant to any of its provisions was of no validity, and could confer no rights. If an alien, without naturalization, could have and enjoy all the rights, civil and political, which properly appertained to a citizen, he would be, to every intent and purpose, a citizen in every thing but in name. There would be nothing left of his alienism but a mere abstraction.

Mr. P. said it was very clear to him that the right to vote in political elections could only be bestowed upon citizens, native or naturalized. The supreme power, according to the theory of the American Governments, rested wholly in the citizens, or, in the language of the Constitution, in the people—a word evidently used as synonymous with citizens—and it might be assumed, as an elementary principle in our political institutions, that the exercise of the powers of Government could be delegated by none but citizens, and only to citizens. Citizenship, on the general principles of law and reason, was essential to the capacity of an elector. Though every citizen might not be an elector, no one could be an elector who was not a citizen. It was true, the States might superadd, or dispense with, other qualifications; but they could not give, of dispense with, the fundamental one of citizenship. They might, perhaps, repeal the common law, which disabled an alien to hold lands, and give him all the rights of property; they might, perhaps, remove other disqualifications, and allow him to be a juror, or to enjoy other civil rights depending on municipal regulation and of mere municipal concern. But when they added to these civil rights the political privileges which belonged only to a citizen, such as the exercise of the elective franchise, which was the highest function of a citizen, and was of general and national concern, the constituency of the State Governments being the constituency of the General Government, they did that in substance, if not in form, which was palpably at variance with the meaning, spirit, and policy of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that, as he was very friendly to early marriages, he could not consent to vote for the amendment; and, indeed, on a little reflection, he was persuaded the Senator from Connecticut would never find it in his heart to deprive a young fellow who was under twenty-one, and had an affectionate wife of eighteen, from getting a pre-emption right and settling down in life. As to our Western boys, he believed many of them were disposed to marry early, and he thought that those who did so, ought not to be discouraged from going into the new country. Give them a fair chance; and even those who were not married, let them go and erect a log cabin, and get it ready to accommodate a wife immediately after they should be twenty-one. He thought it would be rather a reflection on the Senate should they refuse so small a boon. The provision in the bill could do no harm, and he could not consent to strike it out.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut said his colleague had proposed an amendment which he deemed a very proper one, and that he should have given his vote for it with great cheerfulness, had a vote been taken upon it; but he did not feel disposed to sustain the one now offered by him. He remarked that if the settlement and cultivation of the new lands were primary considerations with the people of this nation, collectively or individually, he thought the people of the old States would feel as deep an interest in the disposition as those of the new; and it was his opinion that the inhabitants of the old States, and especially those of the Eastern States, would be quite as much benefited, if not more, by pre-emption laws, than those of the new. Had there not been (said Mr. S.) great inducements to the enterprising people of the Eastern States—and none were more enterprising than the people of Connecticut, whom he, in part, had the honor to represent—to emigrate and settle upon the new lands at the West, there would probably have been as dense a population at this time in many of the old States, or nearly so, as in the most crowded European States; and he was not disposed to check the spirit of emigration, by which they were so signally marked, and from which so much personal benefit had been derived; and he was disposed to give them every advantage that they could have by emigration, not as an inducement to go, but, if they were disposed to go, as a compensation for the many sacrifices they were compelled to make, in leaving a well cultivated land, with all the conveniences and comforts it afforded them, for a wild and uncultivated country, where deprivations and hardships surrounded them for many years. Often families moved with only the means of carrying them there, and without any thing to purchase or pay for bread after their arrival. Pre-emption rights, in such cases, would be very valuable to them, and often equal to a small capital. They had only to select a farm and go to work, and before they were called upon for payment, their farms were sufficiently cleared to enable them, not only to support their families, but raise and spare produce enough from them to pay for the land. Pre-emption rights will enable a great many worthy citizens to move into a new country, where they will soon rise with the country, from poverty to wealth; they are there enabled to take rank among their neighbors, and in society which is gratifying to their ambition, and to give full scope to useful talents which otherwise might have lain dormant, and been smothered and stifled by the cold chills of poverty. A young man without means, by hiring himself out for a few years, as was the custom in the New England States, could earn money enough to buy him a good farm, upon which he could rear a respectable and useful family, and make him a valuable home for life. The impulse that is given to society by such citizens, the rising West furnishes us with the most ample evidence. It was no uncommon thing to see those who had thus commenced in life, eventually become prosperous and wealthy. There were men in the Western country now worth fifty, sixty, and even a hundred thousand dollars, who had gone to that country with an axe, and when they went were not worth the clothes they wore. By hiring out and laboring for others, at ten or fifteen dollars a month, they earned and saved enough to buy them a piece of land, and by industry and integrity, and strict attention to business, had gained for themselves valuable reputations, and were among the most valuable and respectable of our citizens. A man in the Eastern States, who had a family which he found it difficult to maintain, would move to the West, bringing with him his family, and among them, frequently, sons, healthy, and with good constitutions, between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one: it was a common occurrence. When he arrived at the West, the services and labor of the sons would command high wages; and they were not backward in taking advantage of it, and would hire out and labor for others, while the father would clear and subdue a piece of land for himself, and in a little while the sons, from their wages, would be enabled to purchase and own farms of their own. Thus pleasant neighborhoods were formed, having similar and congenial habits; and there were nearly whole towns in the Western country which had been settled by people originally moving from the same neighborhood in the Eastern States; and though far removed from their native land, were in the full enjoyment of all the social relations and pleasures that are so endearing to man.

The young and inexperienced members of the family, thus settled and established near, and in the vicinity of the parents, could easily avail themselves of their experience, and receive their advice and friendly aid. The advantages derived from society thus formed and constituted, both to individuals and the public, Mr. S. said, were too apparent to be doubted; and he had a strong desire to aid them in their prosperity, and certainly should not knowingly do any thing to prevent it.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he wished the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] had furnished a more practical commentary than he had done on his own doctrine of early marriages. Mr. H. had no desire to prevent the prosperity of enterprising young men, who chose to marry early; and they were embraced in that provision of the bill which gives the right of pre-emption to "every person, being the head of a family;" but he could not consent to give this privilege to minors who were yet single, as this bill does, under the description of a "single man over the age of eighteen years." In regard to the latter class, he was inclined to "follow in the footsteps" of our "predecessors," esteeming their policy on this subject to be a wise one.

Mr. MANGUM, said that after the last votes which had been given in favor of this bill, he presumed it was to pass, and was desirous to make it as perfect as possible. He was willing that a young man over eighteen and under twenty-one should have a pre-emption right, provided he was married, and the head of a family; but, if a similar provision was extended to other minors, he appealed to gentlemen to consider what was the effect likely to be produced on the domestic relations of life. Inviting young men from the homestead of their fathers, conferring property on them before they were of age, and settling them in masses in a new country—what must be the effect of this on themselves, as well as on the community into the midst of which they were thrown, without being bound to it by any of the ordinary social ties? It went to break up family relations, and tempt young lads to a breach of the duty they owed their parents. Was it wise thus to stimulate emigration, and throw young and inexperienced boys into circumstances where they would be exposed to all manner of imposition? What right had such young men to enter on our public domain and erect themselves a log cabin or other building without the consent of their parents? By the laws, he believed, of every State in the Union, their personal services, until they were of age, belonged to their father. Would gentlemen tempt them to desert their duty—to deprive their parents of the aid on which they leaned, and to which, by the laws of the country, they were entitled, and which they might claim under a law of far higher origin and far more sacred obligation?

Mr. NORVELL suggested that, by the laws of the General Government, young men of 18 could become purchasers of the public land. There was no law to prevent it; and why, if he went on a piece of wild land with the intent to make it his home—if he cultivated the soil, and erected on it a dwelling, ought he to be placed on a worse footing than others?

The question was now taken on the proposed amendment to strike out 18, and insert 21, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Webster, White, and Williams—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Monton, Nicholson, Norvell, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Wright, and Young—24.

The Senate being equally divided, the President gave his casting vote in the negative.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUNTINGTON now offered another amendment, proposing to strike out from section first the words "has been or shall be distinguished," and insert "shall have been extinguished at the time of such settlement." So that if the amendment be adopted, it will read, "on any of the public lands to which the Indian title shall have been extinguished at the time of such settlement."

He said that he proposed it merely with the view of making the bill more explicit, and of preventing misconception, especially as the registers and receivers were to have power to decide in a summary manner and definitively all questions arising under the act. As the bill stood, it might be so construed as to apply to land to which the Indian title had not been extinguished. The object of the amendment was to prevent this. Instead, therefore, of the words in the bill, "the title to which has been or may be extinguished," he proposed to substitute the words, "shall have been extinguished at the time of such settlement."

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he concurred in the amendment.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I am glad there is one amendment which the gentleman can approve.

Mr. CLAY. And I am glad that there is one of the gentleman's measures which I can approve.

Mr. HUNTINGTON rejoined, that, although he was pleased to have the support of the Senator from Alabama in this amendment, he thought it more important to have a majority of the Senate to concur in this, as they already had done in another amendment which he had proposed, and to which the gentleman from Alabama had objected.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he would propose to the Senate another amendment, the object of which, as in the last case, was to render the provisions of the bill more explicit. He could not suppose it was intended that the pre-emption right granted by the bill should be extended to any other land than the quarter section on which the pre-emptor settled, but, as the bill was drawn, it must be manifest that a person who settled on a quarter section, and brought himself within the scope of the bill by making improvements, &c. might claim a pre-emption right to any other quarter section open to pre-emption. To prevent this, Mr. H. proposed to insert in the 12th line of the 4th section, after the word "land," the words "so settled upon;" so that, if amended, it will read "shall be entitled to a pre-emption in the purchase of a quantity of the public land so settled upon, not exceeding one quarter section."

Mr. LINN inquired whether his friend from Connecticut would exclude a man who had settled on a fraction containing 170 or 180 acres. The Senator was aware that in the survey there were some fractional sections, one quarter of which would not always be 160 acres. This had produced some difference of opinion in Missouri. At some land offices a man was allowed to enter such a fraction, and at others not. In consequence, an appeal had been made to the land department at Washington, and there it had been decided that the settler must confine himself to the exact amount of 160 acres. This was productive of great inconvenience. Part of a man's farm might have been on such a fraction, and he was thus prevented from entering it. Such cases could be provided for in this bill, and he should be sorry to see it prevented.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that the case supposed was already provided for in the bill, and his amendment did not, in his opinion, interfere with it.

The question being put, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTINGTON now offered as a further amendment a new section to the bill as follows:

"Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That before any person claiming the benefit of this law shall have a patent for the land which he may claim by having complied with its provisions, he shall make oath before some person authorized by law to administer the same, which oath, with the certificate of the person administering it, shall be filed with the register of the proper land office when the land is applied for, and by said register sent to the office of the Commissioner of Public Lands, that he entered upon the land which he claims to his own right, and exclusively for his own use and benefit; and that he has not, directly or indirectly, made any agreement or contract, in any way or manner, with any person or persons whatever, by which the title which he might acquire from the Government of the United States should inure to the use or benefit of any one except himself, or to convey or transfer the said land, or the title which he may acquire to the same, to any other person or persons whatever, at any subsequent time, and if such person claiming the benefit of this law as aforesaid, shall swear falsely in the premises, he shall be subject to all the pains and penalties for perjury, forfeit the money which he may have paid for the land, and all right and title to the said land; and any grant or conveyance which he may have made in pursuance of such agreement or contract as aforesaid shall be void, except in the hands of a purchaser in good faith, for a valuable consideration without notice. And the certificate, which shall be filed with the Commissioner as aforesaid, shall be taken to be conclusive evidence that the oath was legally administered."

Mr. H. said that his intention in this amendment, as in the others, was to carry out the professed object of the law, by preventing frauds and securing the honest, bona fide settler in the possession of his land. By the bill in its present form, any individual was not only not prohibited, but was permitted to enter on land for the benefit of others, instead of himself. Now, if the design of the law was to grant a pre-emption right to the bona fide settler only, was it not reasonable to require his affidavit that he was such? This was the security which the Government had against frauds, and, however frail, it was some security. Did Western gentlemen want others to get the boon? Did they desire individuals to go upon the land for the benefit of speculators? As the bill now is, a man might openly and professedly enter on a quarter-section for the benefit of some rich speculator, and obtain for him the right of pre-emption. Mr. H. said that he followed, in this amendment, the law of 1838; and though he admitted that it would prove a very inadequate security, still it would be some. Good citizens would not refuse to take the oath.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said the friends of the bill had no wish to allow men to enter on the lands for the benefit of others; and, hoping that the amendment, if adopted, might possibly have the effect of reconciling some gentlemen to the bill, he should not oppose it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTINGTON now said that, as the gentleman from Alabama had gone thus far, he hoped to have his concurrence in the amendment he was about to propose. The law was not only prospective but permanent. He desired so to amend it as that it should expire by its own limitation; and it would be open to renewal if, on trial, it should not be found to be productive of evil. He wished, therefore, to provide, as in former pre-emption laws, that the law should continue in force for a limited time only; and with that view he offered the following amendment:

"Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be and continue in force two years, and no longer."

On this amendment, Mr. HUBBARD demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. LINN said he wished to offer a few words on this amendment. If, said Mr. L., we are to open a pre-emption discussion every two years, he predicted that it would cost this Government ten times as much as it will ever gain by the abolishment of the pre-emption system altogether, and putting the lands to the highest bidder, which, as has been conclusively shown, amounts only to the difference of a few cents. He did not entertain a doubt of it. Why, sir, have we not seen, from time to time, Congress engaged, day by day, gravely discussing, at an immense expense to the people, the question whether you would pass laws to permit the earliest settlers of the wilderness to purchase their lands at one dollar and twenty-five cents the acre? He considered the money thus spent as absolutely squandered. He had voted for the Senator's amendment [Mr. HUNTINGTON'S] requiring an oath to prevent fraud; but he must be permitted to say that there have been an almost infinity of charges of fraud brought against the settlers on our Western lands which were nearly destitute of foundation. There was scarcely ground enough of fact for a man to plant the sole of his foot upon while fulminating the thunders of denunciation and abuse which have been heard here and elsewhere.

I believe (said he) there is more false swearing in the custom-house of one of our large cities, in foot upon while fulminating the thunders of denunciation and abuse which have been heard here and elsewhere.

I believe (said he) there is more false swearing in the custom-house of one of our large cities, in one day, than would be sufficient to damn the whole world—certainly a thousand times more than exists on the whole line of our frontier, in relation to pre-emption rights, in a year. It has become almost proverbial to charge the people of the new States with a want of moral sense. I fling back the charge on those who make it. I know it to be unfounded. I stand here openly to deny it, and I aver that, save in a very few cases, the charge of frauds is wholly without foundation. How was this system of accusation employed against Louisiana? It was said that the speculators there had seized upon the fattest and most beautiful land in all the country, and by fraudulent practices had appropriated it to themselves. Well, the Government employed an agent of character and experience to go to the spot and search into the truth of the charge. He did so; and what does he report to you? That he always heard reports in relation to some other neighborhood, but never was able to light on a spot where the existence of fraud was found. As he approached the ground, the charge receded before him: it vanished, it evaporated, and never proved to be tangible, except in a very few cases. And he would venture to say, that if similar charges, which have been made elsewhere, shall be subjected to a thorough investigation, gentlemen will almost feel ashamed that they ever entertained even a suspicion of their truth.

I do not deny that fraud may have been perpetrated, but I do say that it has occurred as seldom as ever will be possible under a merely human law. The system of floats did, I admit, give occasion to much wrong to the United States, and the Government, by that means, lost some of its best lands; and yet it was not fraud, but all originated from a construction given to the law by the land department here. He said he was opposed to that construction at the time, and should be still. The object of the pre-emption system is, that the new States may get an accession of good, moral, industrious settlers. And here I must be permitted to say, on the subject of land stealing, that, while very little has been committed against the General Government, the United States have been guilty of no small amount of it, as regards some of the United States. By the treaty of Paris of 1803, you acquired possession of the magnificent territory of Louisiana, stretching from the Gulf of Mexico to the sources of the Mississippi, and by contiguity to the great Western Ocean. With the country was transferred into the bosom of the American family many thousand souls, mostly ignorant of our laws, customs, and manners. This Government was bound by that treaty to respect that property. But did we not see that they refused for many years to confirm any tract over one league square, or any tract containing a lead mine or salt spring. Was this just or right? And, sir, have we not seen these same lands sold and the money pocketed by the Government, and title still refused to the claimant? and, when taken from him and afterwards confirmed, you force him to take the same amount from your picked and refuse public domain subject to sale at private entry.

This you call carrying out a solemn treaty in the spirit in which it was made. But, sir, I do not charge this Government with intentional wrong in this matter, notwithstanding it did steal some of these strangers' lands. But I do say that more rank injustice has been committed by the Government, and by gentlemen who stood here and saw it done before their eyes, than has ever been committed by the people of the whole State in relation to your public domain.

When the whole of the State, during the last war with Great Britain, between the Missouri and the Mississippi rivers, was left to defend itself by a population who had settled on the lands in defiance of your laws, these very squatters proved to be your best soldiers; and such they ever will be. And when the old States shall be sunk in follies and crimes, and shall have become a Government of mere property, there will still be found on the frontier a gallant band of hardy agriculturists, among whom the love of liberty will still survive, and whose virtue and patriotism will be the preservation of our free institutions. God forbid that any unkind feeling should be excited in my bosom by the acts of this Government in reference to Missouri. I am an American citizen, thoroughly and truly such, as my votes will prove; but I confess I do feel nettled, at times, when I hear my constituents charged as they have been on this floor; and if I am driven to carry the war on this side the mountains, in their defence, I promise it will be in no measured terms. And if the question is to be made of comparative morality and of simple republican integrity, well do I know on which side the balance will rest.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said that the amendment was one of greater importance than at first view it might appear to be. In all the pre-emption laws heretofore passed, a clause had been inserted limiting their continuance to two years; and the question for the Senate now to decide was, whether they would deviate from the uniform course of legislation, and now pass a pre-emption law which should be interminable in its duration. It seemed to him that there were so many considerations in favor of the Senate's listening to the amendment and giving force to the arguments in its favor, that they could not well refuse to adopt it. What was the system which it was proposed to enact for a period wholly unlimited? It was a system new, untried, and perilous in the extreme. It went to open to the right of pre-emption the whole of the lands of the United States on which the Indian title had been extinguished; all that were subject to private entry; and all that had not yet been surveyed and put up at auction. It invited settlers to seize upon the land before it had been surveyed. It was a virtual repeal of the auction system, for when all the good land should be taken up, what would there be left for the auction to operate upon? Nothing. It amounted to a total alteration of our land system, which had been in successful operation for more than fifty years; a system under which Ohio, from being an uncultivated wilderness, had sprung up, as if by enchantment, into a densely settled State, numbering a million and a half inhabitants, while other States through the entire West had advanced with a progress not less rapid. Is it wise (said Mr. C.)—let me put it to the Senate—let me put it to the country—is it wise to put this matter out of reach of our hands, until we are perfectly sure that it will work well? Let me put a case to the friends of this bill. Here is a new district of lands opened, lands of the most inviting character, containing exactly the proper proportion of prairie and timber, beautifully situated, and of the highest degree of fertility. You then issue your proclamation to all the world, inviting all who choose to rush upon the fresh and virgin soil, under the promise that they shall have a pre-emption right; and they come at your call. Now, by the provisions of the present land system, you declare that the sixteenth section in every township shall be reserved for purposes of education. By the effect of this bill, that section is gone; it is gone. Who does not foresee that such a settlement as is here invited, must lead to scenes of violence and contention in regard to land titles, on which no patriot eye can look but with sorrow and dismay? Under these circumstances, what is now proposed by my friend from Connecticut? It is merely to bring the act under review at the end of two years, when it shall have undergone some trial as to its practical operation. And is this a new proposal? have not all our pre-emption laws heretofore been limited in point of time? Not one of them has been, like this, universal in its range, and unlimited in its duration.

Something has been said about the tediousness of legislation, and the great consumption of congressional time, occasioned by our debates on subjects connected with the public domain; but have gentlemen attended to the facts on this subject? I say that, but for the series of experiments which has been so fatal in its operation on the whole country and on all its interests, the sessions of Congress, instead of increasing in length, have shown a constant tendency to diminution. I have before me a very curious document on this subject, embracing every session of Congress from 1789 to the present time, being fifty-two annual sessions. And what are the results it exhibits? That the two first sessions of Congress, after the Government went into operation, were among the longest of any—one of them continuing two hundred and twenty-one days, and the other two hundred and ten. I know it has been said, and truly said, that this is to be accounted for from the fact that our whole system had then to be organized; that the first Congress had to put the new and vast machine of the new Constitution, with its multitudinous parts, into motion. But I find that in the fourth Congress there was a session of one hundred and ninety-seven days; and in the sixth of one hundred and ninety days. Another session exhibits one hundred and twenty-one days; and another one hundred and seventy-seven. And what do you suppose was the longest session (not including that in which war was declared against Great Britain) since the Government went into operation? It began in November, 1797, and ended in July, 1798—occupying 246 days. The next longest was the session during which we went to war with England, and which continued 245 days; and so the list goes on, the long sessions gradually diminishing in their extent until Gen. Jackson came into power. They commenced a new system of legislation—the attacks on banks, the removal of the deposits, the multiplication of graduation and pre-emption bills, with all the other wild and reckless and ruinous measures which have prostrated the business and prosperity of the country.

Away with the idea that we are to be frightened into the adoption of the present bill from any hope of relieving ourselves from labor and from those high responsibilities and sacred duties which have been imposed upon us by the Constitution. It has no foundation in fact. The whole consumption of time, of which gentlemen make such heavy complaints, has been caused by their own impatience under the operation of our most admirable land system. All we ask of them is that they will forbear, that they will submit to a system which has been so long and so successfully tried, and there will be a gradual diminution of the time consumed from year to year in the discussion of land debates. Yet, after all the complaints, the longest session we have ever had was within twelve years from the commencement of the Government. The next longest was that in which we declared war, and the other long sessions have happened since Gen. Jackson came into power.

Now, I ask, shall we, as wise men, as safe, judicious men, cast behind us all the advantages of an old, and long tried, and advantageous system, which has worked well and produced the happiest results, and subject ourselves to a new, untried, and interminable scheme like that proposed in the present bill? What will be its effect in a financial point of view? The Government is now aground. The cry for Treasury notes! Treasury notes! is the only remedy sounded forth from the head of the Treasury Department. The denouncers of banks, and bank paper, and the credit system, now cry in our ears for more, and more, and yet more paper money. I call the attention of the Senate to one of the reports from the Secretary, from which it will be perceived that there is a labored exertion throughout to diminish the charges upon Government, and to augment the receipts of the current year. And this extravagant Administration, in its expiring moments, begins to preach economy—a word which has been heretofore rigorously excluded from their political vocabulary. Look at his estimate of the product of the customs during the present year. He sets them down at 19,000,000; and on what data? On none whatever. Only because it was convenient to swell the income to that amount. The product of the last year was but 13,000,000, and why does he estimate that of the coming year at 19,000,000? Simply because those figures would enable him to show a little surplus in the Treasury at the end of the year; and if for that purpose an estimate of twenty-five millions had been necessary, it would have been so set down. Look at his report, and what does he say? Why, that there is a "strong illustration of the probability of a conjecture." Yes, we have the "strong illustration of the probability of a conjecture." This language reminds me very much of the expression used by a friend of mine now not living, but then a member of the Legislature of Kentucky. Rising to speak to some matter in debate, he said that he thought "he had a sort of a sign of a symptom of a sensation of an idea on the subject before the House." And really that seems as good to me as the Secretary's "strong illustration of the probability of a conjecture." And after all, what is this "strong probability?" It is a naked estimate of the honorable Secretary that the receipts from the customs will amount to nineteen millions.

I see, in a certain paper sent by him to another part of this Capitol, that the Secretary tells us this overabundant, overwhelming revenue for the first quarter of 1841 will amount to $3,000,000. Where does he get the other $16,000,000, and what do you propose to do under such a miserable, wretched state of the finances as that in which the present Administration is about to leave the Treasury? A gentleman possessed of the feelings of honor and self-respect, if he were about leaving a building and delivering it up to the occupation of others, would be careful to have it put in the nicest order. He would have the locks repaired, the painting and whitewash renewed, all the fastenings of the house overhauled, and the entire premises scrubbed, washed, and put in a state of complete and creditable repair. But what have we here? The Administration who are about to surrender the public Departments to the possession of those whom the people have chosen to be their successors, are leaving every thing topsyturvy, and in a state of the utmost confusion, dilapidation and decay. The financial effect of this bill will be to diminish the current expenses of the year by every pre-emption that shall be sold; and I here I predict that the greatest amount derived next year from the public lands will be from sales to pre-emptors; and, as they have a year's credit, the money will not come into the Treasury till the year following.

But I have been drawn aside from that which tempted me to trouble the Senate on the present occasion. I intreat gentlemen to forbear, and to give a fixed limitation to the operation of their bill, and not send forth, with a census yet untold, and with elect members on Congress not in their places, a measure which may operate most injuriously, and which, if it shall operate well, will, without doubt, be continued.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, said he should not now attempt any reply to what had been said by the Senator from Kentucky, on the subject of the Treasury notes. He had risen to correct the Senator in an important matter of fact. That gentleman had said that the practical operation of the bill would be to deprive the new States of the benefit derived from the reservation of the sixteenth section in every township for purposes of education. Mr. C. regretted that the memory of the honorable Senator should be so conveniently short in reference to the provisions of this bill. The subject of these reserved sections had been adverted to; the objection had been brought forward, and Mr. C. had, in consequence, offered an amendment declaring that, if a pre-emption was found to interfere with a sixteenth section, it should be removed, and that section left untouched. Did not every one know that, by the law which was the foundation of our land system, these sixteenth sections were to be reserved? And were they not excepted by the bill? And yet the Senator could rise and tell the Senate that the effect of the bill would be to take away the land reserved for common schools.

As to the clearness of the language employed by the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the revenue, Mr. C. could not perceive that it had any very intimate connection with the present bill. Nor could he perceive the necessity of going aside to make an attack on a distinguished individual now retired from public life, but who, like some evil genius, seemed to be ever present to the mind of that honorable Senator. And why? Had not the Senator told the Senate that after the 4th of March his political friends would have the possession of power, not only in the Executive, but in both branches of the Legislature? And suppose the bill should be ever so injurious, would they be afraid to repeal it? That would be a question for them to consider. But if they chose to do it, they would certainly have the power. The Senator had said that this bill was to be irrevocable, and to prevent this he argued for its limitation. Now one of the first lessons Mr. C. had learned in the study of Blackstone had been, that one Parliament possessed no power to control and bind a subsequent Parliament. How then could the law be irrevocable? Might it not be repealed as soon as that gentleman and his friends got into power. But that Senator could see nothing good in the bill, and had in fact been at war with that section of the country from which Mr. C. came ever since he had enjoyed the honor of a seat on that floor. It must be perfectly obvious that there was no force in the objection of the Senator in regard to the sixteenth section. That section was not in the least danger; if it were Mr. C. would be the last man to vote for the bill.

Mr. PORTER said that, from the looseness of the requirements contained in this bill, as to occupancy and settlement, the pre-emption right would be open to abuses which would operate greatly to the injury of the class for whose benefit it purported to be framed, and he feared, too, to the injury of the State he represented.

This bill has been truly stated to be, in effect, the granting of a credit to one class of land purchasers, and although this credit, in respect to surveyed lands subject to entry, can in no case exceed one year, and in some cases it may be less, yet it is not so as to lands unsurveyed. The occupant of them may assert his pre-emptive right at any time before they shall be proclaimed for sale. Now, under the provisions of this bill, what constitutes a settlement? Simply, the inhabiting, the building of a log cabin, and the improving. No continuity of occupancy is required; and these evidences of an intention to make a settlement may be of the most trifling character, affording no ground for the belief that a permanent occupancy is contemplated. Where the settlement is on lands subject to entry, I admit there is no motive to this system of sham location; for, in that case, the purchase money must, in general, be paid within a year. But, in respect to lands unsurveyed, and which are not subject to entry, the obligation is different, and this difference may be illustrated by a reference to the fact that, in some instances, the Indian title to lands has been extinguished from four to five years before they have been surveyed or brought into market. A credit, in the form of a pre-emptive right, might then be acquired to these lands for that length of time. It is not of this length of credit to an actual settler on the public lands that I am disposed to complain—and were this bill so guarded in its provisions as to limit its benefits to him only, I should be content at once to withdraw this amendment, for I am willing to give him even this extended credit; but I fear it is not so guarded, and my aim is to protect him from a system of forestalling, which, under the general and loose terms of "inhabiting," "log cabin," and "improving," may be successfully practised against him by the mere speculator.

By the treaty of Washington with the Ottawas and Chippewas, in March, 1836, the Indian title was extinguished to from twelve to fifteen millions of acres in the two peninsulas of Michigan. Nearly one-half of this is yet unsurveyed, and has, of course, at no time, been subject to entry. Suppose the bill now before the Senate had then been the law of the land. Under its mere log cabin requirements, as to settlement, hundreds of persons, having no intention whatever to become actual settlers, might at once have secured their pre-emptive rights there, which would have endured to this day. And how? Merely by each of them erecting on his location a miserable hovel, sleeping one night and boiling his pot in it, and, to complete the mockery, by grubbing away a few bushes around it and throwing down a handful of turnip seed, so that he might swear to an "improvement." This having been done, and on the site, too, perhaps, of a magnificent water-power, of incalculable value when properly improved, the pre-emptive right, under such a law as this, would have been acquired. The hut would have been abandoned to rot in the wilderness until the land should be surveyed and brought into market. Meantime, the location has been withdrawn from the reach of the honest pre-emptor—the real pioneer, whose labors in the making of permanent and useful improvements would have added value to contiguous lands and induced their settlement and cultivation by hardy adventurers like himself.

That this will be the practical operation of this pre-emption bill, should it become a law, I very much fear. The pre-emptive right will not be restricted to that meritorious class for whom I believe it to be our imperative duty to provide, unless some provision like this I have proposed shall be adopted in respect to lands not surveyed—unless some reasonable duration of residence is required as an earnest of the intention to make a settlement on such lands.

Should this amendment be rejected, however, I shall still vote for the bill, because of the general benefits it will confer on the State I in part represent, under the hope that, should the evils I apprehend be found to exist in practice, they may hereafter be remedied.

Mr. BUCHANAN said his opinion in regard to the existing land system of the country was, that it was based on the soundest principles of wisdom and of policy. He was as much attached to that system, and as much disposed to adhere to it with unshaken fidelity, as the Senator from Kentucky himself, [Mr. CLAY.] He was in favor of no new experiments upon it, for the experience of half a century had proved that no wiser or better plan could be devised by human ingenuity. But, while these were his conscientious convictions, he was, nevertheless, of opinion that the Senator from Kentucky was alarmed at spectres. Mr. B. had witnessed with admiration the gigantic efforts of that gentleman against pre-emption at former sessions, and yet he had never begun to fear, nor did he now indulge the slightest feeling of alarm in regard to this subject. I think (said Mr. B.) that the time has now arrived when the pre-emption principle may, with the utmost safety, and with perfect justice, be engrafted on our excellent system for the management of the public domain. Does the introduction of that principle vary, in the least degree, any material portion of that system? Nor at all. Does it go to reduce the price of the land? Not, at the utmost, more than than three or four cents an acre. What is its nature? Gentleman should take an extended view of the whole subject before they made up an opinion as to its merits. We own a vast wilderness of unsettled lands subject to sale, and at times there have been attempts on the part of speculators to monopolize it: fortunately, however, they have never yet succeeded. No fortunes have been realized in this way, so far as I have heard. In this state of things, is it not our duty, our interest, and our truest policy to encourage the settlement of the new States in the West by a hardy, industrious, and moral population? And in what does this pre-emption system trench upon, or in the least interfere with the established land system of the country? It only allows the poor man, who wishes to establish himself in a permanent home, to buy for himself a quarter section of land at the full Government price. There is the whole of it. In consideration of the expediency and desirableness of filling up this new country with a hardy, and active, and enterprising race of settlers, we do—what? Give them the public land? No; but first receive from them for it a dollar and a quarter an acre, and then convey it to them in perpetuity. The difference in the receipts at the Treasury from what would be obtained for the same land at an auction sale has never been estimated higher by any person than six cents an acre; and if it amounted to that, and even more, in an enlarged view of the bearings of the entire subject, this consideration presents no objection in my mind. There are such vast quantities of land, and such a wide and ample choice, that the speculator will never be obliged to give much more than the Government price. And as to all the lands taken up by pre-emption rights, they are, when compared to our entire domain, but as a drop in the ocean. Such, at least, has been our past experience. Heretofore, we have been very cautious to pass none but limited pre-emption bills, and we have wisely determined to put down forever the practice of granting what are called "floats," which was certainly productive of many and great frauds. We have confined the extent of the pre-emption grant to a single quarter section of 160 acres of land; and it is now proposed to make this right of pre-emption prospective and perpetual. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] proposes to extend it in regard to every man whose property does not exceed $1,000, not merely to 160, but to 320 acres of land. And I now venture to predict that, when the long proposed distribution bill of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY] shall become a law, (and I presume that day is not far distant,) there will be incorporated into it a provision granting to the actual bona fide settler a pre-emption right to at least 160 acres. Even in his own bill of 1839, unless my memory fail me, and if it does he will correct me, there was a provision in favor of pre-emption. I repeat that, while I am in favor of the settled land system, such as it now exists, pre-emption has no terrors for me.

The honorable Senator has thought proper to say something of the "wild, reckless, and ruinous legislation" which prevailed under the Administration of General Jackson; and informed us that, during that period in our history, the sessions of Congress were protracted to an unusual length. I was not a member of the Senate when what he referred to as the longest session ever known was held; but, I ask, what was the cause of the protracted length of that session? If any one would know, let him look at the volumes—I think there are not less than six—yes, six large volumes of “panic” memorials—which were then sent up and flooded both Houses. And let him remember the long and eloquent speeches which, for the most part, accompanied their presentation, intended to convince the American people that they were the most oppressed, impoverished, and ruined nation that ever existed. And all for what? Why, simply with a view to have the deposits restored to the United States Bank. And are we to be charged with the protraction of sessions of Congress when the true cause is so manifest? General Jackson has now retired to the Hermitage, and may perhaps live to have the judgment of posterity as it were passed upon him. He was an able, sagacious, and truly patriotic man; and I now say that those of us, if there be any such, who shall survive during a quarter of a century longer, will live to see the day when Jackson's name and fame shall be cherished alike by persons of all political parties. During the late tremendous Presidential canvass, amidst all the thousand speeches which were made, who denounced him? Not one, at least in my part of the country; and I personally know at least one, and he a man formerly opposed to General Jackson, who then lauded him to the very echo. Were that distinguished man now in power, I would not speak of him the high opinion I entertain; but now, when praise from me or any one else can no longer be suspected to proceed from selfish motives, my heart dictates to me to do him the fullest justice which my tongue can accomplish.

And now, as to the extravagance of the present Administration, have we not repeatedly called on gentlemen who so loudly urged the general charge, to specify particulars? Mr. Van Buren inherited the war with the Indians in Florida. He came into power incumbered with an immense debt for the removal of the Indian tribes west of the Mississippi, and he entered on the Presidency just at the commencement of a great fiscal revulsion, which, affecting the business concerns of the whole country, dried up the sources of revenue. He had to encounter every conceivable obstacle to a prosperous financial administration of the Government. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] can very readily give us the aggregate of expenditure which has accrued; but that is not the question. If the expenditure of a large sum was rendered necessary by the state of the country, who is to blame? Nobody. If the gentleman can go to the records, which are all open to his inspection, and point out extravagant and illegitimate charges on the Treasury, the Administration must answer for it. But whilst he merely deals in the gross, without rendering any bill of particulars to prove that the various expenditures were wasteful and extravagant, his charge falls harmless to the ground. General, indefinite accusations of this kind amount to nothing. If this country were engaged in a just and defensive war, the expenses attending it would no doubt be enormous; but would their mere magnitude constitute in itself a just charge against any Administration? Surely not. The charge of extravagance in the present case is advanced in the very face of documents going to show that the regular expenditures of the Government over which the Executive has had any control, have been in a course of gradual diminution from year to year. I sincerely hope that in this respect General Harrison may “walk in the footsteps of his predecessor.” I make no war on General Harrison in advance—it is not my nature. I will judge of his acts fairly; and if he shall go out of office, after four years, with as little just complaint, on the ground of extravagance, as Martin Van Buren will do, I shall consider his administration a most fortunate one in this particular.

On the doctrine of pre-emption, I find myself sustaining the opinions of General Harrison against his friends here. He gave the strongest evidence, by his action when in the Senate, that he was then the friend of pre-emption.

Mr. BENTON. He professed the same thing in his letters written last summer.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not know any thing as to what he may have written last summer.

Mr. BENTON. I do.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If he adheres to his principles, he is in favor of pre-emption still.

In regard to the Secretary of the Treasury, although politically his friend, I may say that my intercourse with him has not been very familiar. I shall not enter on the question of the merits of his style as a writer; but I think I can see very clearly, from what he states, how our revenue from imports during the year may amount to $19,000,000. The public papers state that the business of the country is reviving; that there have been more arrivals lately than during the same period for several years past; and can it be otherwise? From the indebtedness of the country for some time past, it was out of the question to extend our importations. The laws of trade and the interests of individuals alike forbade it. We were obliged to pay up our old debts before we could contract new ones. That time has now passed away. We are not now in debt, as a people, to Europe, except for the accruing interest on State bonds. The shackles have been fallen off from our foreign commerce, and it now floats freely. The country is exhausted of foreign goods, and now importations will naturally increase to fill up the vacuum. Commerce from abroad will naturally pour into our seaports, and the revenues of the year are, in my judgment, likely to reach $19,000,000 at the least, and I have paid no small degree of attention to the subject. I have no wish to embarrass the administration of General Harrison by leaving on his hands an empty Treasury, and I am free to say that I would rather we had been distinctly informed by the Secretary of the Treasury, at the commencement of the session, that we must provide $5,000,000; but ought our successors to complain of the issue of Treasury notes to this amount? They have now all the benefit of this argument against us, and they will have the advantage of the money also. We shall make provision for giving to General Harrison's administration a peaceful and prosperous commencement; and I think the Senator, when his friends enter into power, will find that we have swept out the house, and left it in a comfortable condition for his reception. And, so far from clearing out the Treasury, we shall give our successors $5,000,000 to commence housekeeping upon.

I conclude by repeating that I am in favor of this pre-emption bill, and equally in favor of the old and long-tried land system, and that I have yet seen no new project which will induce me to depart from it.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he should be much obliged to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania if he would furnish the Senate with some of those strong reasons which went to “illustrate the probability of a conjecture” that there would be $19,000,000 of revenue received at the Treasury during the present year. The honorable Senator, said Mr. C. has referred to the papers of the day as declaring that a considerable revival of business has already taken place. So there has, thank God, since the result of the last election has been known. But I greatly doubt whether the revenue will at once start up from $13,000,000 to $19,000,000 within a single year. It is too great a leap, considering the condition in which the Treasury was left us; and, before I can believe it, I must have some specification of the grounds on which to build such a belief.

The honorable Senator spoke of Gen. Jackson, and made that an occasion for pronouncing a eulogy upon his friend. Now, I said not a word concerning Gen. Jackson personally, but directed what I had to say to his Administration. The Senator, however, has said, and the declaration is to his honor, that the eulogy he pronounced was prompted by his heart. That the late Minister to the Court of the Emperor of all the Russias should feel some emotions of gratitude towards his distinguished patron, was to be expected, and the Senator would certainly be to blame if it were not so. I certainly shall be the last to find fault with him for giving expression to that gratitude.

It seems, however, according to the honorable Senator, that poor Mr. Van Buren came into power under very disadvantageous circumstances. It may be so; and, what is still more unfortunate, these disadvantageous circumstances have been aggravated during every year since by an excess of $8,000,000 a year in our expenditures over the receipts at the Treasury. But this was only the poor gentleman's misfortune. The honorable Senator tells us not to confine ourselves to general charges, but to go into the items of the account. That we will do when we get the papers. We have called on the Secretary of the Treasury and on the head of the Post Office Department in vain; there is in their possession a great class of papers which are not to be seen, but such as the most prodigal Administration ever known in England could never have dared to withhold from the investigation of Parliament. Give us the papers, and we will present him with items enough, and will show to him and to all the world the immense and extravagant expenditures of the Administration now going out of power. But the common sense of the people is guided by no such induction of particulars. They cannot go into all the minute items of a long account. They will look at the footing of the bill; they will compare the present with the past, and promises with performance. But if the honorable Senator challenges us to items, I could occupy days together in showing more than, perhaps, he would like to see. It is true that Mr. Van Buren was very unfortunate; he was a sort of codicil to a previous Administration, and, though most willing to “follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor,” has sometimes mistaken the path, and has been unable to regain it. Why, my God! can the Senator be serious in asking Gen. Harrison to follow in the footsteps of Martin Van Buren? If he should, one event would follow which the gentleman, perhaps, would be delighted to see—the footsteps would lead him to just such another result as we are now witnessing. But, for myself, I hope for Gen. Harrison better things. I trust he will avoid those devious and downward paths in which his predecessors have walked. I hope he will blaze for himself a new way in the forest. I hope he will put an end to those multiplied abuses which have prostrated the institutions of the country and brought the country itself down to its present low, weak, degraded, and miserable condition. I trust he will better fulfil his promises and pledges as to a wise and prosperous administration of our public affairs.

The Senator tells us that he is a great friend to our old and well-tried land system; that he will not disturb it; but is it no alteration of that system to sustain a bill which goes to supersede some of its most important provisions? He tells us that Gen. Harrison is a pre-emptioner, and that he is advocating the doctrines of Gen. Harrison against his friends here. But where, I ask, is the evidence of his friendship for our land system and his unwillingness to disturb it, when he opposes such a just and reasonable restriction as is now proposed, and leaves the bill almost boundless in its application and interminable in point of time?

The Senator over the way, (Mr. CLAY of Alabama,) thought no part of my objections worthy of the least notice but that in reference to the loss of the sixteenth section reserved in every township for the purposes of education. He says my fears on that subject are groundless, and my representations deceptive, because the sixteenth section is already reserved by a provision in the bill. That is matter of construction. It is not reserved by the words of the bill. Suppose a man should settle on the sixteenth section, (and how are you going to prevent him?) When it is found that that is a good section, and has been settled on, you will be immediately applied to to change the school section in that township for another. Have we seen nothing like this in times past?

But the Senator said that I had always warred against the new States, and against the people of his State in particular. I deny it; I repudiate the charge. It is his interpretation of my course; but I plead to his jurisdiction, and I deny the truth of his accusation. No, sir; it is the Senator himself who is warring against the interests of his own State. It is the Senator who is willing to give up the share of that State in the rich and fertile lands of Missouri and Arkansas, for a parcel of wretched, miserable pine barrens. For these he is ready to barter away the inheritance of his own Alabama, in all the rich and abundant regions northwest of the Ohio. No, sir, no; I have been the true friend of the new States, as, I hope, of all the States. In offering a just and liberal distribution among them all, of the proceeds of the the public domain, and in consideration of the peculiar situation of the newer States, I have proposed to add twelve and a half per cent. to their shares in this distribution. Is this the part of an enemy? If the Senator chose to say that, in his opinion, I was warring against the interests of his State, it would have been another thing; but I deny his right here, or that of any other Senator, to pronounce, as ex cathedra, that I am the enemy of the new States, and am warring against them. The fact is directly the reverse. I have been consulting their true interests by urging a just, liberal, generous system of policy, which would at once advance the interests and secure the ultimate prosperity of every State in the Union. I regret that the Senator should have taken occasion to make this remark. It was unnecessary; it was uncalled for. If the Senator differs from me in opinion, let him differ like a man, in an open, fair, dignified, and courteous manner. Because he opposes my course in reference to the public lands, does it therefore follow that I am hostile to the new States? I trust not; and I hope, in future, that the honorable gentleman will manifest a little more of toleration and of courtesy in his speeches here. The Senator chose to use the word "irrevocable," as applied by me to the provision of this bill. I never used the word. I said the bill was interminable in point of time; and in its present form it is interminable, until the requisite authority shall interpose to repeal it.

From a view of the whole subject, I am opposed to the bill, as impairing the amount of revenue to come into the Treasury during the present year, thereby augmenting a deficit for which provision ought long since to have been made, and as fraught with evils passing all imagination, from the disputes and contests for title among that flood of settlers which is invited from all the quarters of the known world to rush in a mass upon our public domain. I have made, and shall continue to make opposition, as heretofore, with this difference, that, whereas formerly I opposed pre-emption bills, though only retrospective in their operation, and confined to a particular district, I oppose this the more as being prospective, interminable, and reaching to the entire extent of the public domain. And, most marvellous of all, it is yet said that all this involves no interference whatever with our admirable, our venerable, and long-tried land system, which has been so justly lauded on the present occasion.

Mr. BUCHANAN said it was not his purpose to interfere in the dispute between the two Senators of the same name, though on opposite sides of the Senate and of the question. He should leave them to fight their own battle. I gave my reasons (said Mr. B.) for believing that the revenue during the present year will be much greater than that of the past, and is likely to reach $19,000,000.

Mr. CLAY. (Interposing.) Will the Senator be so good as to tell us, if the matter stands as he has just represented, how it happens that the Secretary of the Treasury has estimated the first quarter of the present year at no more than $3,000,000?

Mr. BUCHANAN said he should before he took his seat. The Senator from Kentucky has expressed an opinion contrary to mine. Mine is based on some facts, at least. His, so far as appears, is founded upon none.

Mr. CLAY. None except the product of the last year.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; but I have shown a distinction between our circumstances during the last year and the present. The Senator speaks of the revenue of the first quarter. Why, sir, we have entered but twenty days in that quarter, and what estimate can as yet be formed as to that?

Mr. CLAY. The Secretary has made one.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The receipts of this quarter will mainly depend on last fall's importations, not on those of the present year. You cannot, as yet, estimate, with any degree of accuracy, what the results will be for this year. There have been great and unusual storms on the ocean, and great destruction of property; but so many arrivals have already taken place, as to justify the expectation that the amount of duties at the custom-house will be largely increased. Every body can see that the receipts for the first quarter must, of course, fall short, because they depend chiefly on the importations of last year, and there has not been time, as yet, to show whether the Senator's estimate for the whole year or my own may prove to be correct. I calculate that there will be $19,000,000 of revenue, because the importation will probably be large, and no reduction of the tariff will occur under the existing laws till the last day of next December. But vast importations, though they augment the revenue, furnish in themselves no evidence of national prosperity. On that subject, our history runs in one eternal cycle. One year, we import too much, and have more goods than we can pay for. We become alarmed at this, and the next year import too little; and hence the history of our foreign commerce is a history of expansion and contraction, and of perpetually recurring revulsions.

The next thing I shall refer to in the remarks which fell from the honorable Senator, was, that his good taste and his good nature did not induce him to forbear from some remarks upon my poor mission to Russia.

[Mr. CLAY, (speaking across.) You filled it so well that you ought not to complain of me on that account.]

That, to be sure, is a sugar-plum, which in some measure corrects the acidity of what went before. It comes in very timely, and prevents some remarks in which I might otherwise have indulged. I can, with great truth, say that mission was wholly unsolicited by me, and that it was as unexpected as any event, the most improbable, could have been, nor was it desired by me.

[Mr. CLAY (across.) No bad thing though—not a thing for a man to turn up his nose at.]

It was not refused, it is true—but only for the reason that it was pressed with so much earnestness by the distinguished man then at the head of the Government. I accordingly yielded and went abroad; and I can say, for the benefit of any gentleman (if such there be) who may be looking forward to a foreign mission as some great thing, that he will most assuredly be disappointed, unless, indeed, he happens to be a millionaire.

I am glad, on one account, however, that I accepted the mission. The precedent may do some good to my friends on this side of the House. It requires no prophet, to predict, that in appointing members of Congress to office, General Harrison will at least follow in the footsteps of "his illustrious predecessor," and may probably leave him far behind. It would be hard indeed to deprive him of the services of so many distinguished Senators and Representatives, and equally hard to deprive them of the pleasure of serving him, by acting upon a political principle which would exclude them from office. I am happy to believe that there is no danger of any such unpleasant result. If I read the signs of the times aright, whatever objections may have existed against General Jackson on this score, they will at least be equally well founded against his illustrious successor; and if any of his friends here should happen to be looking out for "loaves and fishes," all I can say is, that I wish them God speed. I might add, if it did not weaken the force of the precedent, that the mission was not offered to me, until after I had retired from Congress, and become a private citizen.

The honorable Senator says that the time has not yet come to investigate the extravagance of the Van Buren administration. Well, I hope it may come, and I now venture to say that those who attack it will not be able to show, in the whole course of that Administration, any items of censurable extravagance. If any such exist, the opportunity to investigate them is always present. Every particular of expenditure, down to the last cent, is open before you. What act of Congress has Mr. Van Buren violated? In what has he departed from those economical principles we all profess, and which I hope we shall all practice? I know of none. We have called on gentlemen to specify particulars, but the Senator from Kentucky says that he goes only for aggregates. He looks only at the footing of the bill. Can he defend such a course? With all his ability and eloquence, can he show that this is a fair mode of judging? The question depends not on the gross amount of expenditure, but whether the expenditures have been kept within the proper limits; whether they have been wisely directed. If a man buys what is very valuable, he must pay proportionally, and no money has been expended by this administration which was not sanctioned by Congress.

On the subject of pre-emption, I think I am perfectly safe, for, although I am menaced by the giant arm of the Senator from Kentucky, yet I am shielded by that of General Harrison, the distinguished "military chieftain" who is soon to take the head of the Government. We have heard that he goes the whole for the pre-emption principle. Would it, then, not be well for the Senator from Kentucky to reconsider his opposition? Let him not attack the bill as hostile to the great principles of our land system, because it does not trench upon them at all. It does not reduce the price of the land. It proposes to keep that up at $1 25 per acre. Its whole effect is to give to the industrious and honest settler an opportunity to buy for himself a home, provided he contents himself with a quarter section of land—a small island indeed on the existing land system—a system to which I am quite as much devoted as the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he should not protract the debate, but would occupy as little time as possible, for he sought to hasten the engrossment of the bill. He was, however, called up by the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.] He had been unfortunate enough to excite that Senator's ire, because he had controverted the two alleged facts on which the Senator relied as objections drawn from the bill. The one was, that the bill destroyed and utterly took away the sixteenth or school section in every township; in contradiction to which, Mr. C. had referred to the law of the country which reserved the sixteenth section beyond the reach of danger. As to the term which the Senator had applied to the bill, Mr. C. had quoted it as "irrevocable;" it was probably "interminable;" but Mr. C. considered the two words as much the same. He should like to know the practical difference between them. If the bill was "interminable," did not that deny the power of Congress to repeal it just as much as if it was "irrevocable?" Mr. C. said he was disposed to treat the Senator from Kentucky with courtesy, but when a measure, in introducing which Mr. C. had taken an active part, was assailed in an unwarrantable manner, he felt bound to defend it. The Senator complained of Mr. C. for charging him with warring against the new States. He had made such a charge, and he thought himself warranted by facts to do so. The Senator, however, plead to his jurisdiction; and yet, in the very next breath, undertook to defend himself against the charge. Mr. C. did not claim to be the Senator's judge; he was not the judge, nor did he claim jurisdiction over him; he was the complainant, the Senator was the party to be tried; the true judge in the case was the country, and to its decision Mr. C. would leave him. The Senator might attempt to constitute himself a judge in this as in many other matters, but Mr. C. should appeal to the people of the United States, and the memorials of their Legislatures. What did they say? They had applied to Congress to have the lauds of inferior quality placed upon their proper basis; they had remonstrated against and censured the policy which that Senator advocated. They had passed upon the question; they had repeated their remonstrances and memorials for these fifteen years past, which fully confirmed Mr. C. in the opinion he had expressed. Had not the Senator advocated principles directly in contradiction to the prayer of these memorials? Had he not opposed the reduction of the price even of the swamp lands of Mississippi? The people even of the old States could see into the justice of this. Mr. C. would be willing to appeal to them; he was ready to make them his judges. But the appeal came too late; judgment had been already pronounced upon the Senator—not by Mr. C. but by his constituents, as well as by all the Senators representing the new States.

The Senator had talked about the effect of this bill in reducing the public revenue, which he represented as most ruinous; but did the honorable Senator forget that he had himself voted to distribute the entire revenue among the States? Would that have no effect in impoverishing the Treasury? Mr. C. denied the Senator's position in all its bearings. But it was most manifest that the Senator's own scheme of distribution was open to the very objection he urged against this bill in a still greater degree. The Senator seemed to have forgotten the policy he had himself been advocating and urging on the country for the last eight or nine years. Mr. C. it seemed, was already judged by the Senator for truly representing the interests and sentiments of his constituents. He was not willing, however, that the Senator from Kentucky should be his judge on that subject; he was not responsible to him. The Senator had imputed to Mr. C. the warring against the interests of his own State, when, in fact, he was but obeying her voice.

As to General Harrison, did the Senator doubt that he was pledged, both by his votes in the Senate and by his letters since, in favor of pre-emption and graduation? Did the Senator doubt this? At one time, in 1838, the Senator had a very distinct impression on that subject. When injurious epithets had been used by the Senator against the pioneers of the wilderness, the friends of General Harrison had deemed it necessary that they should speak for him as to his views on that subject; and the editor of the Commercial Bulletin, a paper published in Missouri, adverted to a letter of General Harrison, which was very laconic and to the point, stating that he was in favor of pre-emption, and had always been so. When Mr. C. read the letter he was gratified; and he presumed that he need not assure either the Senate or the gentleman from Kentucky that this avowal, together with his former votes in favor of graduation and pre-emption, went very far toward obtaining for General Harrison the amount of votes he had received. It had been very truly said by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] that the professed friends of General Harrison here were at variance with the votes and opinions of General H. himself; and yet they complained of Mr. C. and his friends, who were engaged in an effort to establish, in advance, the very principle which the coming President avowed. Mr. C. could not see any plausible objection to the measure; it merely allowed honest settlers to take up a small quantity of land, in preference to speculators and rich monopolists, who would otherwise get possession of the lands and hold them up from sale.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he would add but two or three words in reply. Nothing was further (said Mr. C.) from my purpose, in what I said when last up, than to intimate that the worthy Senator from Pennsylvania, my chairman in the Committee of Foreign Relations, did any thing improper in accepting the offer of his late mission to Russia; far, very far from it. I know what was his standing with his party, which no doubt induced the offer of such an appointment; nor do I doubt that, in accepting it, he yielded to the earnest and pressing solicitations of his worthy chief, a former President of the United States. I said that the motive which led to the eulogy pronounced by him on General Jackson was a sense of gratitude, and this feeling must doubtless have been greatly increased by the circumstances to which he referred. Besides, a foreign mission, and that a mission to Russia, is not a thing to be sneered at. No doubt the worthy Senator, in fulfilling his distinguished appointment, may have suffered much in his family affairs, and his separation from those to whom he may be bound in tender ties; and if he went, it was merely to oblige his friend and patron, who urged the appointment upon him.

A word to the Senator from Alabama. He says that I have been condemned in my views of policy by all the nine new landed States. Ah! the Senator no doubt is very correct! What says Ohio? She has been anxious for the policy I advocate for these eight years past. The Governor, in his message to the State Legislature, sanctions and recommends it. What says Indiana? Her Legislature is in favor of my distribution policy by a majority of sixty votes; and Missouri is not much behind her. And I now predict that, when that measure shall be presented to this body, there will be scarce a Senator from the new States but will be in favor of it, recommended as it is by all just and generous principles and considerations which address themselves to the mind of a patriot and a statesman.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama explained. He had referred to the opinions expressed by the new States during the fifteen years last past. He might have been mistaken as to Ohio for a few years. In the existing state of things there, placed, as she was, in the hands of a party openly opposed to graduation, the friends of the present bill could entertain no hope.

The question was now put on Mr. HUNTINGTON's amendment, restricting the operation of the bill to two years, and decided by yeas and nays as follows: Yeas 23, nays 22.

The President of the Senate voting in the negative, the amendment was rejected.

SPEECH OF MR. FULTON.

OF ARKANSAS.

IN SENATE, Monday February 1, 1841.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, was taken up, the question being on the motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN to recommend the bill, with instructions to report a bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, which Mr. YOUNG had proposed to amend by a motion to substitute for it the bill of Mr. CALHOUN, proposing to cede the lands to the States within which they lie, upon certain conditions.

Mr. FULTON said he felt it to be his duty to say a few words on the proposition just submitted by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. YOUNG] to cede the public lands to the States within which they lie. This proposition had been, as he thought, very unjustly rejected some time since, by a large majority of the Senate, when it was offered as an amendment by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN] to the proposition to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. That Senator had nobly surrendered his prejudices upon the altar of his country, and came to the rescue of the younger members of this Union. He proposed to relieve them from the odious condition of thralldom and vassalage, in which they have been hitherto held by the strong arm of power of this Federal Government. He had looked with the eye of a statesman upon the evils which have resulted from the present system, not only to the new States, but to this Government also; and which are increasing to such an alarming extent, as even to threaten the welfare and harmony of the Union itself. He therefore boldly came forward with a proposition, calculated to secure the rights of both the Federal Government and the new States, and which, at no distant day, will be regarded by all the older States as the very best measure for securing their best interests that was ever submitted to the consideration of Congress. And yet, for this great act, one of the greatest of his life, the Senator from South Carolina had been condemned by a majority of the Senators from the old States.

Nothing, sir, but the dependent condition of the new States could have driven them to consent to the terms upon which it is now proposed to cede to them the lands within their limits. The Legislature of his State had instructed her Senators to support the measure now under consideration, and he was, therefore, doubly bound to advocate this amendment, although he did not believe that the proposition was as liberal to the new States as he thought it ought to be. As the subject was, in so many aspects, of the first importance to the country and to the States, he hoped he should be indulged with the patience of the Senate, while he submitted his views in relation to it. He could not boast of coming to the consideration of this subject with impartial feelings. He acknowledged that he felt, deeply felt, the oppressiveness of the bonds into which his State had been forced to enter when she was admitted into Union. He feared, therefore, that it would not be in his power to convince the Senate of the correctness of the remarks he intended to submit. His own convictions of the correctness of the conclusions at which he had arrived, were such, however, as induced him to indulge the hope that he could demonstrate that great injustice had been done to the new States, and that instead of being condemned as untrustworthy and faithless, he hoped to be able to prove, that they had been true to their contracts beyond what even justice to themselves demanded of them.

The Constitution of the United States never intended that the new States, for whose admission into the Union it provides, should come into the Union as mere dependencies; and yet, such is the true situation, at this time, of the new States who have been admitted into the Union. The new States are completely at the mercy of the Federal Government. By refusing to sell the public lands, or raising the price so high as to prevent its sale, it is in the power of Congress so to limit the revenue of the new States as to deprive them of the means of supporting their Governments; or otherwise making it so burdensome upon the inhabitants as to deter all emigrants from settling within their limits. According to the compacts made with the new States upon their admission, the lands of the Federal Government cannot be taxed by the new States. This is a complete denial of sovereignty, and gives to this Government the entire mastery over the new States. That this power over them has not been so exercised as to be intolerable, is not because the power does not exist in this Government under these compacts, but because Congress has chosen not so to exercise it as to have palpably demonstrated its incompatibility with the spirit and intention of the Federal Constitution. This Union was originally formed of free, sovereign and independent States. They were each acknowledged by Great Britain to be free, sovereign and independent; and, by virtue of that acknowledgment, became possessed of all the powers and rights of distinct Governments, and of title to the soil within their limits, the same as Great Britain had possessed previous to that acknowledgment. They were thus created sovereign and independent States. As such States, they entered into the Federal Union, and formed their Federal Constitution. That Constitution gives to Congress the power to admit new States into this Union. Whenever Congress exercises that power, she recognises the State so admitted as a free, sovereign, and independent State, precisely as did Great Britain when she acknowledged the independence of her colonies. The Territories of the United States are to the Federal Government what the colonies were to Great Britain. They are dependencies, for whom Congress has the power granted to it to make all needful rules and regulations. Congress has the power to dispose of the soil, and to organize them into Governments, so long as they remain as the territory of the United States. But, the moment they are acknowledged to be independent States, Congress must necessarily part with all power and authority over them, excepting such as the old States granted to Congress over themselves when they entered into the Union. They have no longer any United States territory within their limits, and Congress, therefore, has no longer any right to dispose of any such Territory. "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." This is the language of the Constitution. What kind of States are here contemplated to be admitted? Why, sir, they must be co-equals in all respects with those already in the Union. They must be States, as the old States were, that is, States acknowledging no superior, owing no allegiance, possessed of every attribute of sovereignty, and entitled to all the rights, title, and jurisdiction over the territory within their limits, as appertain to every independent Government on earth. This was what the Constitution contemplated, when the power to admit new States was given to Congress. The Northwest territory was the territory provided for. It was to be disposed of by Congress for the support of the Government. It was to be sold to citizens, who were to organize themselves under its authority into dependent Governments. As was the practice in the beginning, it was contemplated that millions of acres would be disposed of to companies, and that in this way, the great body of the soil would be disposed of, before the Territory would be ready to become a State. To obtain a fair consideration for the remainder, whenever the Territory became strong enough to claim her right to independence, and her right to admission into the Union, as the co-equal of the States, the Congress should have in every instance disposed of such remainder of the territorial domain to the State about to be admitted, upon such equitable and reasonable terms as such State could have in good faith complied with. The framers of the Constitution never contemplated that this Government would become a landjobber or speculator. It was to be sold for a moderate sum to communities who could settle it. The great object was to add strength to the nation, by adding young, vigorous, and flourishing States to the Union. That these States were to have the right to exercise exclusive legislation over the soil within their limits, is proved by that provision of the Constitution, which grants to Congress "exclusive legislation over this District, and over such places within the limits of the States, as are necessary for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, and other needful buildings." The same soil cannot be subject to the legislation of two separate and distinct sovereignties. Therefore the Constitution found it necessary to obtain from the States the right of jurisdiction over so much of the soil within their limits, as was necessary for the occupancy of the military of the United States, and for the use of the Federal Government. Without this provision in the Constitution, Congress could not constitutionally exercise legislation over a foot of land within the limits of any State of this Union. The Constitution further says that "Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States." Respecting the territory belonging to the United States! The moment, then, that a territory becomes a free and independent State, the right of the United States to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting such territory so belonging to the United States, must necessarily cease and determine. That section clearly applies to a territory belonging to the United States. The moment, therefore, that such a territory become a State, it no longer belongs to the United States, and the right to dispose of it, and to legislate over it, must necessarily be surrendered. It must, therefore, be admitted, that the legislation of Congress over the soil within the limits of either of the States of this Union, is a violation of the Constitution, if the views submitted are correct.

It becomes the duty of Congress to look seriously into this matter, and to see if they were not every day of their lives violating the Constitution, when they were constantly passing laws in relation to the soil within the limits of sovereign and independent States. If these views are correct, it would seem to be the bounden duty of Congress immediately to dispose of, to the new States, all the public lands within the limits of each, and to settle forever this odious and cruel conflict, so injurious to the new States, and so unworthy of such a Government as that of the United States. To be a sovereign State, and not a dependency, the State must possess exclusive jurisdiction over the soil within her limits; she must have power to tax the soil for the support of her government, or she is dependent. But the States, as they became strong enough to ask admission into the Union, were forced to surrender this indispensable attribute of sovereignty. They have bound themselves not to interfere with the sale by Congress of the public lands within their limits, nor to tax them, so long as they remain unsold; and, in some of the States, not for five years after they are sold. These terms are directly contrary to the spirit and intention of the Federal Constitution; they are oppressive and unjust; they have materially retarded the growth of the new States; but some of them have grown astonishingly, notwithstanding they have had to contend with such great and almost insurmountable obstacles; and yet, the new States have complied in good faith with these oppressive compacts, which they were forced to submit to, or else be compelled to remain in a state of colonial dependency for an indefinite number of years. The new States have strictly complied with their contracts, notwithstanding the odious condition in which it places them. They permit their own citizens to become officers of this Government, who sell the public lands without molestation or difficulty—they receive your money, and pay it into the National Treasury. Their citizens are constantly driven to apply to Congress to pass laws for their relief; and they and their representatives are placed in the humble attitude of supplicants for your justice and liberality at each succeeding session of Congress. Is it not mockery to call the new States independent, so long as they are held in such a state of vassalage? But, it is now proposed to place them at the mercy of some twenty masters. Make it the interest of the old States to raise the price of the public lands, and you stop at once all liberal action on the part of Congress towards the settlers in the new States. You create a desire on the part of the States to get all the money they can out of the citizens of the new States—you whet their appetites for gold, procured from others without labor or exertion. This appetite for gold will increase with every contribution, and at last, it will not be satisfied but with the life's blood of the citizens of the new States. He regarded the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands as a violation of the compacts into which the new States have been forced to enter; and he anticipated that the new States, in justice to themselves, would be compelled to claim the right to all the soil within their limits, (which such violation of the compact would make necessary for their preservation) if this distribution measure is ever adopted; and which their recognition by the United States as sovereign States would have given them, had they not been forced to enter into such compacts.

The effect of such a measure, upon the State he had the honor in part to represent, would be terrible indeed. Her people would be drained of every dollar, to go into the treasuries of other States—no sir, to go into the pockets of foreign bankers, who would realize it, as clear profits, from the enhancement of the value of State stocks, which must inevitably result from the passing of such a law: or, perhaps, her citizens would be driven off, to get rid of the oppressions and burdens which they would not be able to bear. Arkansas was organized as a Territory before any of her lands were sold. Suppose Congress had refused to dispose of any of the lands at a fair price, and her citizens had remained in that situation until she was admitted into the Union as a State. Suppose then, that speculators had come into the State, and had purchased the homes of all her citizens, and had attempted to drive them, with their wives and children, from their dwellings—could they have succeeded in such an attempt? Would not the State have protected her citizens? Could this Government have enforced such an attempt at dispossession? If the State of Arkansas could thus be prevented from taxing her lands for her support—if she could not protect her citizens against such calamities, would she be a sovereign State? Would she be placed upon an equal footing with the other States of this Union? Would it not be idle to call her independent? If you distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, the only effect it will have will be to raise the value of State bonds. You will deprive this Government of five millions annually of revenue; and you force her to lay that amount of duties upon our importations of articles which the people are compelled to purchase, and for which they will have to pay five millions of dollars more than they now pay, to make up for the deficiency; and the result of the whole operation will be, not to give relief any where, but to enable the present holders of State stocks to realize at least five millions of dollars of profits per annum upon their investments. Suppose that Congress, under the power to dispose of the territory, should attempt to give the lands themselves, in the new States, instead of the proceeds of the sales of those lands, to the old States, (and this would be a much nearer compliance with the unlimited power claimed for Congress, under the word "dispose," than that which is contended for,) would the new States submit to such a donation of the soil within their limits? If the lands in Arkansas were given to any State in this Union, such State or States would never be able to exercise any right of ownership over the lands so granted. She would resist the claim of such masters, and she would be driven to exercise the rights of a sovereign State over all the unappropriated lands within her limits.

To settle forever all these difficulties, and to remove all grounds of conflict, between those States, who ought to be, in all respects, equal; to place it in the power of the new States to derive a fair revenue from the soil over which they ought to be able to exercise complete jurisdiction; to place it in the power of their citizens to add to the wealth of their States, by their labor and enterprise, instead of thereby adding, as they now do, to the wealth of the United States, by enhancing the value of the public lands; to restore harmony and tranquillity to the Union, lessen the expenses and legislation of Congress, and forever to remove a great engine capable of influencing most dangerously almost all our elections, the amendment now under consideration proposes to cede to the new States, upon terms the most equitable for this Government, all the lands within the limits of each State. The amendment provides that the States shall pay over to the United States 65 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. This is nearly equal to what is realized by this Government by the existing system. It costs this Government 22 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales to carry on the present system. To this add the five per cent. granted to the new States for internal improvements, and the various expenses which cannot be enumerated, and we have nearly 35 per cent. the amount proposed to be allowed to the new States for expenses and all other responsibilities. It was said by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] that the expenses to the States for selling the public lands would not exceed two per cent. It is impossible to say what those expenses would be. But that is not the question. The calculation ought to be founded upon the cost of the system to the United States. Ought not this Government to be willing to give up to the States the amount which the present system costs, in order to obtain a fair settlement of this vexatious question? But it is contended that the new States could not be relied upon to pay over faithfully to the United States the 65 per cent. which they had contracted to pay. It is said that the new States would be unfaithful, and could not be relied upon. This is said, too, by Senators who have always complained at the slightest imputation on State credit. But to prove the injustice of the assertion, just look at the conduct of the new States under the present system. They have surrendered rights to which they were clearly entitled, as free and independent States. Rather than remain in a state of territorial dependency, they surrendered what the Constitution guarantees to every sovereign State; and they have hitherto always acted in good faith, and in all respects complied with the compacts entered into. They have never interfered with the primary disposal of the public lands, nor have they attempted to tax it, or to exercise any ownership over it. They have groaned under oppression, and yet they have not revolted. How then can it be supposed that they will not act equally in good faith, in paying over the 65 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands? Their failure to do so would be an annulment of the contract; they would therefore have every inducement to comply most strictly. But even if it were admitted that the States could not be entirely relied upon was there not a proposition which ought to obviate every objection? It is proposed that the States shall pay over the receipts from the lands quarterly, monthly, or as they are received; or that they should go directly into the hands of an officer of the Government. As your present land officers are citizens of the States, and you have found that they can trust them with perfect safety, how can it be supposed that they would be less trustworthy, if employed by the State, in the same service? The Senator from Indiana [Mr. SMITH] has justly said, that the new States will receive much more under the distribution principle, than under the cession measure. Besides their proportions of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, the distribution bill proposes to give to the new States 15 or 17½ per cent. of the sales within their limits; add to this the 500,000 acres of land proposed to be granted, and you have a much larger sum annually paid, than the 25 per cent. which the cession bill proposes. But by the cession bill, the rights of the new States, and their citizens, are to be secured; and these are objects of such vital importance to them, that they are not to be weighed in the balance, against dollars and cents. He regarded the proposition to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, as one of the most fatal measures to the interests of the new States, and, indeed, as demoralizing to all the States, that had ever been brought forward. It was a bad measure when the Treasury was full; but now, when it is empty, and our revenue is diminishing, to think of giving away a part of that revenue, and to tax the people proportionably higher, to make up the deficiency thus created, seemed to him to be an act of extravagance, if not of madness, which he was at a great loss to comprehend. If, however, we must have money paid over to the States, why not pay over to them the 65 per cent. which the cession bill produces, and thus permit the new States to become, in reality, free, sovereign, and independent members of the Union!

But, sir, let us look a little into this proposition to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. The Constitution never contemplated any other territory as belonging to the United States, excepting that lying in the forks of the Ohio and Mississippi, and that west of Georgia and north of Florida, to the Mississippi river. The Constitution gives no authority to the Congress or to the Executive to purchase territory from a foreign State. The purchases which were made, therefore, from France and Spain, were unconstitutional, and only became a part of the Union by the acquiescence of the States united.

All the provisions of the Constitution relating to the territory belonging to the United States refer to this territory, and, it is to this territory exclusively that the compacts entered into between the United States and certain States which ceded their right to the waste lands, applies. Let us see what are the provisions of these compacts. That of Virginia, so far as it relates to this subject, is in these words; he was compelled to quote them, although so often quoted by other Senators:

"The lands so ceded shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become members of the Confederation, or federal alliance of said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure; and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

During the Confederation this Government was supported by contributions from the States. Congress had no power to raise a revenue; therefore it was agreed that the proceeds of the sales of the lands ceded by Virginia, and indeed all the States, should be applied exclusively to the support of the Confederation; in this way only could they lessen equally the burdens of each of the States. By these compacts these proceeds were set apart forever for the support of the National Government; and it was expressly stipulated that they should never be applied to any other purpose whatsoever. All the States then in the Confederation, and all the States that have come into the Union since, are equally bound by this compact, (for the Constitution provides that all such contracts shall be binding upon the United States), and any attempt to apply these proceeds to any purpose whatsoever, except the national "charge and expenditure," is a palpable violation of the compact. The right to these lands was never recognised as belonging to any one State by the Confederation; they were claimed as a purchase made by the common blood and treasure of all the States. The compacts entered into by the Confederation with the claiming States, were designed to settle the controversy. The proceeds were, therefore, set apart as a "common fund," for the common benefit of all the States then in, or afterwards coming into the Confederation. The States separately can have no right whatever to these lands; they were ceded in full property to the Confederation, on the express condition, that the proceeds of the sales should be exclusively applied to the support of the Confederation, and to no other purpose whatsoever. The giving, therefore, of these proceeds to the States, or its application to the payment of State debts, would be directly in the very face of these compacts. The proceeds of these lands were to be forever applied to the support of this Government, and were intended to lessen, in proportion to their amount, the revenue which Congress was authorized to raise from other sources since the union, or by requisitions upon the States during the Confederation. It has been pointedly asked, what would be done with the surplus, if the lands yielded more than the Government required? The answer is, we must take care of it; and if such a thing could be possible, that we would never have use for such a surplus, it would have to remain the property of the nation, precisely as other national property. The imperative command of the compact is, that this fund shall be bona fide applied to the support of the National Government, and to no other use or purpose whatsoever. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] compared this fund to a fountain belonging to a number of persons, and contended that each of the proprietors would have a right to draw pails of water from it, without doing injustice to either. He contended that this fund might be more properly compared to a stream of water which had been in dispute amongst a number of individuals, and who, to settle the dispute, had entered into a partnership in carrying on a mill for their common benefit, and, thereupon, those claiming the water course entered into a compact with the company, by which they conveyed the water course to the company, upon the express condition that the water of the stream should be forever appropriated to the uses of the mill, and to no other purpose whatsoever. Would the parties, without a dissolution of the partnership, have a right to divert this stream to their private benefit? He was satisfied that the lands ceded by the States to the Confederation, and now belonging to the United States, could be disposed of by Congress for no other purpose, except for the support of the Government. The Constitution gives to Congress the power to dispose of them. The compact stipulates the purpose to which alone the proceeds are to be applied.

It is contended that the term "dispose of," gives unlimited power to Congress over the public lands, and authorizes the Congress to apply the proceeds to such objects and purposes as, in their discretion, they may deem would be best for the country. He contended that the power to "dispose of," gave only the right to sell, and that the avails of such sales went into the Treasury, as other revenue. The very first act of Congress on this subject, provided that the proceeds of such sales should go into the Treasury. But this power to dispose of was expressly given in compliance with the compacts; and the words "dispose of," are taken from the compacts. The Virginia deed of cession says, this fund shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of, to meet the common charge and expenditure, and for no other purpose whatsoever. Here, then, is the purpose for which these lands were granted to the United States, and here is the origin of the power of Congress to dispose of the territory. Hence it was that the framers of the Constitution gave to Congress, in compliance with these compacts, the power to dispose of the Territory of the United States. If the power to dispose of the territory carries with it an unlimited power to make use of the proceeds, so also does the power to lay and collect taxes, etc. give unlimited power to apply the money so raised at discretion. He thought it clear that the claim of power in Congress to distribute the proceeds of the sales of lands acquired by cession from the States, was in direct contravention of the deeds of cession themselves, and contrary, also, to the provision of the Constitution which gave to Congress the power to dispose of the territory of the United States. The amount would be so small that it would not be worth contending for, if the distribution is confined to the territory ceded by the States. The main argument applies only to that territory, but the distribution bill covers all the territory of the United States. How can it be contended that the country purchased from France and Spain—all the territory comprehended within the limits of Louisiana and Florida—can be disposed of by Congress, and the proceeds given to the States? This country was purchased by the United States. It was paid for with the money of the United States. A part of the revenue raised to support the Government had been applied to this purpose; and consequently the property so purchased belonged to the United States collectively, and not to the separate States. The proceeds of the sales of this territory consequently become a portion of the revenue of the United States, and to distribute it among the States, would be no less unjust than it would be to impose duties upon importations to be so distributed. It appeared to him that these views could not but strike the minds of all who heard him as sound and conclusive; and he therefore felt himself justified in expressing the opinion, that if Congress attempts to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, sold in the State of Arkansas, that State would be bound to enter her solemn protest against the measure, as unconstitutional and unjust. But what was the bill to which this proposition to distribute the proceeds of the public lands is offered as an amendment? It was a simple pre-emption bill, such as had been passed repeatedly by Congress, except that it operated prospectively, and if it became a law, the settlers who go upon, and improve the public lands, could not afterwards be denounced as criminals. It would permit that to be done, which we cannot prevent from being done, and the doing of which had, as he believed, operated most beneficially for the country. These settlers go into the wilderness and open the country for settlement—they bring it to the notice of purchasers, and cause it to be settled and sold, and they greatly enhance, by their labor and improvements, all the public lands which surround them. So well satisfied of this was the Congress which disposed of a million and a half of acres to the Ohio company, that they granted the company 100,000 acres upon the express condition that it should be given (not sold at the minimum price) to actual settlers, in tracts of 100 acres to each settler. If the price to be paid by the settlers was much less than can otherwise be obtained for the land, it would furnish some cause for opposition on the part of those who look mainly to the amount of money for which the public lands are sold. This, however, is not the fact. The truth is, a cent or two over the minimum price is all that is obtained for the public lands. A document recently laid on the tables of Senators, fully proved the correctness of this assertion. This document proved that there had been sold, between 1833 and 1840, 65,842,807 87-100 acres of land. The amount realised from the sales so made, was $72,269,749 58, being a little less than $1 27 per acre—not quite two cents more than this bill requires to be paid by settlers for their lands. Will you drive the poor man from his home, and take his cabin and cultivated field away from him, rather than give him a preference over the speculator of two cents per acre in the purchase of his little improvement? Put your lands up at auction, and what is the result? Why, sir, the moment you issue your proclamation of a sale, the speculators put their agents at work. They obtain the numbers of every valuable tract to be sold. They meet together at the sale. They form a company and agree to bid off all the good land offered. They accordingly purchase it at a fraction over the minimum price, as they have no competitors. Immediately after the public sale is over, they have an auction amongst themselves, and each one purchases the tracts he wishes to buy, and pays for it in proportion to its value, or as there may be bidders who come into competition. The proceeds of this sale are divided amongst the company, and thus the speculators realize all the profits of your auction system. This is your auction system. This is the system which has been so much and so constantly lauded in this chamber, as one which could not be improved, and ought not to be changed. Whilst those who advocate the pre-emption system, which has done so much towards the opening and settling of your wild lands, are bitterly complained of as promoters of the most lawless course of conduct on the part of men who are denounced as criminals of the worst description! Why, sir, these criminals, as they are called, would compare, in point of worth, integrity, and enterprise, with the very best of those who denounce them. They are not known to Senators, or they would not be thus spoken of. Arkansas was organized as a Territory when nearly all her citizens were settlers upon the public lands. Go to your land offices, and you will find that men who have been members of Congress, and have filled the highest stations in the old States, have settled upon public land, and have proved up and got a title to their lands as pre-emptioners. For generosity, capacity to endure hardship, and noble daring, no people are equal to the pre-emptioners who settle upon the wild lands of the West and South. They go there poor and penniless, (having expended every thing in reaching the wilderness,) with their wives and children, and in a year or two, you find them occupying a snug cabin, with a cultivated field, and surrounded by every thing necessary to support life. From this humble beginning, with industry and perseverance, they soon become independent, and in time become the best and worthiest of the inhabitants of a new country. It was to secure a home to such settlers as he had described, that the committee had reported the original bill. It was to save all such from falling into the power of the speculators in the public lands that he felt so anxious for the passing of the bill. He sincerely trusted that if nothing would be done to give freedom, sovereignty, and independence to the new States, the Senate would, as a simple act of justice, protect the settler against the power of the speculator.

He did not see how any Senator could vote against the pre-emption bill. They had all voted for it; some as a separate measure, others when incorporated in the distribution bill, and others when it was included in the bill for ceding the lands to the new States. A great deal had been said against it as a distinct measure, and its evils had been depicted in the strongest language. It had been denounced as an attempt to seize upon the public lands; and the enterprising settlers had been compared to public depredators. He had listened to these assaults upon the honest and industrious citizens of the new States with pain and mortification, and he felt assured that no such language would have been used towards them, if they were known to Senators as they were to him. He felt assured that they would not be regarded as the less worthy and respectable by their neighbors and friends, on account of such denunciations. But what struck him with much force, was the circumstance that those who had thus abused the settlers on the public lands, had voted for the distribution amendment which offers to the settlers double the quantity of land which is secured to them by the pre-emption bill.

He still hoped that the amendment which proposes to cede the lands to the new States, would find favor with the Senate. If not, he felt sure that the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CARTTENDEN] would be rejected; and that the simple pre-emption bill of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] would pass the Senate by a decided vote.

SPEECH OF MR. TAPPAN,

OF OHIO.

In Senate, February 23, 1841.—The bill to incorporate the banks of the District of Columbia being under consideration,

Mr. TAPPAN proposed the following as an amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following

That from and after the passage of this act, if any person or persons shall establish or continue any bank in the District of Columbia, such person or persons shall first deposit in the office of the recorder of deeds for the county in which such bank may be established, a schedule in writing, containing the names and places of residence of each and every stockholder in such bank, with the number and value of the shares by him or her held, and shall cause the same to be recorded with the recorder of deeds in the office, and shall also publish said schedule in two of the newspapers having the most general circulation in the District three calendar months; and every sale or transfer of stock in such bank, within ten days after such transfer shall have been made, shall be placed upon record, and published in like manner, by such person or persons so establishing or continuing such bank. And a copy of such record duly certified shall be admitted in all courts as competent evidence of the fact of any person therein mentioned being a stockholder in such bank. And if any person or persons shall establish or continue any bank in the District of Columbia, without recording and publishing the names and places of residence of the stockholders in such bank, as is herein provided, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay not less than five hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars, for each and every day such person or persons shall continue any bank as aforesaid, to be recovered by indictment, for the use of the county in which such offence may be prosecuted.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be unlawful for any individual banker or banking company, or for any other person or company, to issue any bank notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars, or by any art, shift or device, to issue and put in circulation any paper, certificate, check, order, or note whatsoever, payable to bearer and intended to circulate as currency, of a less denomination than twenty dollars; and any person or persons offending herein shall forfeit and pay not less than five hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars, for each and every note, order, check, or certificate, so issued and put in circulation as aforesaid: one-half of the same to be for the use of the person prosecuting therefor, and the residue for the use of the county where the banking-house of such individual banker or banking company shall be located, to be recovered by action of debt in any court having jurisdiction thereof.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if at any time in usual banking hours, the paper of such individual or company shall be presented to such individual or company, or any officer by him or them employed at their banking house or office, and payment demanded of the same, and payment thereof in gold or silver shall be refused, or unreasonably delayed, the holder of such note may make affidavit of such demand and refusal or delay, before any justice of the peace of the proper county; whereupon the said justice shall issue his summons against such individual, or any officer or partner in such company, to be and appear before him, or some other justice of the peace, at a time to be stated in said summons, which time shall be within twenty-four hours from and after the same shall have been issued, then and there to show cause why judgment should not be entered against such individual, officer, or partner, for the amount of said note; and unless the party defended in said writ shall appear and plead that the note upon which suit is brought is not the note of such individual or company, or that legal and proper demand of payment has not been made, and verify such plea by the oath of the said defendant or his agent or attorney, it shall be the duty of the justice to enter up a judgment against such defendant for the amount of such note, with twenty per cent. damages and costs of suit, and to issue his execution, as in other cases therefor.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That such individual or company thinking himself or itself aggrieved, shall have relief upon an appeal only, both as to matter of law and matter of fact; which appeal shall be granted on the following and no other terms; that is to say, the individual or company demanding such appeal shall enter into bond to the plaintiff, with at least one sufficient freeholder within the District, and in the penalty of one hundred dollars, conditioned that the appellant shall appear and prosecute the said appeal in the next circuit court to be held in the county in which the said judgment shall have been rendered, shall stand to and abide the judgment of the said court, and pay such further costs as shall be taxed, with twelve per cent. damages from the date of the original judgment, if the same be affirmed; and that the said appeal in all other respects shall be carried on and conducted as provided by law in other cases, and that it shall not be lawful for the defendant in the said action to supersede the said judgment in any other manner than by the said appeal.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That in all cases prosecuted under this act, the plaintiff may appeal, if the judgment of the magistrate should be against him, in the manner now authorized by law, to the next term of the circuit court for the county wherein the said judgment shall have been given; and on such appeal, the said circuit court, if they shall reverse the judgment of the magistrate, shall render such judgment as the said magistrate ought have given, with costs, both below and of the appeal.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, after the taking effect of this act, pass, or offer to pass, any bank note of a less denomination than twenty dollars, otherwise than in payment to a bank or banking company, such person shall forfeit and pay double the amount of such note, for the use of the person suing for the same, to be recovered by action of debt before any magistrate having jurisdiction, to the amount thereof.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall establish a bank and issue their notes for circulation as money, without the means or ability of redeeming the same in current coin, with intent to defraud, he, she, or they, so offending, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; and, on conviction thereof, upon indictment in any court of competent jurisdiction, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary not less than three, nor more than ten years, and shall pay the costs of prosecution.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the twenty-ninth, thirtieth, thirty-first, and thirty-second sections of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to certain banks in the District of Columbia, and to prevent the circulation of the notes of unincorporated associations within the said District," be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

MR. PRESIDENT: The question now before the Senate is one of great importance to the country.

The bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia proposes simply to revive and continue in force the expired charters of six of the banks of this District, without any change in the powers and privileges granted by those charters. The amendment I have offered, and upon which the question is now to be taken, proposes to place the banks of this District upon the same foundation of equal privileges and equal competition with every other establishment, corporate or not corporate, in the District; it proposes, in fact, to introduce the principle of free trade into the banking business of the country; to withhold from the business of trading in money or credit what is withheld from all other business carried on in the community—its monopoly character; and, while the business itself is permitted to remain under the protection of the law without other restraint than the public safety requires, to withhold from its conductors any special public recognition of their exclusive fitness for the business, and the endorsement of the legislative power that they, and they alone, are worthy of all trust and confidence in conducting their manufactories.

This bill is brought in upon a petition of the bankers of this District and their friends and dependents; the petition is signed by about two hundred names; the population of this District is computed to be upwards of 60,000, probably it is 80,000, so that not one eightieth part of the adult male population ask for the passage of this bill. And what, Mr. President, are the powers and privileges these people ask to have revived and continued? They ask, first, the power of making and putting afloat the whole circulating medium of the District, with the privilege of levying a tax on the community of between six and seven per cent. for its use; and, as the power to issue paper in the laws sought to be revived is unlimited, so the power to levy a tax for its use is to be unlimited. Second, they ask that their money may, by our legislation, be enhanced in value to as great extent as they think proper, or rather that their stock notes (for they are not bound to have a specie capital) may have an unlimited value given to them over the gold and silver of their fellow-citizens. And, lastly, they ask to be formally, and, by anticipation, exonerated from all liability to pay any debts they may contract in this highly favored business.

If, sir, we now approached this subject for the first time—if these manufacturers of paper money now were for the first time, in the world's history, asking us to bestow upon them these privileges, to the exclusion of all others, it would strike us, not merely with astonishment at the audacity of their impudence, but with a strong sense of the ludicrous, that they should calculate so largely upon our unbounded simplicity. Suppose that gold and silver had formed the entire circulation of the country from time immemorial; that no other had been invented, and some scheming John Law were to address a memorial to you, setting forth, in the style of our bank orators, the great superiority of paper over gold and silver for a circulating medium, and praying for the exclusive privilege of manufacturing such paper, and putting it in the hands of every body—of levying a tax for the use of it equal to six per cent. per annum, payable every sixty days in advance—that this paper might be allowed to represent credit, not money—and, finally, that the petitioner might be expressly exonerated by law from any liability for the payment of his debts, beyond the money he should place in his own chest for that purpose—with what good humored surprise, sir, you would receive such an application!

Nothing proves more conclusively that individuals and nations are governed by habit, than our use of the paper of incorporated companies. We have acquired this habit by slow and imperceptible degrees; and now there are intelligent and disinterested men who really believe, not merely that this manufactory ought to be protected, but that it ought to be protected by a monopoly and by exemption from liability upon its obligations. I am not so visionary as to attempt to change the habit of using paper for money; but, believing that this habit is becoming injurious to the public interest and subversive of morals, I am for taking from the money power its tendency to evil, while all its capacity to aid the mercantile interests of the country is left in undisturbed vigor. Nor can this be considered as a party question: both political parties have joined in conferring these exclusive privileges upon the banks; both have suffered by it; and many of both parties have become satisfied that the evils of our banking system are very great, and ought to be removed. All are interested in whatever improves or deteriorates the currency. The party going out of power, as well as the party coming into power, can have no interest at stake which should induce them to grant the privileges asked for by these petitioners. May I not hope and expect, then, that this subject will be calmly discussed and fully examined, that the Senate may come to a correct judgment upon the amendment proposed?

It is necessary to understand precisely what those who petition for the passage of this law ask for. Do they ask for the privilege of lending their money at six per cent. or any other rate of interest? Not at all; for they have already full and entire liberty to do this. Do they ask to be permitted to sell their individual notes, payable to bearer on demand, or to lend them upon interest? Not they. No law prohibits such traffic. In this District individuals may dispose of their notes as they please, and the people of the ten miles square may use such notes, written or engraved, for money. There is no law to disturb them. These are rights and privileges the whole people enjoy; but this is not enough for these petitioners. If left the advantages common to all the citizens, they must be left to all the common responsibilities. They would lose their highly prized monopoly. They want some advantages over their fellow men. The power of levying a tax for their own use is what they want. This cannot be done without a charter, and therefore they ask for a charter. They pray Congress to say to the world, that the business of making paper money is a very meritorious business, worthy of all patronage and encouragement; and that this small portion of the good people of this District are alone worthy of public trust and confidence in carrying on that business; so that when they get this sanction for their business and character, having got a law punishing with fine and imprisonment all others who, in this free and enlightened country, may attempt to carry on the same business, they may drive out from circulation the gold and silver, and supply its place with their notes; notes for which they draw interest. And as the charters sought to be revived do not limit the quantity of paper to be put in circulation, these petitioners propose that their taxing power shall be as extensive as the public credulity and their industry in circulating their paper can make it.

To what extent this taxing power is used by the banks, in this District, I have not the means of determining. We have a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, giving us some information what it is in the whole United States. I doubt much whether the debasement of the coin, resorted to by some despotic princes in former times, to fleece their subjects, was ever as onerous a tax as is paid with great cheerfulness by the American people, for the mere pleasure of using pictures for money, instead of the constitutional currency. From the data given by the Secretary, the amount must exceed thirty millions of dollars per annum; an enormous sum, making the currency of the country cost more than the Government of the country, including the maintenance of our fleet and army.

In asking for a revival of these defunct charters, these petitioners pray you to raise the value of their property to an indefinite extent. Those charters authorize the issue of paper, without any limitation of the amount. In general, bank charters require a certain amount of gold and silver coin to be paid into the bank, and allow the issue of paper to not exceeding three times the amount of specie so paid in. Not so with these banks; they are under no obligation to keep any specie on hand, excepting as they are required to pay gold and silver for their notes at all times. Nor is there any thing but the demand for the article in this market which, in any way, limits the amount of paper they may put in circulation. It results from this state of things, that while the mechanic, with his one hundred dollars in gold and silver, can purchase but one hundred bushels of wheat, the banker who has subscribed his one hundred dollars to the stock of a bank, may make one thousand paper dollars, and buy with it one thousand bushels of wheat. His situation is even better than this; for he need not keep his specie in bank—he may put in his own note, take out the specie, and sell it for a premium. The difference between the mechanic, or other laborer, and the banker, then, is this: the former has to earn every dollar he expends, the latter has to manufacture it; the former has no credit but what his habits of industry and moral character give him; the latter has a credit created by law. If a farmer were to ask Congress to pass a law whereby his bushel of wheat should be held and accounted in all sales as three bushels, entitling him to receive for it the market price of three bushels, it would not be more absurd, in reality, than it is for these bankers to ask to have their money appreciated in value. But the farmer's petition might be granted with safety; for men would not buy such wheat. It is only in the trade of bank paper that men fail to estimate the article at its real value. There is no danger that they will mistake a pint for a quart measure, or take twelve inches for a yard of cloth.

Another advantage sought by these petitioners is, to be exempted from liability upon their contracts. A bank is liable, as a corporation, nominally to the extent of its stock. The individual members of an incorporated bank are liable only to the extent of their subscriptions: so that, if, for every hundred dollars of stock subscribed, they contract debts to the amount of one thousand dollars, and the bank fails, the stockholders lose only the hundred dollars, the public lose the rest. The property purchased by the bankers with their notes cannot be taken by the holders of those notes, and applied to their payment; unless the assets of the bank will redeem its paper, the holders must lose it. Every member of society, excepting only the banker, is held responsible for the payment of his debts; the law exacts from him every cent of his property, and even holds his future earnings liable to their liquidation; but the banker is invited, by a charter of incorporation, to engage in hazardous speculations, to become a desperate gambler in stocks and merchandise and lands, and is told by that charter that, if he fails to redeem his paper, the stocks and merchandise and lands he has purchased, shall not be taken from him and given to his creditors. Can any thing in legislation be more iniquitous, holding out a premium upon villany, and rewarding dishonesty? It is this exemption from liability for their debts which induces bankers to use such exertions to obtain charters. If they conduct their business prudently, they would not issue more paper than they had means to redeem. Character and credit, and a reasonable circulation for their paper, might be obtained without a charter; and if bankers were honest, and intended to remain so, and content themselves with the sure and reasonable profits of a fair business, they would not ask for charters; they would no more think of asking for such exemption from liability than would the farmer, the merchant, or the mechanic.

May we not ask what authority has Congress to grant such extensive and valuable privileges to these petitioners? It has none—none whatever. Examine the Constitution of the United States, and you find there the power to coin money and regulate its value; but you find no power, express or implied, to charter banks, or to authorize the making of paper money. It was evidently intended that Congress should have the entire power over the currency of the country; and they must have this power, or they cannot regulate the value of the circulating medium. The power to coin the money of the country is vested exclusively in Congress. No part of it is reserved to the States; and do you suppose, sir—does any Senator suppose—that Congress may delegate the power to coin money, and regulate its value, to the States? may delegate it to fifty or an hundred men in this District? No one would pretend this; and yet, by granting these bank charters, you grant the power to regulate the value, not of the gold and silver coin of the country merely, but of all property. I will not attempt to prove what is known to every body. You cannot keep gold and silver and paper in circulation together—the paper always drives out the gold and silver, and takes its place. The gold and silver is hoarded, or sold as merchandise, and paper becomes the exclusive, actual circulating medium of the country. Your power to regulate the value of the only legal and constitutional currency of the country, has become impotent by your own unwise legislation, and the usurpations of the States; for the States, although forbid to issue bills of credit, in defiance of the maxim that power not possessed cannot be delegated, have authorized by their laws innumerable companies to make and vend bills of credit—by the most manifest usurpation, have given the entire power over the currency of the country to others, when they did not possess any portion of such power themselves.

But the friends of this bill do not pretend to sustain the power to charter these banks upon any clause in the Constitution, but the one which gives Congress the power of exclusive legislation over this District. This power is general; but it would be a gross error to suppose that because the power is general, it is, therefore, unlimited. It is limited by the freedom of our principles of government, and by the immutable laws of justice. The people of this District are citizens of a free and Democratic Commonwealth, entitled to the most perfect equality of rights and privileges. We have no power to destroy this equality; we have no power to give to one-sixteenth part of the people the power of raising a revenue for their own emolument from the remaining fifteen-sixteenths; we have neither power to change this District into a monarchy, by placing a master over it, or an aristocracy with a riband at its button hole, or a pen behind its ear to tax it. Suppose that, instead of a petition for the exclusive privilege of making the money of the District, we were asked to grant these men the exclusive right of supplying all the fuel wanted here, and were also asked to punish with fine and imprisonment any person not of the privileged company who should sell coal or wood—should we hear the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. MENNICK], who is so eloquent in favor of these banks, tell us that the people were asking “for their clear and undoubted rights,” and that to refuse this monopoly of fuel “would be ruinous to the trade and business of this district?” I think not; and yet the supply of fuel is as necessary as the supply of paper money; it requires quite as much capital to purchase it and bring it here for distribution, as it does to buy the paper, the ink, and engraving for bank notes. It would not be as severe an infliction, I think, to be compelled to use gold and silver for our money as it would to do without fuel; and yet there is not a Senator here who would sustain such a petition—not one, sir, but what would feel such a petition to be a mockery. But we have the same power to grant the exclusive privilege in the one case as in the other; and the same pretence of the public good may be urged as strongly and as truly in both. It may go further: if a chartered company is necessary to make the paper money of the District—if capital cannot be found in individual hands sufficient for that business, then all business which requires capital to carry it on, equally requires a charter for that purpose, and equally requires to have its exclusive privileges guarded by fine and imprisonment. It is an utter perversion of justice in a State pretending to be governed by equal laws, to give to A and B advantages which are denied to C and D. This injustice is not seen in the banking business of the country, for habit has blinded us to its enormous evils. But let the proposition be made to give the exclusive right of supplying us with any other article, and all men, except those who were to be the privileged few, would unite in condemning it. It would be seen at once that Congress had no power to make such grants—no pictures of ruin and desolation—no array of widow and orphan stockholders would have power over our sympathies, or would for an instant warp the public judgment upon such a proposition.

Congress have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, and excises, but they are not authorized to delegate this power of taxation. All the purposes for which money may be raised by taxation, are enumerated; the enriching of corporations is not one of them. Taxes can only be raised by Congress for the benefit of the whole people of the United States, as taxes can only be raised by a State Government for the benefit of the whole people of the State. The power of fixing the amount to be raised cannot be granted to companies. In the one case or the other, it is exclusively a legislative power, to be exercised by the immediate representatives of the people, and by no others, for the public good. Have Senators ever looked into the working of this banking system? Have they ever examined the operation of the laws granting these privileges? If you have, you know that immense revenues are raised annually from the people of these United States, not to be placed in the public treasury, but in the pockets of the tax-gatherers; not to be appropriated to public use—not to be laid out in building fleets and maintaining armies, in erecting public works or making roads and canals—not even to be distributed among the poor and destitute; no, sir, but to make the rich richer—to convert the labor of the poor to the emolument of the wealthy.

But would you deny the people of this District privileges which are enjoyed by their neighbors? it is asked. To this I answer, if it is wrong in every point of view, (as I trust I have demonstrated,) to grant these exclusive privileges, I would not hesitate to deny them to these petitioners. No length of time, or uniformity of practice, can sanction error, or make that which is unjust and iniquitous, just and right; or give to usurped power the validity of constitutional delegation.

At what time are we asked to do this? In what condition of the banking institutions, and of the banking business of the country, and of this District, are we asked to revive and continue this business under the sanction of law? Why, sir, it is at a time when the banks are going down—when the public will no longer tolerate their contempt of moral obligations, their multiplied frauds and extortion—when the banks throughout the whole country are rotting down, we are asked to raise and sustain them. We cannot do this lawfully, and happily we cannot do it physically, for they cannot be sustained; public opinion has set its irrevocable seal on them. If we revive these charters, and these banks attempt to go on with business on a sound specie basis, fairly and honestly, they will follow their predecessors in the District to utter bankruptcy and dissolution. The reason is obvious to any one who will look at the subject; the business is overdone; a fair and honest banking business is no longer profitable, is scarcely any longer possible. When a bank issues its promise to pay money on demand, it neither has or intends to have the money to redeem these promises. It relies on the public sanction and endorsement of its business to give its paper credit. It is a system of imposition upon the public credulity. If an individual or company give written promises to pay money which they have not got to pay, and know they cannot and will not have if called upon, there would be no difference of opinion as to the roguery of such men. When banking corporations put their paper in circulation in quantities beyond their power to redeem, is there an honest man here who will say it is not equally dishonest, equally a fraudulent and swindling transaction? And yet it is true the banks cannot in any other way do a profitable business. The community are getting tired of bearing all these impositions; the expense is too great, also; it greatly overbalances any benefits derived from the system, and it is coming to an end. I see some Senators smile incredulously; they probably have not made themselves acquainted with this business; if they had done so, I am confident their incredulity would soon leave them. How is it with the business of banking in this District? I have said that now is a time when the banks are rotting down; the times are inauspicious for the revival of these banks; the great favorite of our political opponents, with its capital of thirty-five millions, has stopped for the last time; its stockholders have no reason to expect ever to divide a cent of its capital, and its bill holders are in haste to get rid of them at great discounts; from the St. Croix to the Sabine, they are all failing. The stoppage of a bank is now an article of daily news, which excites no surprise.

There have been fifteen banks chartered by Congress in this District; six only of that fifteen ask a renewal of their charters; nine, which were at one time in apparent good circumstances, have failed; the public have been cheated, defrauded, swindled out of about two millions of dollars by them. Have we any assurance that these survivors in so sweeping a catastrophe, are any better than their defunct brethren? are they more honest? have they conducted their business upon safer principles? They have had better fortune, indeed, but that they have deserved it by better principles or better conduct, no one pretends. How many times have they stopped payment—become insolvent? Should we not hesitate to grant the prayer of these petitioners with such a state of facts before us? without an expose of the condition of these banks? Without a thorough examination of them, and, being satisfied, from such examination, of their solvency, can we be justified in renewing these charters? even if we have the power to do so. I think not, and this opinion is greatly strengthened by the admission of the advocate of this bill, that these banks are in such a state now, that, unless they are allowed to receive and pay out the paper of insolvent (otherwise called suspended) banks and railroad companies, they cannot go on with business; they will not thank us for reviving their charters.

Having shown what are the privileges which the bankers of this District ask to have revived and again bestowed upon them, I proceed to explain to the Senate the plan I have proposed as a substitute for all their bank charters. The general scope and object of this proposed substitute is to place the banks of this District on the same ground where they stood before any charters were granted to them. To leave them as free to pursue their trade and business as the law now does and always has left all other operatives in the District. To take from them, however, the endorsement heretofore given by the Government to their paper and business, and leave them to seek for credit and its consequences by their own exertions, unaided by the grant of exclusive privileges—privileges which they have so long enjoyed to their own emolument and at the enormous expense of the public. It is, in short, to place the people of this District on an equality in all their business and pursuits; to afford equal protection and encouragement to all, by withholding all exclusive favors from any, and to carry out here, in full practice, those great principles of equality and liberty, which, as yet, in profession, lay at the foundation of our Government.

I do not propose to destroy the banks. The people of this country have become so habituated to the use of paper money, that a sudden change would not be approved of, even if such sudden change should not deeply affect their interests. I speak for myself only, though I believe I would be sustained in saying that those political friends with whom I usually vote agree with me in declaring, that I do not wish to injure the trade or business of banking, or to impose any restraints upon it but those which the public safety clearly requires.

I am not, therefore, very tenacious of the details of my plan. What I propose is, according to my judgment, the best mode of regulating and restraining the business of banking. I invite a thorough examination of it, and invoke the assistance of all who think with me, that the present system is a bad one, to assist me in perfecting, by suitable amendments, what is proposed as a substitute, keeping in view the great object of entirely severing the connexion which has hitherto existed between the banks and the Government, and of withholding the express sanction and endorsement of the latter of the business and obligations of the former, the degree and extent of legislative interference with the business of banking which may be necessary or useful, is submitted to the wisdom of the Senate to determine.

The first section of my proposed substitute provides for publishing and recording the names of the stockholders in the banks which may continue or commence the business of banking, after the taking effect of the law, and it subjects all who shall carry on that business, without so making known their names and places of residence, to a penalty. I propose this, in the first place, to enable the public to judge what credit is due to each individual banker, what security they have in the character or property of the manufacturers of a paper currency for its redemption, and also to do away all cavil and dispute as to who are liable to be sued on their obligations where suits are necessary. And, in the second place, for the benefit of those who intend to follow this business hereafter, and who engage in it with honest intentions. By publishing their name and residence, they invite an examination of their claims, on the score of probity and property, to be credited by the public. The public may then judge how far it is safe to trust them, and they will not confound a Stephen Girard or an Astor with that multitude of penniless villains who are now under the concealment of bank charters, swindling the people from one end of the country to another. Then the honest man will be trusted for his integrity, and the rich man for his wealth; for it will be known who are to be trusted. Now, the stock book of a bank is inaccessible to the public, and indeed it is of very little importance whether the public know the names of the stockholders or not, for they are not responsible for the failure of their bank. Their stock only is liable when their vaults are empty, and no man ever yet knew one cent of stock drawn upon for the payment of bank debts. No, sir; when a bank breaks the officers of the bank take possession of all the money, if there happens to be any; the trustees divide out the obligations, held by the banks, to their bill-holders, and the deficiency and loss is borne by the good natured and long suffering public.

The second section prohibits the banks from issuing notes under twenty dollars. The banks are universally in favor of issuing small notes, because they can thereby more completely control the currency of the country, and because they make a much larger profit on them than on larger ones, while the people generally are desirous of increasing the metallic circulation, and lessening that of paper. The restriction upon bank issues has not generally gone higher than to notes under five dollars. I am aware that there is great difference of opinion on this subject; but, to give stability to our currency, to prevent sudden and great expansions and contractions of it, which experience has shown to be ruinous to the trade and business of the country, no plan short of prohibiting paper altogether would be so effectual as to drive out of circulation all notes which, not being necessary for the conducting the larger mercantile business, are thrown into the common circulation, and form the only medium for the retail trade, the marketing and payment of the wages of labor. Remove this paper from the circulation, and its place would be immediately supplied by the gold and silver which is now locked up in the banks, and of which there is an abundance in the country. The people would be safer with a metallic currency to that extent, for it is the smaller notes which are most abundantly counterfeited and circulated among those least able to detect their character. I know the banks would lose a great profit which they now make upon their small notes, (a profit generally and truly estimated by bankers as not less than ten per cent.) but if such a restriction were to curtail their business, and confine it to what banking business was originally intended for; that is, to aiding the exchanges and commerce of the country, it would render that business much more secure by preventing runs upon the banks; but whether the people of this District are prepared to have this restriction carried as high as twenty dollars, may, by some, be doubted. My own opinion is, that it might go higher, and that here notes under fifty dollars might be at once prohibited, because there is a sufficient abundance of gold and silver coin paid out yearly in this District to the people, to form a circulating medium for ten times the number of those who live, and twenty times the business transacted, here. There is not, in truth, any want of banks of circulation in this District, (supposing they are wanted any where.) If I was legislating for any other part of the United States, I would not probably carry the restriction so high in the first instance, for I think it unwise to make great and sudden changes in the business concerns of the country, preferring always the light of experience to the most plausible theory; but here I am confident a large majority of the people wish for such a restriction upon their banks, and prefer a hard money currency for their common and ordinary business, so that the same gradual change from five to twenty dollar notes, which would be necessary elsewhere, would be altogether unnecessary here.

The third section of my proposed substitute provides a speedy remedy against banks which may suspend or refuse payment of their notes. Wherever a bank is permitted, some such provision of law is necessary; but it is more especially necessary in this District. In all other places where banks exist, the holder of a bank note has the same legal process to compel its payment, as he has on any other obligation. Not so here. So much under the influence of the banks are the judges of this District, or so ignorant of their duty, that, instead of leaving the law to take its course against bankers, they enjoin all such proceedings. Yes, sir, if a poor laborer goes to a bank here, and demands payment on one of its notes, and, on being refused, brings a suit before a justice of the peace, the bank applies to one of the District Judges, and an injunction issues, and the whole cost is thrown upon the poor fellow who has dared to sue a bank. Such proceedings are of record in this District, and I have expected to see articles of impeachment sent here from the other part of this Capitol against the men who have dared such gross violations of the right of citizens.

The fourth section authorizes appeals by bankers, when sued, where it shall appear that they have a good defence; and the fifth section gives the plaintiff an appeal, where the judgment of the justice may be against him.

The sixth section prohibits the passing or receiving any bank note under twenty dollars, and gives a penalty for breach of the prohibition, which is wholly to the use of the person suing for it. It is not sufficient in order to drive small notes out of circulation that the banks in this District should be prohibited from issuing them, for, if the law stops there, the notes from the surrounding States will flow in here and perpetuate the evil sought to be remedied. It is necessary, therefore, to prohibit their circulation. How is this to be done? Shall it be made an indictable offence? If you attempt this, your judges are bankers, your grand jurors are bankers, and your prosecuting attorney is, probably, a banker, or employed by bankers. There will be no chance of enforcing the law with such material, and so it has turned out in practice. The States have passed laws prohibiting the circulation of notes under five dollars; and I have understood that such a law exists here, but it is evaded every where, for there is nobody to enforce it. I propose to make it for the interest of every person to enforce the law by giving the penalty to whomsoever will sue for it. The effect of such a law will be to prevent every person from offering such notes publicly in payment, and then they will cease to circulate. The only objection I can imagine against this provision, from those who think with me that all notes under twenty dollars should be driven from circulation is, that it would too much interfere with private rights. To prohibit the sale of alcoholic and other poisons is admitted on all hands to be within the legitimate function of legislation. The principle is, that individuals must be restrained from such practices as are injurious to the public welfare. It is on this ground that I support the principle contained in this section. Adopt it, and the law will enforce itself.

The next section of the proposed substitute provides for the suppression of fraudulent banking, a provision as necessary to guard the public against the depredations of the chartered as the unchartered banks. If the people of this country were not, by the long use of a paper medium, become careless of its soundness, altogether inattentive to the means or ability of those who issue it to redeem their promises, no such enactment would be necessary. A private citizen obtains credit on his written promise to pay money, either from his ability to fulfil such promises, or his character for integrity; and no law is needed to prevent the person who possesses no quality entitling him to credit, but the latter from obtaining that credit on his note; but a banking company, whether chartered or not, can stand upon no such ground of integrity and honor. Associated for the sole purpose of acquiring wealth, protected by their numbers and association from all moral responsibility, they look to the law of the land only, and not to the law of conscience, to ascertain their privileges and their responsibilities; and it is a notorious fact that when a bank is forced to wind up, the whole stock is lost to the stockholders, and the greater part of the notes in circulation to the public. That the public are much more liable to be defrauded by paper issued for purposes of mere gain than an individuals is, I think a sufficient reason why some such provision should be engrafted into our laws. Such banking institutions have existed, have exploded in all parts of the country, have done so even in this District, and this law may, and probably would, have a strong tendency to prevent them in future.

The next and last section repeals the law of 1817, which prohibits both the discounting and issuing of notes or bills, or any other securities, orders, or promises for the payment of money, by any unchartered banking company, or any association, partnership, or company of individuals, under a penalty of from one to five hundred dollars for each offence, and imprisonment from three to twelve months. And here, Mr. President, I say frankly, that I consider this section as the most important part of my proposed amendment. The other sections propose some restrictions upon the business of banking, greater facilities for recovering claims against bankers, and a necessary punishment for fraudulent banking; but this section proposes to repeal an unjust, odious, and, as I believe, unconstitutional monopoly—a monopoly alike injurious to the public and to the monopolists. In this opinion, I have quite an unexpected support in the petitioners themselves. I have before me "the remonstrance of the citizens of the District of Columbia, to the people of the United States," &c. against oppressions, manifold and grievous, "suffered from the misrule of the now ruling majority in Congress," dated August, 1840. With the greater part of this collection of scurrility and falsehood, put forth by the bankers of this District, I have no concern; but I notice the fact that, amongst all their "manifold and grievous oppressions," the refusal of this body to adopt this very amendment of the law at the last session stands most prominent and conspicuous. They complain "that we suffer not only from the negative act of a refusal to continue the charters of those banks, or to license any other in their place, but from the aggressive act of cutting up, root and branch, the whole trade and business of banking, in any form or under any modification whatever, in this District; that now the whole trade and business of banking, in all its modes and details, down even to the simple act of placing money on deposit in a bank vault, is declared positively unlawful, and rigorously prohibited under grievous penalties of fine, forfeiture, and imprisonment;" and they quote the act of 1817, which this section of the amendment proposes to repeal, as that aggressive act so much complained of; concluding this branch of their complaint with this remarkable paragraph:

"It was a sufficient and perhaps a questionable stretch of power to have confined the trade and business of banking to the incorporated banks; but to prohibit and exterminate that entire branch of business in every form and modification of it, never before entered the head of any sane and honest legislator, in such a state of society as the present. A law prohibiting the trade of a merchant, a carpenter, a bricklayer, tailor, or shoemaker, or the profession of Divinity, medicine, or law, would be neither more absurd, nor more contrary to natural justice."

Such a declaration as this, coming from these District bankers and their friends, is worthy of great consideration. They acknowledge that, in asking us to revive their charters, they ask us to exert "a questionable stretch of power;" and to prohibit the trade of banking to all but incorporated banks, they pronounce, truly, to be "absurd, and contrary to natural justice." Thus, all I have contended for, stands acknowledged and conceded by the petitioners themselves; and now, I trust, I shall no more hear their advocates in this Senate support the interest and claims of these bankers on grounds which they themselves repudiate as untenable.

No reason has been given for continuing the restrictive law of 1817—no justification of its absurd injustice is even attempted. Can it be that a majority of this Senate will sanction the continuance of a law, in support of which no reason can be given by its firmest supporters? which even the bankers themselves declare to be "absurd, and contrary to natural justice?"

That banks can be established in credit and business, and get their paper in extensive circulation without charters, is proved by experience, that best guide in political affairs. Several, I think most of the banks here, first commenced business without charters, (for until 1817 this was not unlawful.) They were conducted in such manner as to gain public confidence; their paper was in as good credit; it circulated as extensively as since that time. I wish to restore them—to place them as they stood when relying on their own characters, without any exclusive privilege, and without exemption from liability for their debts: they were in prosperous circumstances. Will any Senator say that banks cannot do business in that way? Here is fact against his theory—here were sound, unchartered banks. How has it been since the law of 1817? how is it now? They dare not issue their own paper—their credit is gone; and they come here asking, with a renewal of their charters, the privilege of using the paper of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company; paper which never can be, and is not ever expected to be, redeemed.

Stephen Girard also established a bank without asking for a charter. By the side of the United States Bank, it obtained equal credit and equal confidence; its bills circulated as widely, and were as much sought for, for remittances from the West to the Atlantic cities. It was known that he was able to redeem his paper; he had a well established reputation for honest and fair dealing. This was the foundation of his credit, and the true secret of his prosperity—a foundation for credit, I submit to the Senate, as infinitely more safe and stable than to hedge round the individual or corporate banker with the machinery of penal laws. In all parts of the Union banks have been established without charters, and have found no difficulty in obtaining business; few or none of them have continued without, any longer than until they could obtain charters. This solicitude to obtain charters has never been because charters were necessary to enable them to do business, but because charters gave them advantages and exemptions from liability which were denied by the legislation of the country to all other kinds of business. Individuals are rare who have virtue to refuse power over their fellow men; to look for such forbearance in companies would be folly.

Are these restraining laws to confine the business of banking to a favored few, necessary for the protection of the people against imposition? Are not the people capable of judging for themselves whom they will trust? You do not undertake to guard the public judgment by penal laws in any other business, and why in this? No answer to this question has been given, and none can be given. We are as capable of judging correctly what banks we will trust with our property for their notes, as we are of judging what individual we will trust on his promissory note; and there is as much reason, as much necessity, for the interference of the law in the latter as the former case.

The chairman of the Committee on the District has said that the people of the District are petitioners for the revival of these bank charters; and he speaks of the desolation which has befallen them in consequence of being without chartered banks. My information on this subject differs widely from the Senator's picture. It is stated on good authority that since the bank charters in this District were permitted to expire, there has been a time of unusual prosperity in all the business carried on here, excepting only the banking business; there have been more new buildings erected during the last season than in any season before, and there have been greater additions to the population of the District, and no want of money by those who had either industry to labor for it, or commodities to purchase it.

But the people of this District do not want these banks revived. They are not anxious to recommence the payment of an onerous tax to these companies; they get along very well without them. If it were not so—if they wanted the revival of these charters, why do they not say so? Why do they not petition? There are about sixteen thousand adult males in this District. About two hundred of them have petitioned for a revival of these bank charters. Two hundred! With all the means and appliances of the bankers, they have not been able to get more than a small proportion of petitioners! Are not these facts conclusive that the people of this District do not want banks? These money changers, calling themselves the people of this District, remind me of Robespierre: he spoke in the name of the people of France; he called himself THE PEOPLE; and he was the people, as these bankers are the people of the District. The rule of these is as despotic, as grasping, as was his. There is this difference, however: Robespierre sought power, and used it for the preservation of public liberty; he had nothing mean, sordid, and selfish, in his aspirations.

Mr. President, I entreat Senators to consider the position they occupy in public estimation, when acting upon this subject. It has been said, and it is believed, that the borrower is the servant or rather slave of the lender. It has been known that members of Congress, in times past, were greatly indebted to the late Bank of the United States; and though the names of those debtors were suppressed, it was a very general opinion that the bill for rechartering that bank was passed by a Congress of debtors to the bank. Fortunately for the country, it was vetoed by a man who could not be corrupted. In the last report made to the House of Representatives, it appears that members of Congress were indebted to the banks in this District $87,600. The sum is not probably decreased since. I presume that no part of it is due from any member of this body; for surely no Senator would vote where he was directly interested. To revive and prolong these charters is asked for, that the banks may give time to their debtors. A man indebted to the banks, and voting to extend their charters, votes to give himself an extension of time to pay what he owes them. I will not impute corruption to any member of this body. I will not suppose that debtors to the banks here are passing a law for their own benefit. Courtesy forbids this supposition. But what will the people think, who do not know your stern and unyielding integrity as well as I do. There is danger, sir, very great danger, that the character of this body will suffer; that the people, who see what passes here—who note the zeal which sustains the claims of the bankers, and that, too, of men who profess to be Democrats—who profess to consider, as their first duty, a sacred regard to the rights of all—whose leading axiom is, that legislation, to be just, must be equal. There is danger, I say, that the Senate will not long retain that high and commanding station it formerly held in the estimation of the people; but will sink to the contempt that awaits the slaves of corruption.

What is thought and said of the Legislature of Alabama—as pure a body of men, probably, as this Senate—since it has been published to the world that a majority of the members of that body are indebted to the banks in sums equal to seven or eight hundred thousand dollars? Has not some special acts of favor towards the banks been universally looked for from that body? I know none of the gentlemen composing that assembly, and I would not throw suspicion on their purity, but it is to be lamented that they have placed themselves in so inauspicious a light to their country.

Mr. President, we are under a bank government; not merely by means of loans to legislators is that government sustained, but the control of the circulating medium of the country has given it a commanding influence in all the States. We have seen the banks hold conventions to consult and determine whether they shall longer continue to regard their contracts, or treat them as of no moral obligation; and whenever they have concluded to disregard them, and have refused the payment of their just and acknowledged debts, they have always found the Legislature of the State obsequious enough to their wishes to sanction such refusal. Until recently it has been usual to suspend the laws for the collection of debts against suspended banks. The obligations of all other citizens than the bankers are left to be collected by the usual course of law. With them, their convenience is permitted to control all law and all moral principle. I would change this course; and, as one great means of changing it, I propose to separate, entirely and forever, the Government from the banks. The alliance between them has long existed, to the great injury of both. The banks have acquired power and influence to overawe and control their needy associate; but in gaining this power and influence, they have played a desperate game, and are now breaking down with the exhausting results of that unnatural connection. Let them stand on the same level of equal protection with all other occupations, and they would have no more power than the other occupations have. With their exclusive privileges, their exclusive power and influence would depart, to return no more. If the banks lose, by this operation, somewhat in profit, they would gain in soundness, in character, and real stability and usefulness. Whether my proposed change of system be adopted or not at this time, is not of so much consequence as that the subject should be understood. Reform will surely follow a thorough knowledge of our banking system. If I shall be found to have contributed something to accelerate this reform, I shall be satisfied.

PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. HUBBARD, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

IN SENATE, Tuesday, February 2, 1841.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system, in favor of settlers on the public lands, who shall inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon, was taken up, the question being on the motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN to recommend the bill, with instructions to report a bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, which Mr. Young had proposed to amend by a motion to substitute for it the bill of Mr. CALHOUN, proposing to cede the lands to the States within which they lie, upon certain conditions.

Mr. HUBBARD addressed the Senate as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: I had not intended, until recently, to have addressed the Senate upon the important questions now presented for their consideration. It will be recollected that, at the last session of Congress, in a speech which I then delivered upon the assumption of the State debts, I gave, somewhat at length, my views upon the subject of distributing the revenue of the Government among the States. I was then opposed to the whole project. I regarded it as an open, flagrant violation of the Constitution—as subversive of the true interests of the people. Subsequent reflection has only confirmed the views then expressed; and I had no intention of again entering upon the field of debate in relation to the questions involved in this discussion, until I heard the arguments in favor of the contemplated distribution of that portion of the revenue derived from the sales of the public lands. I must say that I gave to the honorable Senators in the opposition, and to their arguments, the most profound attention. I was anxious to hear what could be said either in favor of the constitutionality or of the expediency of this measure. And, sir, I have been privileged to hear all that ingenuity and learning, all that argument and ability could bring to its aid; and I must say that I yet remain unconvinced and unconverted. The distinguished Senators from Kentucky and Massachusetts have not been able to satisfy my mind that Congress has any more power, under the Constitution, to distribute the revenue derived from the lands than it has to distribute any other portion of the public means.

This subject, during the late Presidential canvass, engaged much of the public consideration. It was a most prominent topic with the stump-orators who were active to put out this and to put in another Administration. This was the promised measure of relief. It was this distribution scheme which was to give life, vigor, and strength to the business of the country. It was this which was to remove the embarrassments of the times, to reanimate the hopes, and to give confidence and support to the people. It was urged as the favorite plan and approved purpose of those who are now coming into power. It was contended that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands rightfully belonged to the respective States; and it was unceasingly urged, by way of objection to the present Administration, that its friends were known to be opposed to this whole policy. I recollect well these things. I was no stranger to these events—to the various charges made against the Administration.

That was a contest of unusual violence and activity; and I rejoice that, at this early day—so soon after the termination of that contest—this self-same subject is brought before the Senate of the United States; that the people, notwithstanding what they then heard from party politicians touching this subject, will be now privileged to read and consider all that its most able advocates and friends can adduce in its favor, as well as what may be said against it. The whole ground will be examined; the reasons for and against the measure will be understood; and, reposing, as I do, entire confidence in the intelligence and virtue of the American people, I have no doubt what will be their ultimate judgment.

I am perfectly certain that I cannot be mistaken in the sentiments of the people of my own State, in relation to this question. They have been recently promulgated through her Legislature, and I am happy to add, that in communicating to the Senate my own views, as I purpose to do, I shall but declare the wishes, the feelings, and opinions of the people of New Hampshire.

Before proceeding further, may I not be permitted to urge upon the Senate gravely to consider what, at the present time, is the posture of our public affairs—of our foreign relations—of the condition and state of our beloved country? And, I would ask, is it fit that the Senate of the United States should, at a time like this, be deliberating whether any portion of our public revenues, our national means, should be abstracted for any but for public use? In the face of an empty Treasury, and with a strong probability that, before the close of the next Administration, we may be involved in a war with one of the most powerful nations in Christendom, is it the part of wisdom for the Senate to be deliberating upon a proposition of dividing among the States five millions of the accruing revenue, when our whole maritime frontier from Maine to Florida is without the means of defence? when our fortresses are without men and without arms? At a time like this, while Portsmouth, Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, are exposed to the attacks of any enemy; while our inland frontier is utterly defenceless, as not to be able to resist the incursions of the ruthless savage; we are seriously debating the question of abstracting from the public use a portion of the public revenue. Can this be judicious? Is it evidence of that forecast, prudence, and discretion, which ought to characterize the American Congress? No sir, no. The time has come when it becomes us to pause and consider well our ways and means. The news of the morning cannot be calculated to quiet our apprehensions. Certain it is, that it should not fail to excite our diligence. News showing the complete and triumphant success of the armies of Great Britain in China—news showing that she is now omnipotent in India. “Nor has the British arms been attended with less success in Africa, for Mehemet Ali seems now but a British vassal.”

Possibly these events “may have no unfavorable effect upon the pending questions between this country and Great Britain,” but it seems to me that they will not tend to accelerate the adjustment of the matters in controversy. I fully concur in the patriotic sentiments recently communicated to the Legislature of Massachusetts by the present

Governor of that Commonwealth—that the matters in controversy between the two Governments have already been delayed too long; and I am unable to discover any disposition on the part of the British Government to bring them to any amicable arrangement. And it seems to me not very improbable, that her recent triumphs in India may induce her to insist upon her claims upon this side of the Atlantic with more pertinacity—claims which, if admitted, will not only affect the interest, but will disturb the peace and harmony of the State which I have the honor in part to represent. All I have to say is, that, in view of these matters, it cannot be the part of wisdom to be scattering to the winds of Heaven the very means required to put the country in a state of defence—to abstract from the Treasury that portion of the public revenues upon which we can only rely with confidence in a state of war. No, sir; let us, at a time like this, husband all our resources; let us, at a time like this, when peace is within our borders, be prepared for the last resort of nations; let us not exhibit the extraordinary and unpatriotic spectacle of deliberating, at this end of the Capitol, about distributing the public revenue, while, at the other end, the Administration is taunted, not only with an exhausted Treasury, but even with having involved the country in a forty millions debt; and thus charged by the political friends of those who, on this floor, now propose to divide among the States the small means we have. This is no sketch of fancy, but matter of fact. I hope, sir, to be excused for this departure from my subject—for this course of remark. It has been indulged in for no other purpose but to show forth the true character of the proposition now before the Senate, and to show further, that at this eventful period of our history, it ought not to receive the deliberate consideration of this assembly. I will, however, proceed to discuss the nature and effect of the pending motion. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CARRINGTON] has submitted an amendment to the pre-emption bill. The direct object of his amendment is to effect a distribution among the States of that portion of the revenue derived from the sales of the public lands; and is it not somewhat strange that the Senator has proposed his amendment? Certain it is that it has no connection with the pre-emption measure—it has no affinity with that policy—it is an entirely different subject matter. The pre-emption bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands looks to the convenience, the interests, the rights, of actual settlers. It seeks to encourage the settlement of the public domain; it proposes no diminution in the price of the lands; it does not contemplate any abstraction from the Treasury of any part of the public revenue, or any reduction of receipts; but so far from it, while it seeks to protect the honest settler, it sustains also, in good faith, the interests of the public. These are among the objects of the pre-emption bill. True it is, that it has been charged with being a bill to squander and to waste the public domain. True it is that it has been charged as fraught with all manner of evils. But these charges are, in my judgment, without foundation. The policy of this measure, and the objections made to it, I have, on a former occasion during the session, attempted to sustain and to answer. But I again ask, why has the amendment been brought forward, unless to defeat the pre-emption bill? The Senator from Kentucky most remote from me, [Mr. CLAY], said that if the pre-emption and the graduation bills were abandoned, his colleague would withdraw at once his amendment. The Senator does not seem to anticipate that the amendment can become a law at this session; but he looks upon it as a means of defeating the pre-emption measure. Now, sir, I am in favor of the latter. I hope no proposition will be sustained which will prevent its passage. In my judgment, it is founded on justice and right, and well deserves the support of the Senate. But I have felt somewhat surprised that the Senator from Kentucky—a distinguished member of the party soon to come into power—should have brought forward this proposition at this embarrassed state and condition of the public Treasury.

The Secretary, in his annual report upon the finances, presented to the Senate at the commencement of the present session of Congress, estimates the ordinary available means for the year 1841 at $24,723,473, and the disbursements for the same year at $23,899,200, leaving in the Treasury at the close of the present year only $824,273 subject to draft. And with a full knowledge of these facts, the Senator brings forward his amendment. Certain it is that he could not have offered it at a more inauspicious, at a more unfavorable period of time. At the very moment the friends of the present Administration are endeavoring to provide the necessary means to sustain the Government for the current year, those opposed, in the language of one of our public journals,

"Are preparing to squander among the States that portion of the revenue derived from the public lands. The annual income from this source will average $3,500,000, and if given to the States, will make also a deficiency in the revenue of the Federal Government of $3,500,000; and from the manner in which the public land question is generally discussed, one would imagine that the people who pay the State debts, and those who support the Federal Government, are not one and the same; and, therefore, all that can be diverted from the latter is so much made. The fact is, that the revenue of the Federal Government is to be paid by the whole people in the most economical way possible. The proceeds of the public lands take nothing out of the pockets of the people, although when applied to the uses of the Government, that is kept out which otherwise would flow in. A revenue from duties is a direct tax upon every consumer of imported goods, and levied in the most expensive manner. The less there is raised in this manner, therefore, the better. If the proceeds of the lands are appropriated to the payment of the debts due by the people as States, a tax, in the shape of duties, must be laid to raise the same amount, to pay the debts due by the people as a Federal Union. The same amount of money must be paid in either case—with this difference: that, as the proceeds of the public lands are now applied, they go in the most economical way to their proper object. Whereas, if they are given to the States, they will come into the hands of speculators, and will be squandered away, stimulating new debts, and leading to new taxes."

The sentiments above expressed are sound, statesmanlike, and patriotic. Their truth will be known; their moral force must be felt and acknowledged.

This is no time to agitate the question. It is proposed by its friends, that it shall not go into operation until January, 1842. What may be the condition of the Treasury at that time cannot be certainly known; but sure I am, that the best friends of the policy in this Senate would not desire to see the proposition become a law at this session. Before such a project should find favor with any one, the means to supply the deficiency should be provided. If its friends wish to carry out this policy of distribution—if they desire to preserve the appearance of ordinary justice—they should take the occasion to enforce their project when the Treasury is overflowing—when more means are possessed than are wanted—when, in fact, we have a surplus revenue. Mr. President, I represent a non-debtor State, and under no circumstances could the proposition find favor with me.

It is contended that a distribution of that portion of the revenue from the public lands ought to be made, because such proceeds rightfully belong to the States as separate and independent communities; that, by the deeds of cession, an obligation is imposed upon Congress to distribute the avails among the respective States, as the lands were expressly ceded to the United States for the exclusive use and benefit of the States; that the provision of the Constitution giving authority to Congress to dispose of the territory of the United States includes necessarily the power of distribution, and that it would be a proper exercise of the discretion invested in Congress over this whole subject to make the distribution. In the course of the argument it has been conceded that these lands were pledged for the payment of the debt of the Revolution; and it is said that, as that debt has been satisfied, they can no longer be withheld from the States. There seem to be some strange and very erroneous opinions entertained with reference to the rights of the States, and to the power of the General Government, over that part of the public domain acquired by the deeds of cession; and we must look into those deeds in order to ascertain the rights of the parties, for this may now be regarded as a claim set up by the respective States, against the United States, so far as it respects the lands embraced in those conveyances. Now, it will be found that, by the terms of the cession, the lands conveyed were not charged with the payment of the debt of the Revolution. There is not to be found a word or a sentence favoring any such idea. But, were it so, there is an objection which presents itself at once against the distribution as proposed, because the debt of the Revolution remains undischarged. At this very period of our history there is annually drawn from the Treasury, for the payment of the pensions granted for military service in the Revolution, a sum equal to the average annual proceeds from the sales of the public lands. But let us look into the record—let us examine the deeds of cession, and see what sort of title was conveyed thereby to the United States. It is perfectly true, as the Senator from Kentucky has remarked, that the Confederacy derived no essential benefit from any of the deeds of cession, except from that executed by the State of Virginia. As early as 1780, New York (I suppose very magnanimously) made what was then stated to be a large cession of her domain to the United States. But I could have wished that the Senator from New York, who has addressed the Senate upon this subject, had informed us where those lands were situated. If I am able to comprehend the description contained in her deed of cession, the lands lying west of the straits of Niagara are within the dominions of her Majesty, Queen Victoria. Massachusetts also, in terms, conveyed to the United States the same territory described in the deed of cession from New York. From their conveyance the United States have derived no pecuniary aid. It is possible that they may have contributed to the arrangement of the western boundary between the United States and the provinces of Canada, as established by the treaty of peace in 1783. The terms of all these deeds of cession were essentially the same. I have made the subjoined extract from that executed by Virginia:

"That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

If the State of Virginia had any estate in the lands to grant, it was clearly conveyed to the United States by the deed, who were as clearly entitled to hold the interest thus transferred. There was no reservation qualifying the right of the United States under this deed, except what is contained in the foregoing extract. And it is from this paragraph alone that it has been heretofore contended, and in the course of the debate again urged, that is derived the rights of the separate States to the proceeds of the sales of the public lands—that from this clause in the deed of cession is inferred the obligation which it is alleged rests upon Congress to make distribution of the avails of the lands among the respective States. It is from this extract that the friends of the measure contend that the lands were granted to the United States for the sole use and benefit of the cæstui que trust—the separate States. These are most extraordinary positions, wholly unsustained, in my judgment, by the terms of the deed. It would be difficult to find language which could be used with more appropriateness to create an absolute estate in the United States.

Notwithstanding, it is contended that the United States were made the trustees of the several States. That all the beneficial interest was reserved to the States as independent communities. Certain the fact is, that the United States either acquired by this deed of cession an absolute fee simple estate to the lands described, or else it became the mere trustee to hold the lands, for the exclusive use and benefit of the cæstui que trust the individual States. If the latter, then it is absurd to contend that the United States might hold these lands until the debt of the Revolution was paid. There is no such authority given by the deed. Congress had no discretion—no power whatever over these lands, (if the doctrine contended for upon the other side be correct) but to dispose of them for the sole use of the States. From the moment the seal was put to the paper—from the moment Congress accepted the deeds—it must follow, (according to the views of some of the Senate) that every dollar which has come into the public Treasury from these lands has hitherto been applied, without right and without authority, to the public use—that all such proceeds should, from the commencement of the Go vernment, have been distributed to the States in the ratio prescribed. Sir, this will not do. The doctrine contended for, on the other side, involves its advocates in too much difficulty. There is no mystery in this whole matter; nor is there, in my judgment, any ambiguity in the deeds of cession. And I should like to find, in the debates of the Continental Congress, any authority for the assumption that these lands were not ceded to the United States, to constitute a common fund for their use and benefit. I should like to have some Senator in the Opposition show me a line or a letter, in the history of that period, sanctioning the idea that the States of the Confederacy had the right to claim the avails of the public lands to the prejudice of the Confederacy. The history of the times gives no authority for such a position—and the deeds themselves give no authority for such a position. The grant was made to the United States, to constitute a common fund; and for what? For the use and benefit of such of the United States as may become members of the Federal alliance, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure.

Now, sir, mark the expressions. The grant was made to the United States. This was the style given by the first article of the Confederation to the Confederacy of States, and what then composed the United States—those States which had become members of the Federal alliance, including Virginia. And by the same Articles of Confederation other States might be formed and admitted members of the Confederacy; and upon any such occurrence, the States thus added to the alliance were also made part of the United States. Virginia then, by her deed, conveyed to all the States by the name and style of the United States, a portion of her domain, for the purpose of constituting a common fund for the use and benefit of all such States, according to their respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure—an expression perfectly well understood at that time. The deed contained no direction to divide among the States the proceeds of the land, but such proceeds were to remain a common fund for their general use.

The object must have been, in thus granting this large tract of unsettled country, clearly to confine the applications of the proceeds to the public use. To direct that in all time to come, the avails should go to defray the expenses and charges of the Confederacy—that they should not be granted without price—that the States then members of the Federal alliance should practically derive a benefit in the sale and disposition of these lands by the United States, in fair and just proportion to their part in the general charge and expenditure. The United States were to hold the lands, and they were to constitute a common fund for the use and benefit of the whole Confederacy. It was the object of Virginia, in making the grant, to provide a common fund. It was the anxious wish and the constant and earnest request of Congress, that these cessions should be made, so that a common fund might thereby be provided for the use and benefit of all the States. If the purpose could have been such as is contended for, would the deeds have been thus drawn? If the cessions had been for the use and benefit of the respective States as independent communities, would not the nature of the trust and the use been clearly expressed? It seems to me to be idle to contend that by these deeds an obligation is imposed upon Congress to divide the proceeds of the lands among the States. And this must be maintained, or else the deeds of cession must be wholly excluded. Let us look a little further into these deeds. It will be recollected, at the time these grants were made, Congress did not possess the power, under the Articles of Confederation, to impose taxes upon the States. That was done by the States themselves. The States then members, and those which might afterwards become members of the Federal alliance, were to derive a benefit in the proceeds of the public lands according to their respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure. The United States could not, according to the deeds, appropriate the avails of the public lands to relieve any one State from its embarrassment, nor could it appropriate the avails for the exclusive benefit of any particular number of the States. No. Congress was bound to apply the avails for the common benefit of all; and each were to derive a benefit in proportion to its charge and expenditure. This was all the benefit reserved in the deeds for the respective States; and the proportion of the States in the general charge and expenditure was a matter perfectly well understood at that period of our history. By the eighth article of the Confederation—

"All charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common Treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States in proportion to the value of all land within each State granted to or surveyed for any person, as such land and the buildings and improvements thereon shall be estimated, according to such mode as the United States in Congress assembled shall from time to time direct and appoint."

"The taxes for paying that proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the Legislatures of the several States, within the time agreed upon by the United States in Congress assembled."

And during the existence of the Confederation was not this provision of the deeds fully answered. Could it have been otherwise? If a million of dollars had been received from the sales of the public lands—would it have not been deposited in the public Treasury; and must not Virginia have necessarily derived a benefit from such a receipt according to her proportion in the general charge and expenditure? Suppose that enough had been received in any one year from the lands to have paid all the expenses of the Government, would not the States have been benefited in the exact proportion mentioned in the deed, according to the Articles of Confederation. Would not Virginia have been relieved from her contribution for any such year? And would not New Hampshire have been in like manner relieved? These States were all represented in the then Congress of the United States, and all the revenue derived from the sales of the public lands during the continuance of the Confederation enured to the benefit of the States, according to their respective proportion in the general charge and expenditure. The terms of the grant then were literally fulfilled. And so it has been since the adoption of the Constitution. Our revenues are now derived from customs as well as from lands. But suppose that the import system were abolished, and a direct tax upon property were to be imposed in order to supply a revenue for the support of Government. It would be apportioned among the States according to their representation. But instead of a direct tax, let us suppose the whole revenue necessary for the support of Government for a single year were derived from the sales of the public lands, would it not follow that the States would be benefited according to their respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure? It does not seem to me to admit of a question, that the great object in obtaining these cessions, and that the great object in making these sessions to the United States, were for the purpose of providing a common fund for the use and benefit of all the States—that this purpose has been most faithfully executed—and that a distribution among the States of the proceeds of lands would defeat the very object of the grantors as well as the grantees—because such a distribution would clearly add to the burdens of the people. The objects in obtaining these grants were revenue—were pecuniary means, to be applied for the benefit of the whole Union. As I have before said, if the deeds of cession impose the obligation upon Congress to distribute among the States the avails, such avails could not, at any time of our history, have been applied in good faith for public purposes. The proceeds either belonged to the United States or to the States. If the United States are the trustees of the States, then Congress is bound to collect its revenue from imports, or by direct taxation, and the proceeds of the lands should go at once to the States. This is denied. The origin of these cessions gives to them their character and purpose.

The history of the events of the Revolution in relation to this subject, cannot fail to give much valuable instruction. The articles of confederation were proposed as early as November, 1777; those States which had not within their limits any ungranted lands, felt a strong jealousy of the power and influence of those States which had unlimited grants of territory. That feeling long prevented the adoption of the Articles of Confederation, and not until late in 1778 were they assented to by my own State, and by the State of New Jersey, notwithstanding the earnest and pressing solicitude of Congress, declaring that "this salutary measure, the Confederation, can no longer be delayed;" yet it did not readily receive the sanction of the States. It was then declared as essential to our very existence as a free people, and without it we may soon be constrained to bid adieu to independence, to liberty, and safety. And it was urged upon the States "under a conviction of uniting all our resources and all our strength to maintain and defend our common liberties." Such appeals had the desired effect, and finally induced the ratification of the articles by the requisite majority of the States. But the feeling then entertained by many of the States was manifested by the representation of New Jersey, as subjoined:

"The ninth article provides, that no State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States: whether we are to understand, that by territory is intended any land, the property of which was heretofore vested in the crown of Great Britain; or, that no mention of such land is made in the Confederation, we are constrained to observe that the present war, as we always apprehended, was undertaken for the general defence and interest of the confederating colonies, now the United States. It was even the confident expectation of this State, that the benefits derived from a successful contest, were to be general and proportionate; and that the property of the common enemy, falling in consequence of a prosperous issue of the war, would belong to the United States, and be appropriated to their use. We are therefore greatly disappointed in finding no provision made in the Confederation for empowering the Congress to dispose of such property, but especially the vacant and impanted lands, commonly called the crown lands, for defraying the expenses of the war, and for such other public and general purposes. The jurisdiction ought, in every instance, to belong to the respective States within the charter or determined limits of which such lands may be seated; but reason and justice must decide that the property which existed in the crown of Great Britain previous to the present Revolution, ought now to belong to the Congress in trust for the use and benefit of the United States. They have fought and bled for it in proportion to their respective abilities, and therefore the reward ought not to be predilectionally distributed. Shall such States as are shut out by situation from availing themselves of the last advantage from this quarter, be left to sink under an enormous debt, whilst others are enabled in a short period, to replace all their expenditures from the earnings of the whole Confederacy?"

This was a common sentiment, founded in immutable justice—in the nature and fitness of things, and so strong and so deep was it impressed upon the public mind, that it would have been a vain effort to have resisted its influence.

Congress, on the sixth of September, 1780, in its recommendation to the States, resolved that "it appears advisable to press upon those States, which can remove the embarrassment respecting the Western country, a liberal surrender of a portion of her territorial claims, since they cannot be preserved entire without endangering the stability of the general Confederacy." To remind them how indispensably necessary it is to establish a Federal Union on a fixed and permanent basis, and on principles acceptable to all its respective members; how essential to public peace and confidence in support of an army; to the vigor of our councils, and success of our measures; to our tranquility at home; to our reputation abroad; to our very existence as a free, sovereign, and independent people."

And in perfect accordance with the general sentiment contained in the preceding resolutions of Congress, we find that, on the 10th of October, 1780, Congress resolved "that the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress of the 6th September last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States." How idle, then, to contend that by these very deeds of cession an obligation is imposed upon Congress to divide among the States the revenue derived from the lands, thus increasing the burdens which it was intended thereby to lessen?

The State of New York had, previous to this proceeding of the Continental Congress, passed a law to make a cession of a portion of her lands. Virginia did the same early in the following year. And long after the passage of the act by the Legislature of Virginia, giving authority to make the desired cession to the United States, and at a time when the defects of the system of confederation had become apparent, and Congress was deeply impressed with the necessity of making better provision for the support of Government; the following proceeding took place:

In April, 1783, after the passage of the act of Virginia, agreeing to make a cession of the lands northwest of the river Ohio to the United States, the committee, consisting of Mr. Madison, Mr. Ellsworth, and Mr. Hamilton, appointed to prepare an address to the States, to accompany the act of the 18th of this month, reported a draft, which being read and amended, was agreed to. Mr. Madison, it will be recollected, was one of Virginia's distinguished sons, and from his address I have made the subjoined extract, in order to show for what use he regarded the territory to be ceded:

"Thus much for the interest of the national debt: for the discharge of the principal within the term limited, we rely on the natural increase of the revenue from commerce, on requisitions to be made from time to time for that purpose, as circumstances may dictate, and on the prospect of vacant territory."

From all these historical facts there seems to be no room for doubt that the statesmen and the patriots of that day regarded these cessions as they should be regarded, if a fair construction be given to the deeds themselves, as made for the general use of the United States—of consequence for the benefit of the people of the United States.

The acts of the respective States making the cessions to the General Government, were truly patriotic. The interests, the harmony, the peace, the prosperity and happiness of the Confederacy were involved; and the grants, for a time, gave stability and strength and confidence to the Government. But the fact cannot be controverted, that by the common blood and the common treasure of the whole country, this extensive domain was acquired from the common enemy; and, as I have before remarked, the cession from New York was anterior to the treaty of peace; and yet the territory conveyed was by that treaty confirmed to Great Britain. By the charter of Virginia, her western boundary extended to the borders of the Pacific, and yet by the treaty the western boundary of the United States was limited to the middle of the Mississippi. And the grant from Virginia, made in 1784, embraces the land within her chartered limits lying northwest of the Ohio.

I mention these facts to demonstrate that it was the Revolution and the treaty consequent upon that Revolution, which defined the territorial rights of the United States, without regard to the provisions and limitations of pre-existing State charters. But I am free to admit, under the Articles of Confederation, it was unanimous on the part of Virginia and the other ceding States to make the cessions, and thus give quiet to the whole Confederacy. I cannot, for a moment, believe that these cessions impose any obligation on the United States to divide the proceeds of the lands among the States. They were designed to constitute a common fund—and from the commencement of the Government it has been administered as a common fund. The avails have made up a part of the public revenue for the use of the whole Republic. It must, however, be admitted that this trusteeship has been uniformly inferred from the deeds themselves, and heretofore the power and obligation to make distributions has been based upon those conveyances. That was the argument of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands in his report communicated to the Senate upon this subject in 1836? But how is it now? Both the Senators from Kentucky and Massachusetts abandon, and properly abandon, the idea that the deeds confer this power upon Congress. They look into the Constitution and content themselves with the express grant of power which that instrument contains, as furnishing full and ample authority to make the distribution. Not so in former days. I concur with the honorable Senators in their conclusions that the deeds of cession impose no such obligation upon Congress. But that was the ground taken formerly—and that was the only ground assumed in the able report to which I have referred. But does it not occur to every observer that it will not answer to rely upon the deeds, because, forsooth, they embrace but a small portion of the public domain? They must, therefore, find authority elsewhere, or the object cannot be accomplished. When I came into this Senate in 1835, this subject of distribution early engaged their consideration, and it was at the session of 1835-6, that the distinguished Senator from Ohio made his report.

I have made the subjoined extracts, in order to show the ground then taken; and which ground seems now to be abandoned:

"The question of constitutional power has occupied the careful and sedulous attention of the committee; and they here present to the Senate the course of reasoning on that subject, which they consider sound and just, and which has led them to the conclusion that Congress possessed the power to distribute the proceeds of the public lands according to the principles of this bill.

"At the time the deed of cession from Virginia was made and accepted, the Union was held together by the Articles of Confederation of 1776, which, in its 8th article, provides 'that all charges of war and other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common Treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States.'"

"The mode of determining the proportion which each of the States shall bear of the public charges, is particularly pointed out; and it is there provided that 'the taxes for paying that proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the several States.' To this state of things, existing at the time of the delivery of the Virginia deed of cession, its provisions must necessarily apply. It was to a Confederacy of independent States, who kept up a common treasury out of contributions from each of its several members, according to a determinate regulation, that this deed was made; and after making certain reservations, especially set forth, it declares the trust in the following distinct and unequivocal terms: 'That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for, or appropriated to any of the before-mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered as a common fund for the use of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditures, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever.' If then, we had still continued, down to the present time, a Confederation of States, bound together by the articles of 1776, and if, as is now the case, the public debt were discharged, the public expenses borne by revenues from other quarters, and the public land pouring its millions into the Treasury, what ought Congress, as the trustee of that common fund, to do with it? It is a trust fund, placed in the hands of Congress 'for the use and benefit of the several States'; and it is to be disposed of 'bona fide' for that purpose, 'and for no other use or purpose whatsoever.' So long as there is a public debt to be paid, this fund was well applied for the common benefit in the payment of that debt, as the debt was a common charge upon all, 'according to their usual respective proportions in the public expenditures.' And so long as it was necessary for the support of Government, its application to that purpose was right, for the same reason; but when this state of things has ceased, when the proceeds of the public lands are no longer necessary for either of these purposes, what is it the duty of the trustee to do with it, according to the letter and spirit of the deed of trust? And what, were it a case between individuals, would a court of equity compel him to do? The answer is plain and obvious. He not only might pay it, but he would be bound to pay it over to those for whose benefit he held it. If it were not necessary to disburse it for them, he must restore it to them. This, as between individuals, would be a plain case; and your committee cannot perceive how it is varied, when applied between States and nations. If, then, we had remained as we were, members of the old Confederation—if the Constitution had not intervened to change, in any wise, the relations of the States to each other, or to the whole, it would have been not only the right, but the duty of Congress, pursuant to the spirit of that deed of cession, to have distributed among the several States the proceeds of the sales of the lands contained within the bounds of that grant. The delivery and acceptance of this deed amounted to a contract; and the above is, according to the opinion of your committee, the just construction of that contract.

"Your committee are hence led to the conclusion that with respect to the proceeds of all the lands north of the 31st degree of latitude, and east of the Mississippi river, Congress not only has the constitutional power to make the proposed distribution, but it is a duty enjoined on them by a contract which is recognised and adopted by the Constitution.

"As to the land lying within the bounds of the original purchase of Louisiana and Florida, our right so to apply it rests upon less satisfactory grounds. We have no compact concerning it—no constitutional provision, or any agreement recognised by the Constitution, which expressly authorized the purchase of this additional territory, or which places the land so purchased in the same situation with that which was originally transferred to Congress by the States."

"This was the argument, then. But this course of reasoning will not lead to the desired conclusions; and hence the argument is not now resorted to, and the honorable Senators over the way look beyond the deeds into the Constitution for power to make the distribution. But, sir, I oppose the scheme on every ground. I contend that there is no obligation on Congress, growing out of the deeds, to make a distribution of that portion of the revenue derived from the public lands. I contend that there is no power expressed or implied in the Constitution to pass a law corresponding with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky. And if such a power was undoubted, I contend that it would be grossly pernicious in its effects—unjust to the States, prejudicial to the interests of the people, and in every sense impolitic and inexpedient.

At the session of the New Hampshire Legislature, in 1837, when the subject of distributing the avails of the public lands had engaged the attention of the American people, they resolved that all manner of unnecessary taxation, if it have for its object distribution, is highly detrimental to the best interests of the whole people; and distribution of the revenue to the States is contrary to the true spirit and meaning of the Constitution; and if the practice of taxing the people unnecessarily for that object is adopted, will tend towards the creation of a consolidated Government, and to the ultimate and complete dependence of the several States upon that Government. Such were then the sentiments of the people of my own State, and very soon, too, after the famous report from the Committee on Public Lands had been given to the public. But as this subject has from that time to this more or less engaged the attention of Congress, the Legislature of New Hampshire, at its session in 1839, passed resolutions of instruction which I felt compelled to lay before the Senate, and, from a sense of duty to my State and to my own conscience, implicitly to observe and obey. The resolutions were as follows:

"Whereas certain propositions have been before the Congress of the United States, having for their object the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands; and whereas such a measure, in the opinion of this Legislature, is not only unconstitutional, but is calculated to diminish the public revenue and increase indirect taxation, by affording a pretext for a continuance of a high tariff:

"Therefore resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court convened, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and the Representatives from this State be requested, to oppose every attempt to divide the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, or to make any other disposition thereof, except for the constitutional purpose of providing for the common welfare and general defence of the United States."

The Senator from Massachusetts contends that the express grant of power, conferred upon Congress to dispose of the public territory belonging to the United States, gives an entire and perfect control over the whole subject matter. The power "to dispose of," he says, is broad and sufficiently comprehensive to include the power to distribute. I cannot bring my mind to that conclusion. The power to "dispose of" the territory and the other property of the United States is specific and clear; but there can be no legitimate inference that any other and different powers can be exercised by Congress, from the fact that the power is in terms unlimited. It gives to Congress, I freely admit, the authority to dispose of the public lands, but it goes no farther; and it seems to me to be a violence upon language—a misconception of the nature and object of this grant of power, to contend that Congress can do that which will in effect defeat the object and purpose designed. The Senator will not pretend that he can find within the range of the Constitution, any express power conferred upon Congress to divide among the States any portion of the public revenue. But his position is, if understood, that the power "to dispose of," includes the power to distribute. Both the Senators from Kentucky and Massachusetts have pressed this argument. But I cannot well see how they can logically or constitutionally, from their premises, make their deductions.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has said that the tax power and the land power conferred upon Congress by the provisions of the Constitution, are essentially different. Is this so? What is the object of the taxing power of Congress? To bring money into the Treasury; and for what purpose? Clearly for the public use. What is the object of the power conferred upon Congress to borrow money upon the credit of the United States? Clearly to bring money into the Treasury for public use. What is the object, sir, of the power conferred upon Congress "to dispose of the territory of the United States?" Clearly to bring money into the Treasury for public use. Where, then, is the difference, so far as respects the objects of these respective powers? None, sir. The Senator from Kentucky remarked, with an apparent triumph, that while the taxing power looked to the collection of revenue for the purpose of paying the debts, providing for the common defence and general welfare of the United States, the land power was entirely silent upon that matter; and he has challenged any friend of the Administration to show that the word revenue was in any way connected with the land power conferred upon Congress. And hence he infers, that in the exercise of this same land power, the object was not revenue. Is this a fair and legitimate inference from the premises? True it is, that Congress has power, in express terms, to dispose of the territory belonging to the United States. True it is, that the Constitution is entirely silent as to what shall be done with the avails of any such disposition of the territory.

But what then? Can it be presumed, from this mere fact of silence, that Congress possess the power to give away the avails of the public lands; that, inasmuch as no express specific direction is given in the Constitution to apply the proceeds of the sales of the public territory for the purpose of paying the debts, or of providing for the common defence of the United States, it necessarily follows that Congress can distribute those proceeds to the States? All powers not expressly delegated by the Constitution, are reserved to the States or to the people. Congress has power to borrow money upon the credit of the United States. But does the Constitution direct what shall be done with the money thus borrowed? No, sir. And would the Senator from Kentucky contend that Congress may, in the exercise of its discretion, give away or distribute to the States the money thus borrowed? Under this power to borrow money, I would like to know if there is an American statesman, within the limits of this Republic, bold enough to maintain that Congress can, constitutionally, apply a dollar of money thus obtained but for public use—that Congress could regard the means thus acquired in any other light than as a portion of the public revenues to be expended exclusively for the use and benefit of the whole Union, to be withdrawn from the public Treasury by appropriations made by law. And, sir, can the Senator from Kentucky point to me any difference in the power conferred upon Congress to dispose of the territory of the United States, and to borrow money upon the credit of the United States? So far as relates to the disposal of the proceeds of such negotiations, there is no difference, in fact. The power is the same in both cases. And, as before remarked, the great object of the exercise of such power was to raise revenue—to bring money into the public Treasury for public use. The Senator from Kentucky admits that Congress has not the power to levy taxes and to collect revenue for the purpose of distribution. This is correct; but he adds, Congress has power to dispose of the territory and other property of the United States, and as there is no limitation to this power, it may dispose of that territory and distribute the avails. Congress, it is admitted, has no power to collect a revenue for distribution, but it can levy taxes "to provide and maintain a navy," and Congress possesses the power, the Senator contends, to sell and dispose of the ships which constitute that navy, receive the proceeds in money, and distribute that money to the States. Of all the extraordinary positions which have been taken in illustration of this power, this is, to my mind, the most extraordinary. The mere statement of the proposition itself shows its absurdity. While it is admitted that Congress has no constitutional power to collect a revenue for distribution, it is urged that it has the power to dispose of our national ships, our public fortresses, and our public domain, collect the proceeds and make distribution thereof among the States. I shall add nothing more; if the Senator can derive any advantage from such an argument, be it so. If the American people can thus be deluded, for one, I shall think much less of their intelligence than I now do.

The Senator from Massachusetts admits, as I have before stated, that he does not look to the deeds of cession for the power which Congress has over this subject. He finds that power in the Constitution; and he contends that, under the third section of the fourth article of that instrument, he can erect a platform broad enough to sustain his positions. The Senators says, that Congress has the power to dispose of the territory of the United States. This is true; and he contends further that the authority is also conferred upon Congress to do what it shall please with the public domain—to be controlled only by its own discretion. Is this so? And the ground taken by the Senator from Massachusetts, is, that there is no limitation to this specific grant of power. That Congress is unrestricted in its exercise—this is true, so far as the language used goes to confer the particular power. But what is the power conferred? "To dispose of the territory belonging to the United States." This is all, sir. And what is the meaning of the words "to dispose of?" I answer, to sell—to convey—to transfer—to pass over to another. The power then conferred by this section (according to the most approved lexicographers) is to sell—to convey—to transfer the public territory, and this is all. There is no other authority given in terms; and if any other authority is attempted to be exercised, it is an assumption of power without right. Let us apply this to the affairs and business of common life. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts, under his hand and seal, empowers me to dispose of his farm—to bargain away—to sell—and to convey his valuable homestead; would not the Senator conclude that it would be a monstrous abuse of that power, should I appropriate the avails of such a sale to my own use—should I distribute the proceeds to my own children? And what would be the Senators answer, if I should contend that, under the express authority "to dispose of" was included necessarily, the authority to distribute? I am inclined to think that the honorable Senator would be the last man who would be convinced by any such argument. He would say, and would properly say, look to the express terms of your power. Do not presume to go beyond the record.

In the Constitution there is an express power in terms conferred upon Congress to dispose of the territory, but does that necessarily include a power to distribute? Congress could not be justified to imply any such power. It must be conferred plainly, expressly, and intelligibly, or no such power can be presumed to exist. The Senator contends for the existence of the power to distribute because there is no qualification or limitation of the power to "dispose of" the territory. Sir, is there any limitation or restriction upon the power conferred upon Congress to borrow money? No, sir; the one power is just as unlimited in terms as the other. As I have before remarked, would the honorable Senator, or any other member of this Senate, for a moment contend that the power to borrow money for the reason, that it is unlimited and unrestricted necessarily includes the power to distribute the money thus acquired, according to the discretion of Congress? Mr. President, the argument is fallacious—it rests upon no substantial foundation. But I freely admit that the honorable Senators from Kentucky and from Massachusetts must look to the Constitution for the power to distribute, if any such power exists. I commend them for having, even at this late day, abandoned the ground that an imperious obligation rests upon Congress, growing out of the deeds of cession, to make distribution of the revenue arising from the sales of the lands to the respective States. Sir, I have not been able to satisfy myself that the deeds of cession impose any such obligation upon the United States. I have not been able to satisfy myself that there is any constitutional power given to Congress to distribute the public revenue, or any portion of the public revenue. My views on these points are now with the Senate; they are conscientiously entertained, and they have been honestly presented. If they shall induce others to the same conclusions to which I have come, I shall rejoice—if they shall produce no effect upon others, I shall content myself with the reflection that I have done my duty.

Mr. President, believing as I do, that no obligation rests upon the General Government by the deeds of cession to make distribution among the respective States of that portion of the revenue derived from the sale of the public lands, and acquired from the States—and believing as I do, that there is no specific grant of power given to Congress to make any such division of the proceeds of the lands acquired either by purchase from the States or by purchase from foreign Governments, I must oppose this amendment. I cannot but regard the project as a most dangerous and alarming assumption of power—as calculated to break down the objects of this Confederacy—as constituting this Government the great distributor of the public revenues for every purpose except that for which the revenues were collected. Looking beyond the wants and necessities of the country—disregarding the imperative obligations to provide for its defence and its welfare, we find here a proposition submitted to appropriate the means of the whole people for the exclusive use of the respective States. Sir, I can favor no such measure—a measure unauthorized by the charter of our liberties—at war with the genius, the character and object of our Government.

But could I for a moment believe that the Constitution conferred upon Congress the power to pass into a law the proposition submitted by the Senator from Kentucky, I would oppose it as unjust to the interests of the States—as prejudicial to the honest rights of the people. I would oppose it as unequal and oppressive in its effects and operations. I have already referred to the present condition of the Treasury, as furnishing a most unanswerable objection against the expediency of this project. I have already shown that the proceeds of the lands, as well as the proceeds of the imports, constitute alike the revenues of the country. I have shown that the power conferred upon Congress to lay taxes, impose duties, borrow money, or "to dispose of the territory" of the United States, was for the purpose of providing means for public use. And when those means are thus acquired, there is no difference or distinction between the parts which make up the aggregate. They are truly the revenues of the Government—supplied by direct or indirect taxation upon the people. The Senators from Kentucky and Massachusetts have admitted, and with much propriety and truth admitted, that Congress cannot levy taxes to collect revenue for distribution. But if not equally opposed to the constitutional power of Congress to make distribution of any portion of the revenue, is not such a proceeding at war with every consideration of public policy—to make a deficit in our means for the sake of supplying it—to abstract from the Treasury five millions annually, in order to tax the people the requisite sum to supply again that five millions? Such a proceeding may be founded in wisdom—it may be recommended by a sound discretion—by considerations of pure patriotism. But I cannot so view it. I am compelled to give to it a different character. How is it proposed to supply the deficiency in the Treasury which would be occasioned by this abstraction? By a tax on luxuries. That, however, must depend on the future legislation of Congress. By this amendment, it is proposed, after the 1st January, 1842, to divide among the States that portion of the revenue derived from lands. All agree that the condition of our public finances cannot bear such a reduction—that the deficit must be supplied. But whether that will be done by borrowing money; by a direct tax; by increasing the existing duties, or by laying imposts on articles now free of duty, must depend on the action of Congress—and no man can tell what that action will be. Every man knows that a portion of this Confederacy is most sensitive upon the subject of the tariff; and it has seemed to me from the beginning, that the friends of this policy should contrive first to create a surplus in the Treasury before they distribute the revenue; that they should at least count the eggs before they divide the chickens.

But let us examine the plan which is suggested, with a view to supply the deficiency. That plan is to impose an ad valorem duty on luxuries. Under the existing provisions of the compromise act, the revenue derived from imports before the first of July, 1842, will be reduced at least five millions of dollars. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his tariff report, communicated to the Senate on the 18th of January last, remarks that "if the expenditures are properly and seasonably diminished, it will not be necessary to raise all this amount by taxation in any form." A clause in the third section of the compromise act provides that after 1842 "duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government. The Secretary adds that "in truth the tariff is as much a system of taxation as a land tax; and that the confining of all duties hereafter to a low rate was, therefore, desirable to the great mass of the people, because it was confining taxes to a low rate," and "by confining in substance any future change to purposes of revenue alone, and within twenty per cent. would impart greater permanence and prosperity even to manufacturing, and with that to all other descriptions of industry." From the whole tenor of this report—from the state of popular opinion, which is believed to exist upon this subject—I am led to the conclusion that a system of ad valorem duties, not to exceed twenty per cent. after the first of July, 1842, will be resorted to for the exclusive purpose of collecting revenue, and will become the settled policy of the Government. It is conceded that the duties on imports will be reduced under the operation of the compromise act, before that expires in 1842, five millions, leaving only ten millions of revenue derived from customs. This deficit must also be supplied by creating new or increasing old duties. There can be no doubt that the annual expenditures of this Government, for years to come, will amount at least to twenty millions of dollars. Fifteen of that twenty, at least, allowing the present sources of revenue to remain undisturbed, must be derived from duties on imports. But if the contemplated revenue derived from lands be annually abstracted, then the whole twenty millions must be collected from imports. The Secretary of the Treasury, in the report herein before referred to, proposes a mode of supplying the deficiency which would necessarily be produced in the reduction of duties under the compromise act before July, 1842. And what is that mode? I refer to it to show the gross impolicy, if not the impracticability, of distributing the avails of the lands. An imposition of ad valorem duties on articles not now subject to duty, is proposed by the Secretary as the means of supplying the deficit; and the tables furnished by the Secretary contain much valuable information. The first gives the names and value of all free articles imported into the United States in the year 1838, after deducting such of them as were exported; and the Secretary suggests that taking the imports of that year as a guide, and perhaps nearer an average for some time to come than any other, it shows that the value of all free articles entering into the consumption of the country would amount to $38,161,533. This was their value in 1838. And an ad valorem duty of the maximum per centage would yield $7,632,317, as the gross amount of revenue; subject, however, to all charges, losses, expenses, and deductions, incident to the process of collection, and to the operation of the revenue laws; and when we compare the gross amount of revenue with what finds its way into the public Treasury, it would not be extravagant to estimate the nett revenue accruing at this rate of duty, upon the aggregate value of the importation of the free articles contained in the first list of the Secretary at an amount not exceeding six millions of dollars. It is true, the Secretary makes that estimate of value after deducting such of the importations as may be exported; but when a duty shall be imposed on any article, the exportations of that article will be increased. And as evidence that my conclusion is correct, it may be stated that the gross revenue on imports for 1838 was $20,114,164, while the nett revenue was only $16,158,800, a deduction of one-fifth in the whole amount, which is very near the proportion I have assumed. From the gross revenue on the value of importations as before stated, at a rate of duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem, one-fifth part must be deducted to satisfy drawbacks, bounties, charges, and expenses. I shall have occasion to refer to this matter again, for the purpose of illustrating the effect, in a pecuniary point of view, which the proposed distribution will have upon the pockets of the people. For it should be borne in mind that it is the amount of gross revenue that is drawn from them. My object in referring to this matter at this time is merely to show that an imposition of an ad valorem duty of twenty per cent. on the long list of all the free articles imported into the United States in 1838, will yield a nett revenue for the use of the Government, of six millions of dollars, and if the same rate of duty, is made applicable to all other importations, the whole amount of revenue, derived from imports, will not exceed annually sixteen millions of dollars—taking the value of the importations of 1838 as the basis of my calculations. If to this amount is added the ordinary receipts from the sales of the public lands, the whole revenue will not exceed twenty millions of dollars, indispensably necessary for years to come, as experience will verify, for the economical support of this Government. It is true that the receipts from the public lands from 1835 to 1839 both inclusive, amounted to $55,492,956, making an average of over eleven millions per year—but that was a season of extravagance and speculation. The whole amount of receipts from the lands from 1811 to 1824 inclusive, was only $21,150,680, average only a million and a half per year. The amount from 1825 to 1829, the sales averaged less than a million and a half a year, and the whole amount of receipts from 1830 to 1834 inclusive, was $16,988,835, averaging for each year less than three millions and a half, and the receipts for 1840 will not exceed three millions; and averaging the whole receipts from 1811 to 1840, the annual avails will fall short of three and a half millions of dollars.

I therefore think that I am correct in assuming the fact, that for years to come not over four millions annually will be added to the revenues from this source. The Secretary, in the same report, adds that a duty on his entire list of free articles, of 15 per cent. will yield a nett revenue not far from five millions of dollars—the sum required to provide for the reduction of duties under the compromise act. The Secretary bases his calculation on the ground that there will be no drawbacks, and that the charges will amount to over $700,000. The exact duty on the value of the importations in 1838, at fifteen per cent. would amount to the sum of $5,724,237; making the expense of collecting from duties, a nett revenue of five millions of dollars, the sum of $724,237; an estimate, in my judgment, too low, as I think must appear from a fair comparison between the gross amount of the revenue arising from duties with the nett for any given number of years, after making proper deductions for drawbacks. But the Secretary adds, that this entire list of free duties includes some which should be subject to a less duty than even fifteen per cent. for the reason that they will not bear even that duty; and therefore he suggests that "another mode of raising the same amount of revenue would be preferable;" and to that end he proposes to select from the free articles those which may be regarded most as luxuries, though not in every respect belonging exclusively to that class; and he has given to the Senate a second table in his report, containing the entire list upon which he proposes to assess this maximum of per centage in the way of duties. The valuation of these free articles, according to the importation of 1838, it will be seen by referring to this list, a copy of which I have subjoined, amounts to $29,026,448; and being made subject to a duty of twenty per cent. after paying the expenses of collection, would yield about the same amount of five millions. In this estimate of charges, the Secretary approximates nearer to the true amount of expenses. The twenty per cent. duty on the value of this list of importations, would make $5,805,289, making the expenses exceed $800,000. But I propose, to some extent, to analyze this list, in order to show what the effect would be upon the people of my own State.

But it should not be forgotten that these various estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury are made with a view to supply a deficiency in the Treasury which will happen before the first of July, 1842, on account of the reduction of the existing tariff of duties anterior to that period. Two and a half millions will fall off the first of January, 1842, and two and a half millions on the 30th of June, 1842, leaving a deficit of five millions in the revenue from this source, should there be no change in the tariff. These estimates are not submitted to the Senate for the purpose of supplying a deficiency in the revenue, which would be occasioned should the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky be adopted. Although it so happens that the friends of the distribution policy propose to resort to a taxation upon the same description of articles, in order to bring back to the Treasury that which, under their distribution scheme, they propose to distribute. It will be necessary either for the Secretary or for the friends of the proposed amendment to give up their favorite mode of raising revenue. It will not serve both. It will prove insufficient to supply the means which will be required by the Secretary, and by those who seek to reduce the revenue, five millions to divide among the States.

The above contains the list of free articles upon which the Secretary proposes that a duty of 20 per centum ad valorem should be imposed, for the purpose of raising five millions of dollars, to provide for the deficiency in the revenue which will be produced by the operation of the existing tariff system before July, 1842. Upon the supposition that this proposed duty will raise the sum required to be drawn from imports, which, with the sum now derived from the sales of the public lands, will produce a revenue sufficient for the uses of the Government, economically administered, I would ask, how is the deficiency to be supplied, if all that part of the revenue derived from lands shall be abstracted from public use? This is the sum and substance of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky. And how is that deficiency in the revenues of the Government to be supplied? Will the friends of this policy presume to recommend that the ad valorem duties on the beforementioned free articles shall be doubled? No, sir; they will not dare to introduce such a proposition. The very existence of such an onerous duty will defeat the very object intended. Instead of increasing the revenue, the effect will be to reduce it; for by increasing duties upon articles of mere luxury, you will either prevent their importation altogether, or else you will introduce them by an illicit trade. The effect upon the revenue in both cases would be the same. Impose a high duty, for instance, on silks—will silks be imported? Their use will be abandoned, or they will be smuggled into the country. But let us see what will be the direct effect upon the consumers of the 20 per cent. ad valorem duty on teas, coffee, and silks, as proposed by the Secretary. Sir, since I have been in Congress, the duty on the two first described articles has been entirely removed. And why so? For the reason that, so far from being luxuries, they were regarded by the great mass of consumers as the conveniences, if not the necessities, of life. What article among the long list of importations enters more universally into the consumption of the country than tea? It is now a free article. As it is proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report, to preserve the policy and the principle embraced in the compromise act, to establish a tariff of ad valorem duties, it will become necessary to revive again a duty on teas and coffee for the purpose of revenue. The value of the teas imported into our country in 1838 was - - - - $2,559,246

Let it not be said that this is a tax which operates exclusively upon the rich. No, sir: it is a tax which bears upon the consumer, be he rich or poor. In New England—certainly in my own State—these articles are of very general use. Scarcely will you find a family in the whole range of New Hampshire that is not in the habit of using daily these essentials of life, as they are regarded by our people. But this is not all. Among the list of free articles, upon which it is proposed to impose a duty of 20 per cent. for revenue, are silks and the manufacture of silks. The value of the importations in 1838, of that description of goods, was $7,897,343 The value of silk and worsted goods - 1,520,154

Making - - - $9,417,497

A duty of 20 per cent. on this amount, would yield - - - $1,883,499

Add to this the charges at 10 per cent. 188,349

Making an aggregate of - $2,071,848

And I would ask if this indirect tax bears exclusively upon the rich? No, sir: far otherwise. Is there any man so ignorant of the habits of our people as not to know that silks are used by our countrywomen generally, if not universally? And it could not fail to occur to me that when it was proposed to assess a duty on silks that it was intended to compel the great body of the consumers to use, as a substitute, the fruits of our own manufactories—to substitute the muslin of our own workshops for the silks of France. There could not be selected from the long list of free articles any upon which an imposition of duty would operate more oppressively upon the people of my own State than those I have enumerated, except that most obnoxious of all duties, a duty upon salt, that indispensable necessary of human life—a duty which has already brought $23,000,000 into your Treasury, and which it would be as difficult to sustain by argument as it would be to sustain the justice of a tax upon the water we drink, or the air we breathe.

Let it not be understood, sir, that I am opposed to this system of ad valorem duties for the purpose of collecting revenue. It may be more equal and just than any other tariff of duties. And in referring to the particular articles which are to be made subject to duty in the new order of things, I have only intended to show the effect which such a duty would produce upon my people. I have only intended to show that it is a tax upon the poor—upon the working classes of the country—and not exclusively upon the rich as some have supposed. But even such a tax would be borne without a murmur by the people, were it necessary to raise revenue for the support of their Government. And should it become important after the expiration of the present compromise act so to regulate the tariff as to confine the duties hereafter to be imposed within twenty per cent. on articles of importation, instead of a wide range of thirty, fifty, eighty, and a hundred per cent. and more—at times previously in practice and frequently for protection, it would furnish no ground for complaint—it would probably, in its consequence, be productive of the greatest good. And any regulation after 1842 which may be necessary to carry out this policy, which, even if it lead to the imposition of duty on teas and on coffee, will receive public sanction if the object be public revenue, and all the revenue of the Government shall be faithfully applied to that same object.

But what does the amendment propose? That we shall give away to the States—that we shall scatter to the four winds of Heaven five millions of the public revenue annually—and that the deficit shall be supplied by a tax on these same luxuries, as they are called. No member of this Senate, and no sound reflecting man of this country, will, for a moment, suppose five millions can be collected on the list of free articles hereinbefore named. The whole deficit in the revenue, as well as that occasioned by the reduction of the duties in 1842, as that occasioned by the distribution among the States, cannot be supplied in the mode named by the Secretary of the Treasury. Will the people of this country submit to the most unequal and oppressive system of taxation which has ever yet been invented by the wit of man, to supply a deficit in the Treasury occasioned by a distribution of the avails of the public lands among the States? They will never willingly submit, for such a purpose, to an annual tax upon teas and coffee, of

Upon silks, &c.	1,883,499
Which, with the addition of the charges and expenses of collection, &c. of	382,294

Making an aggregate of - - - $4,205,244 to be drawn year following year from their pockets as the consumers of these essential articles of life.

It has been said, in argument, that the expenses and charges of every description necessarily incident to the collection of the revenue arising from the sales of our public lands exceeds 20 per cent. And the amendment proposes—after all these expenses shall have been incurred—after the net avails shall have been placed in the Treasury—that the amount shall be taken therefrom and given to the States, and that a like sum shall be drawn from the people for public use. Does it not occur to every man that this very operation imposes a tax of from one and a half to two millions per annum, in the shape of charges and expenses, upon the people, and this without yielding the slightest benefit to any one? If five millions, when collected, could be distributed to the people upon the same fixed ratio, and a like sum could be taken from them upon the same ratio, without charge or expense, no injustice would be done. But it would be such an extraordinary operation, as would have nothing but its novelty to recommend it. But the principle rests on no such measure of equal justice. The proposition is first to collect into the Treasury (say five millions) the proceeds of the public lands, and pay all the charges and expenses of collecting, making a million more; then take and divide among the States the five millions, and turn around and collect from the people, by a tax on imports, revenue sufficient to replace the five millions in the Treasury, and pay all charges, which cannot amount to less than a half million more. I have said that this amendment, if carried into full effect, would operate most oppressively upon the people of my State.

The great articles of necessity which now enter into their consumption, pay an annual duty equal to one-third of revenue derived from imports.

In 1836, the duty on salt was	$504,111
In same year the duty on sugar	4,396,986
In same year the duty on iron	2,180,650

Making the sum of	$7,081,847
In the year 1837, the duties on the same articles amounted to	6,049,053
In the year 1838, the duties on the same articles amounted to	5,378,979
In the year 1839, the duties on the same articles amounted to	7,114,178

The tables with which I have been furnished, show the precise duty on each of the articles for each year; but the proportion is very nearly the same in each, as that given in 1836, and the result of the whole matter is, that nearly one-third of all the revenue derived from customs, is derived from these three articles of indispensable necessity. Add to these the duty on molasses, and more than one-third of the revenue is annually collected from the consumers of these four necessities of life. And who are the consumers of these dutiable articles? Certainly the people of my own State, in a much greater proportion to the whole consumption than her population bears to the population of the whole country. And why do I say so? Because no one of these essential articles, to any great extent, is manufactured within the limits of New Hampshire. While Pennsylvania makes her own iron—while New York manufactures not only the salt consumed within her limits west of Utica, but also most of that consumed in the States northwest of the Ohio—while Louisiana manufactures her own sugar, the people of New Hampshire are compelled to consume articles of this description, the production of foreign countries, and subject to their odious, unequal, and oppressive system of indirect taxation. There can be no doubt, then, that the people of my own State, from their peculiar location, pay more than their just proportion of the revenue derived from customs. But this is not the only burden connected with this matter, which the people are compelled to bear, by the operations of this system of indirect taxation. Let me illustrate. The gross revenue derived from the duty on salt from 1789 to 1838, both inclusive, amounts to $28,780,754; and within that period of time, there has been paid from the National Treasury, in bounties and allowances, $7,119,093, leaving only a net revenue from this source of $21,876,101. While the people, the actual consumers of this article, were compelled to pay, in the way of duties, the whole amount of the gross revenue, it results that only three-fourths of that amount finds its way into the Treasury for general use; and so it is with all the duties and taxes imposed for the purpose of revenue. The gross exceeds the net revenue from twenty to twenty-five per cent. per annum; and it is the gross revenue which is collected from the people. That is the description of revenue assessed on foreign merchandise; and on that amount is charged and paid back to those entitled, not only all drawbacks, but all bounties. Besides, there is paid out of this amount, before the net balance goes into the Treasury, all the real and legitimate expenses of collection. The merchant charges for his goods to the purchaser from him, and he to the people an additional price equal to all which is assessed, as the importing merchant has to pay all which is assessed to the United States. I have taken the gross revenue for four years commencing with 1836, and compared it with the net revenue, that the people may understand the burdens they are made to bear. I have ascertained the gross revenue derived from customs for the years 1836, 1837, 1838 and 1839, and they make an aggregate of $95,350,482. This, it is true, is liable to large reductions by debentures and drawbacks upon importations, but that is the amount assessed upon the people. I have also ascertained the net revenue derived from imports for the same years, and it amounts to $73,875,856, and making a difference of $21,474,556; a sum drawn from the people under this system of unequal taxation. It will be seen that the average net revenue for each year, from customs, is a little less than twenty millions, and if this sum is fairly apportioned to the population of the whole country, it will be found that for the years I have mentioned each man, woman and child would have to pay annually not less than $1 25 per head; if the gross revenue should be thus apportioned it would exceed that amount. The proportion of New Hampshire would have been, for each year, over $350,000. With the present reduction of duties, including all charges and expense, if divided according to the population, it would impose a per capita tax of a, least one dollar per annum. The proportion then of the import duties of New Hampshire, would now be according to that estimate a tax of $285,000 annually. In a pecuniary point of view let us see how New Hampshire would stand. She would receive, if five millions should be distributed, according to the ratio named, (the number of representatives in both Houses in Congress) about $119,000; and the tax which she would have to bear, in first collecting five millions from the public lands for distribution, and then collecting five millions on imports to supply the deficit, estimating the charges, losses, and all expenses for such an operation at two millions of dollars, which is much too low, if the Secretary of the Treasury be correct in the estimates contained in his tariff report, would amount to not less than $170,000, making a dead loss to the State of at least $50,000 annually. But this is not all. The injustice of a tax upon imports renders that system of taxation peculiarly objectionable, unequal and oppressive to the people of my native State.

The consumer, all admit, has ultimately to pay the duties on imports. Is this a tax on property? No, sir, it may with much more truth be denominated a poll—a personal—a per capita tax. I am familiarly acquainted with a single individual residing in the town adjoining the one in which I live; he has a family, and is a man of large property. I will take fifty families in this same town, the aggregate of whose wealth would not equal his, and yet each one of those families consume as much tea, as much salt, as much sugar, as much molasses, and contribute as much towards the revenue derived from customs, as the individual referred to. This is not a solitary case; they are of common occurrence. And can any man say, with a knowledge of these facts, that an impost tax is not a most unequal, and, consequently, a most unjust tax upon the people? The mechanics, the workmen of the country, are the consumers of your dutiable articles. The men of moderate estates—the farmers and laborers, with their families, are among those who consume the necessities, and many of them what are called the luxuries of life. In my own town I know an individual who earns his daily bread by his daily labor, yet consumes in his family a greater amount of articles subject to duty than my neighbor worth a half a million of dollars. It is the inequality in operation of this tax on imports that renders it oppressive, and should never incline Congress to resort to it, except for the purpose of revenue. But sir, entirely different is that portion of the revenue derived from lands—that portion which it is now proposed to distribute among the States, thus increasing the burdens of that portion of the community now oppressed. That is a tax upon property; the poor man feels it not; he goes into the wilderness of the West, pays his two hundred dollars for his quarter section, and gets a good bargain. It is a source of revenue which should be carefully protected, for every dollar thus collected is a direct benefit to the other tax payers—the consumers of dutiable articles. It would be a most happy state of things could every dollar of revenue wanted for the use of the Government be derived from the public lands. I am in favor of a tax on luxuries, but I would impose that tax in order to do something like equal justice to all the tax payers. That would to some extent operate as a tax upon property, and if the Senator from Massachusetts is ready to go along with me to do substantial justice to the people of his native State, I would say to him, while you impose taxes upon luxuries, take taxes off from the necessities of life; while you are disposed to collect revenue from the rich, take from the poor the burdens which bear them down. This would indeed be justice, and substantial justice.

If I had time, there is one view of this subject upon which I should like further to enlarge, and that is, the pecuniary effect which the distribution to the States would produce upon the people. Does it not occur to every person, that while you make the proposed distribution to the States, you confer no general benefit upon the people? If, for instance, the share assigned to Indiana goes to relieve her to that extent from her indebtedness, is it not manifest that such an application of the fund would be an unequal tax upon the poor, and for the benefit of the rich? If the debt of Indiana were to be discharged by the means of direct taxation upon her people, the property of the State in such a case would bear the burden; but if any portion of the debt shall be discharged by duties or imports, then the effect would be to tax the consumers of the dutiable articles—not a tax upon property, but upon consumption—a most unequal, and, consequently, a most oppressive tax. There is no way that New Hampshire could appropriate her distributive share so as to produce equality and justice in its operations upon her people. If the principal be funded, and the interest be annually applied for the support of the State Government, is it not apparent that the principal, in such a case, would be supplied by the unequal contributions of the poor? And such would be the effect if the amount was funded, and the interest applied for the support of our schools. These funds are now raised by a tax on property. But if supplied in the manner I have named, does it not at once occur to every man that the same would be produced by the odious and oppressive tax imposed upon the consumption on this occasion. But, Mr. President, if the fund should be applied for State internal improvements—for the construction of a railroad upon the banks of the Connecticut—would the benefit conferred to the People of my State be in proportion to their contributions? No, sir; the citizens remote from the improvement would derive no earthly advantage by any such application of the fund. That portion of her population who reside on her granite hills—among the fastnesses of her mountains—so far from realizing a benefit from any such appropriation of the fund, would be compelled to bear an increased taxation to advance the interests of rich individuals and rich corporations. But, Mr. President, I cannot pursue this subject further on this occasion.

Upon the expediency of now providing for the distribution among the States, of that portion of the revenue derived from the sales of the public lands, I have to add, that while the balance exists against the lands, and in favor of the Treasury, no measure could be more unjust. I do not purpose to go into the consideration of that matter. On a former occasion I attempted to perform that duty. The result of my calculations at that time showed that the Treasury was greatly in advance. And the calculations which were recently presented by the honorable Senator from New York, confirms, to some extent, my own results. At all events there can be no doubt that upon a full, and honest exposure of the account current between the Treasury and the public lands, millions would be found due to the Treasury. Would there then be, sir, any semblance of justice in distributing this part of the public revenue, when the money drawn from the pockets of the people for the acquisition of the public domain has not been reimbursed—and drawn too by the unequal operation of taxes on imports? I place this fact before the Senate; and I would appeal to their sense of justice, whether they are prepared to distribute the proceeds of the lands among the States, before the costs and charges incurred in acquiring and preserving them shall have been paid. It was due to the subject—it was due to the people, that this particular matter of receipts and expenditures should be exhibited—that the account between the Treasury and the lands should be stated. It has been done by the honorable Senator from New York; and I thank him, and the country will thank him for the exhibit. Independent of every other consideration, with a knowledge of the fact of there being a great balance due to the Treasury from the lands, I would not part with the control of the proceeds of the sales. I would hold them for the use, the benefit, and the interest of the whole people, to whom they rightfully belong. I would do this, wherever the application of their own means have added to the Union an extensive domain. And until these means shall be reimbursed, it would be unjust to the great body of the tax payers to distribute the portion of the public revenue derived from lands.

Mr. President, the State in which I reside asks no favors of this sort at the hands of Congress. She has regarded this Government as constituted for a wholly different purpose than to dispense charities to the different members of the Confederacy. New Hampshire has looked upon this Government as deriving all its force—all its energy, and all its power from the people—as most emphatically a Government of the people. She regarded the public revenues as the voluntary contributions of the true sovereigns of this Republic. New Hampshire, I am happy to say, is a non-debtor State. But unlike North Carolina and Delaware, she has no ample funds in reserve for her use. No, sir, she is, thank God, free from debt. Her institutions are supported by the contributions of her people, year following year. They know the value of their Government because it receives its support, its life and being, from the revenues derived from the direct taxation of her people. Sir, it is matter of gratification to us, that we have no such ample means in reserve, upon which we can draw for the support of our schools, our highways, and of all the other institutions of our Commonwealth. In proportion to our population and territory, there is not a State in this Confederacy whose affairs are conducted with more economy, or whose administration inspires more confidence. Her primary schools, her literary institutions, are her pride, her boast, and her honor; and whether, according to the judgement of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. WHITE,] "her people read right books" or not, it is enough for me to know that they not only read, but think and act for themselves; and it would have been better for Indiana if she had imitated the example of the Granite State, extended her system of education, and avoided that evil with which she is visited, a State debt. New Hampshire, as a State, would not regard her share in the distribution of the public revenue as a favor conferred. No, sir; she would look upon it as a curse. Sir, I have some feeling, some little information upon this very subject. I voted for the deposit act of 1836. I felt it to be my bounden duty at the time, looking to the permanent security of our public revenues. New Hampshire then received her share of the deposit made under that act; and it has proved any thing but a blessing to my people. While the principal is held sacred, at this very moment, for the use of the General Government, yet its primary disposition disturbed the harmony of our legislative assembly, and the disposition of the accruing interest neither fertilizes our soil, enriches its owners, or improves the character and condition of our people. Sir, knowing as I do the effect which has been produced in my own State by the deposit of the public funds, in 1836-7, in her Treasury, I have cause to lament, and deeply do I lament, that I ever gave my vote in favor of the deposit act of 1836. No consideration, sir, could now tempt me to do the like again. Looking to the prosperity, to the industry, to the happiness and well being of the people of my State, I can give no support to this distribution measure. I would not inflict upon them, a second time, such a curse.

Mr. President, there seems to be a delusion upon this whole subject. Why, I would ask, shall we distribute among the States any portion of the public revenue? Why make such an abstraction from the public Treasury? Why divide with one hand and exact with the other? Why send forth to the States your public treasure on one day, and on the next send among the people your tax gatherers, to collect and to return to the Treasury that of which it has been thus wantonly and rashly despoiled? Why should all these things happen?

Mr. President, it would be difficult to give such an answer to these inquiries as will satisfy the American people. If we distribute the revenue among the States, we shall take one fatal step towards the destruction of their spirit of lofty independence, and reduce them to the degrading condition of servility and dependence upon the General Government. This is not all: if we distribute the revenues among the States, we shall not only destroy their pride and love of liberty, but we shall paralyze the energies and efforts of the people themselves.

Mr. President, it is less than a year since I addressed this Senate upon this very question of distributing the public revenues. I then portrayed the consequence of the measure upon the States and upon the people. I can add nothing new. I have given to this subject all the consideration which its importance demands. I have given to it my best thoughts—my best reflections. And I would not now wish to gainsay any thing in relation to this proposition which I said in my speech upon the assumption of the State debts on February 7, 1840. I cannot support this measure. I regard it as destructive of the independence of the States—as tending to corrupt and degrade the people—as subversive of the great objects of this Government—as conflicting with the plain provisions of the Constitution—as dangerous to popular liberty—as unequal, unjust, and oppressive in its consequences upon the tax payers of the Republic.

Mr. President, in all human probability this is the last time that I shall address the Senate of the United States upon this momentous question, as my place in this body will soon be occupied by another. With deep reluctance have I, even at this time, trespassed upon the patience of this assembly. I was aware that the subject had lost much of the interest which was excited at the commencement of the debate. I was aware that the Senate had become tired of the discussion. I was aware that I came forward under every discouragement.

But, sir, a high sense of public duty has induced me to make the effort. I knew full well the sentiments of the people of my own State. I was familiar with the resolutions of the Legislature of New Hampshire touching this subject. I could not hesitate to take the earliest opportunity to declare once more the magnanimous, the patriotic sentiments of my people. I should have been faithful to my public duty. I should have been regardless of my responsibilities, had I failed to speak forth my views, when I had the proud satisfaction of knowing that, in speaking my sentiments, I spoke the independent, the manly, the noble sentiments of a great majority of the freemen of my native State. Sir, I have said all that I wish to say. I have performed a duty which I owed to myself—to my State—to my beloved country. And when I shall close my public life, if I could realize that my public efforts had, even for a time, stayed the progress of a measure as corrupt, and as corrupting as I regard the measure before us; if I could but realize that the sentiments which I had delivered had, in any way, tended to defeat the project for distributing among the States the money of the people, I should have great cause of joy.

• I may be permitted to add, in conclusion, that the active friends of this measure—so fatal to the independence of the States—to the prosperity and happiness of the people—should they ever be able to induce an American Congress to pass it through the forms of legislation, and to make it the law of the land, will have thrown upon themselves an awful responsibility. If this measure should be approved—if it should become a law, in the present condition of our public finances, and in the present prospects of our country—I should consider that the love of money had controlled every other consideration; I should consider that the power of corporations had overpowered the rights and liberties of the people.

Mr. PIERCE said the motion of the Senator from Illinois being indivisible, a question of some embarrassment was presented to him, and in this view, and this alone, he rose to make a few remarks by way of explanation. If in that land system which had worked so long and so favorably for the settlers, the States, and the Federal Government, there was to be any radical change, such as was contemplated by the respective propositions of the Senators from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] and Illinois, [Mr. YOUNG,] he undoubtedly had a preference, and a very decided preference. His desire, however, was to see that magnificent inheritance, which had descended to this from a past generation—that vast and rich domain—he might almost say perpetual source of revenue—kept as a common fund, free and unencumbered, under the exclusive control of Congress, to be used in such manner, and for such national purposes, as the exigencies of the country might from time to time demand. This, it appeared to him, (without attempting to lift the veil which excludes us from the future,) to be the safe and prudent course, to say the least. It possessed no charm of novelty, but it had what was better—what should not be lightly disregarded in public affairs or in the transactions of private life. It was sanctioned by the lessons of long experience. He, then, was opposed to both propositions; but, if either was to be adopted, the substitute enjoyed, in his estimation, many and decided advantages. There was one provision, however, which commended itself particularly not only to his feelings of patriotism, but to his deliberate judgment, and would control the vote he was about to give. He referred to the last section, which provided, that the sixty-five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales, should be set apart and exclusively applied to the gradual increase of the navy and the erection of such fortifications for the general defence of the country, as Congress may hereafter order and direct. He had endeavored, during the last session of Congress, to call the attention of the country to this long neglected, and most interesting question of our national defences, and he desired to say now, that there was hardly a constitutional measure having these great objects in view, that would not receive his cordial sanction and support. Whether the apprehensions expressed by his colleague, of collision with a foreign power, of vast resources and grasping policy, had any reasonable foundation, this was not the time perhaps to inquire. Our relations with Great Britain, he might be permitted to say, were not altogether what could be desired. Negotiation in relation to the Northeastern boundary had for a long series of years been signally unsuccessful. Was there any recent intelligence calculated to inspire brighter hopes of an amicable determination of the controversy? If so, it had not come to his knowledge. There was, it was true, what there had always been in relation to this matter, from high authority, assurances of an amicable and friendly disposition on both sides; but where was the acknowledgement of our just rights or the approximation of such acknowledgement? Moreover, had not every gentleman read with pain the recent correspondence of the British Minister and our Secretary of State, upon another delicate question involving the rights of the two Governments, and deeply affecting the sensibilities of the people of both? In this posture of our relations, did it become us on the Western continent, while the sword of conquest or of subjugation was already waving in triumph over the East, to slumber or repose in security? He knew that in answer to such a question, there would come up a full and unequivocal negative response from the people, through the whole length and breadth of the Union. But when would action follow? When would that voice imperatively demand the necessary legislation? Would it be resorted to seasonably? or would it be deferred to a moment when argumentation might be drowned in the loud reproaches of citizens banished from unprotected and ruined cities? He said these things, not to awake alarm, or to excite any unnecessary feeling, but to arouse to a sense of possible danger, and absolute duty. It was an astonishing fact, that with the disasters that attended the early periods of the late war, fresh in our recollection, we were at this moment relatively more deficient in preparation for a conflict with Great Britain than we then were; and yet a debate has occupied the Senate for weeks upon the question of distributing to the States a fund not in possession, but hereafter to accrue. He would not pursue this subject of the defences, which would be legitimately before the Senate when another bill upon the calendar should be taken up, further than to remark, that whether war were remote or near, (and he devoutly hoped the former might prove to be the case,) it was undeniably the part of statesmanlike forecast and elevated patriotism to provide for the worst, and to do it in view of our exposed condition and of the vastness of the interests involved. As had been before remarked, his object in rising was not to participate in the debate, but merely to make such an explanation as would place the vote he was about to give upon its true ground, and beyond the reach of misconstruction. It would only express his choice between the two propositions; he was opposed to, and would ultimately vote against both. The state of the Treasury, and the condition of the country, seemed to him alike to forbid any great change in the land system, or any experiments upon the revenue, such as either of the proposed plans would necessarily involve. With regard to the project of distribution, he desired to say it would encounter his opposition at whatever time, and in whatever form, it might be presented.

In his judgment it was repugnant to clear constitutional principles, and the highest considerations of public policy. How this, or that, or the other State was to be relieved from the burden of their heavy debts, were questions to be referred to the resources and the financial skill and policy of each for itself. For New Hampshire, he would say, that while she sought no aid from abroad, and would promptly pay all debts of her own contracting, her people would never consent to be taxed in any way to pay the debts of others. There was no question upon which the opinion of that people was more sound, or more uniform; and that judgment had been deliberately formed, after some experience in the supposed advantages of distribution. Opposed as they were, most decidedly to the distribution even of our surplus funds, it could require no particular sagacity to foresee how they would receive the absurd proposition to grant to the States, in their corporate capacities, to-day, what, it was notorious, must, by taxation, direct, or indirect, be enacted with all the expenses of disbursement and collection, from the people in their individual capacities, to-morrow.

SPEECH OF MR. ALLEN, OF OHIO.

In Senate, Monday, January 25, 1841.—On the proposition of Mr. CRITTENDEN to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands to the States, submitted as an amendment to the pre-emption bill, then under consideration.

Mr. ALLEN addressed the Senate as follows:

If, Mr. President, a British Minister were, upon this floor, to propose measures for our adoption—measures most beneficial to his own country and ruinous to ours—he would, I presume, in the first place, advise this Government to mortgage its whole domain to the bankers of England, in security for the debts of the States. Next, he would insist that the five millions of dollars, now annually brought to the Treasury from the sale of this domain, should be paid to those bankers through the agency of the States—they being constituted thus British factors to receive and to remit the amount. To supply the consequent deficiency in the national income, he would further recommend the imposition of a new tax, equivalent to that sum, upon the American people, and particularly upon those of the South and West. Then, would he advise that this additional burden should be levied as a duty upon the silks and wines received by us from France, in exchange for our cotton; and upon this latter would he more especially insist, because the imposition of such a duty would inevitably divert our whole trade in cotton from that country to England; and by giving a monopoly to her of this great product of our soil, comprehending, as it does, one-half of our entire exports, enable the English purchaser to fix his own prices upon it.

Such would be the counsels of a British Minister; but, sir, there is no British Minister upon this floor. And yet we have heard these very measures, one and all, urged upon us—urged with zeal and with passion—and that, too, by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] the very man who is soon to become the organ of intercourse between his own and the British Government.

In order to attain these results with the apparent sanction of the Constitution, and therefore to veil its breach, as well as the frightful consequences of such measures, from the eyes of the people, words and things have been transposed; objects professed, whilst the opposite are sought; and reason as well as truth been made subordinate to a form of phraseology, which both condemn. That the people may not start at this levy of a British tax, yearly, of five millions upon them, it is proposed, first, to collect it through the secret means of the customs; it is next declared to be a tax on luxuries merely, and therefore a burden alone upon the rich; and, finally, its payment to British bankers, when collected, is to be called a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands to the States. But the imposture stops not here. For, whilst it is by all conceded, including the Senator himself, that Congress has no authority in the Constitution to distribute the national revenue, yet he seeks that authority, first, by going behind and beyond the Constitution to the deeds of cession; then by denying the name of revenue to the fund derived from the lands; and, in the end, by returning to the Constitution, in order to embrace lands never ceded.

In the first part of this circuitous sophistry, we are told that the public domain is not the property of the States, united as a whole in their character of a Federal Union, but held by them in this character as a trust for the benefit, severally, of the individual States. This is said to be manifest from the cessions executed by a part of the States to the old Congress of the Confederation; and it is upon the assumption of this fact that the argument is rested, which deduces from those cessions the power of the present Government, acting under a Constitution since adopted, to distribute the revenue arising from all the lands among the States individually. But, sir, all the lands were never so ceded. On the contrary, the greater part lie far beyond what were ever the utmost limits of the ceding States, and were purchased by this, from foreign Governments, since the Constitution was adopted. Here, then, whilst the claim of power to distribute, founded upon the alleged character of the cession, is extended over the entire domain, the cessions themselves are found to embrace but an inconsiderable part.

As to this portion thus ceded prior to the Constitution, it has been shown, by other Senators, to have been vested, not in trust, but in absolute property, in the Confederation. Yet, I advert to this without deeming it important. For the object of the ceding States, whatever it might then have been, has since become utterly immaterial; because this Government holds no power over the lands in virtue of those cessions, but by an express grant in the Constitution. From that source alone, it derives authority over all things subject to its action. Beyond that, it has no power to go; because it would then be beyond the source of its own existence. The Constitution was not, as many suppose, the reorganization of a previously existing system, but an original—a first Government within itself; the old Confederation having possessed not one—not even the first—faculty of a Government: acting, as it did, never on men but States, and dependent, as it was, on volition solely for obedience. The ceding States—the States to which the cessions were made—all the parties to the cessions, were alike parties to the Constitution. Their objects in its adoption were the same; and, as the Confederation was dissolved in that very act, a readjustment was necessarily made of their relative rights and interests, equally in the lands as in every thing else. For these reasons it was that Congress, by an express grant in the Constitution, was authorized to “dispose of the public lands;” a grant amounting, in itself, to a cession anew—to a constitutional cession—of whatever right or reversion, title or trust, in the lands, the States might have held prior to, or during, the Confederation. And, sir, this new cession, if not the old, is, upon the face of it, incontestably absolute. For, if not so—if, as is pretended, upon the contingency of having discharged the public debt, the remaining lands, or their proceeds, were to be diverted to a particular object, (as to distribution among the States,) and that object, too, not otherwise within the power of Congress, why was not such object declared? Why was the grant of power not made commensurate with it? Why were the lands—the whole of the lands—confounded with all other public property, and made subject expressly to the same power, as they certainly are by these words of the Constitution: “The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States.” This is the single clause by which Congress has power over the lands, and equally applicable is it to all public property.

If, then, it be said (and so it has been) that this power is, upon its face, unlimited, and that, therefore, although Congress has no authority to distribute revenue generally, it may yet apply the lands, other property, or their proceeds, in distribution to the States, my answer is, that the power is unlimited only within the orbit of the Constitution. To any object which is itself, and independently of this particular power, within that orbit, the application may be made, but to none other; beyond the Constitution Congress cannot go, in search of a new object for the application of this fund; nor can it draw such an object within its own action, by connecting it with others already there.

And of this the reason is plain. Throughout the Constitution there run two distinct classes of powers—the one prescribing the objects to be executed; the other providing the means of execution. In the former class, the objects are few and express, in order to confine the action of the Government within definite limits. In the latter, the means are, by the form of the grant, necessarily general, yet limited in fact by the objects expressed in the former; because the object in view must ever precede, and afford the sole reason for at all resorting to means. To the second of the two classes belong the general powers “to lay and collect taxes,” “to borrow money,” and to “dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, or other public property.” The objects to which the proceeds arising from the exercise of these powers may be applied, are, elsewhere in the Constitution, expressly numbered; and the discretion of Congress in making the application is limited to a choice between the objects so expressed. If, therefore, the distribution of the revenue, or of the proceeds of the public property, or of the property in kind, be not itself an object existing in the Constitution, independently of the powers to collect revenue, to borrow moneys, and to dispose of the property, it exists not at all. The power to raise means by taxes, loans, or the sale of property, was left discretionary as to amount, for no other reason than because the sums necessary to execute the express objects to which those means were to be applied were contingent, and, therefore, not to be foreseen. But the number of those objects being known and limited, imposes a check upon the exercise of this discretion. It can be exercised no further than those objects, as they arise, are seen to require. The means are limited by the end. So, likewise, is the selection of the particular one out of the objects, in the execution of which the means are to be applied, left to the discretion of Congress; because, a choice between these several objects must depend upon the ever changing and unforeseen exigencies of Government. But here, too, this discretion is limited to the number of enumerated objects, among which the choice must be made; and that number is fixed in the Constitution. In a word, sir, the power to raise means, from whatever source, is, as to that, exhausted when the means are obtained. The application of them, then, requires the agency of a new and distinct power, which begins to act only when the other ceases. Nor can these powers be blended, increased, or diminished, or the order of their exercise transposed, by assigning the means to an object before they are themselves obtained; or by changing the character of the means, as by converting money into land, or land into money.

Yet, sir, such has been the purpose, the single purpose, of all the reasoning of the Senator from Massachusetts. He claims for Congress the power to distribute the fund derived from the lands, for the sole reason that it is so derived: thus making the power of appropriation depend not upon the object for which revenue may be raised, but upon the source whence it comes. Well, sir, if this principle be sound—if the source of revenue be not limited by the objects of appropriation—if, on the contrary, the number of those objects depends upon that source—if the power to appropriate does not limit, but rests upon, the power to tax—then are both unbounded, the Constitution impotent, and the Government absolute.

But why distribute the five millions yearly drawn from the lands? Is it thought to be a surplus beyond the wants of Government? No. So far from it, that the Senator admits its withdrawal from the Treasury will require the imposition of a new tax upon the people; and actually proposes the levy of the tax, to an equal amount, as the first step in distribution. Why, then, this circuitous legislation? Why not advance directly to the end in view? Why not distribute the tax to be raised, and retain the money derived from the lands? The reason is manifest; the one process may conceal, the other will expose, the real object to the people—taxation for distribution. For in what, at last, does this process end, if not in a distribution of revenue generally—in the levying of taxes upon the people for that purpose; and, in reference to the annual income from the lands, only as fixing, for the present, the sum to be imposed for distribution?

Who, then, can doubt that the Senator's reasoning, disguised though its object be, resolves itself into a claim of power in the Federal Government to tax the people, not for its own rightful purposes alone, but for the purposes, also, of the States—to tax them for all purposes whatever, as well those beyond as within the Constitution? And if, sir, such be the power of this Government, what power, what right, is left to the States—what security to the people? For is it not evident that, as the power of taxation must ever be commensurate with the objects committed to the care of Government, if those objects be numberless, left solely at discretion, equally discretionary must be that power. Then does the Constitution become a nullity, and the people defenceless. Nor, sir, does the form of Government, in such a case, whatever it may be, change the character of the evil. Despotism over men is the freedom of Government from restraint, whilst acting upon them. Their liberty depends upon the existence of such restraint, not upon their ultimate power of repairing wrongs, by revolution—a power at all times equally available, in their hand, against all the forms and ills of Government. Thus reasoning, as undoubtedly they did, the American people not only divided power between the State and Federal Governments—not only limited each by written Constitutions, but, for the greater precaution, withheld from both all powers deemed dangerous to the liberty of the citizen. But why this division—these limitations?—why this reservation, if the taxing power was to be left in this Government illimitable as to objects or amount?

To tax is a power, in its practical results, including all others. By this it is that Government takes from the people, and applies to its own use, their property, and the products of their labor. To this they submit for no other reason than because Government is instituted for their benefit, and contribution by them essential to its existence. But Government is no longer for their benefit, when, taking to itself an undue proportion of their substance, it inflicts misery where it should afford security against it—a result ever inevitable when the taxing power feels no restraint. Hence it is that the only test by which the freedom or despotism in any system can be known is, whether this power over the property and labor of the people be limited or not. If unlimited, the system is despotic; if limited so inefficiently as to admit of evasion with impunity, it is equally so. In either case, the Government and the people become, eventually, antagonist forces, with antagonist interests—the one struggling to obtain, the other to withhold, contributions. Every new tax, then, strengthens the Government and enfeebles the people in the contest. Through all history, this struggle is visible. This it is, more than any other, that has, in every age, convulsed the world, and strewn its bosom with the blood and bones of murdered men. In the Roman republic, the governing class, having first succeeded in obtaining almost the entire property of the country by sly and imperceptible means long employed, the strife began with the people for restitution. So was it in France prior to the first revolution; and such is now the strife in England. With us it seems Government is about to commence the contest for acquisition with the citizens. But in every instance, whether to acquire or to retain, the struggle for property is the same; and the people, whose labor produces all, are ever in the right. Wherever, under a system at all free, the governing power has succeeded (and it generally has) in the plunder of the people, these results have invariably followed: a division of the popular mass into classes, the rich and the poor; next, the establishment of political orders, the aristocracy, with power, wealth, and corruption—the multitude in penury, dependence, and wrath; and, finally, when civil discord, proscription, confiscation, and death have had their sway, single-handed despotism has closed the scene.

To this catastrophe, and by these means, have all free Governments been brought; and whether it be, of all such, the inevitable tendency, our own example must prove. But if this calamity, hitherto universal, can here be averted [if our destiny shall be found more happy than theirs—it will be because the people resist the evil whilst yet they are strong, and end it at the beginning; for with us, as with others, the necessities of Government, the support of credit, the relief of the country, are, and ever will be, the ready reasons put forth for taxation without limit, and, through it, usurpation of power. If not arrested at the outset, repetition will give to each act of plunder the authority of precedent; and time, in all things a powerful element of title, will gradually reconcile men to endurance; until at last, having become strong by allaying resistance, Government will throw away the veil, no longer necessary, and claim to sack the multitude, as a matter of right, for the benefit of the few.

In the spectacle of starving millions, England—that England so often commended to our imitation here—affords an example of this unbounded power of taxation. Never, in any part of the globe, have an equal number of human beings produced, by their toil, in a single year, an amount so great of the necessities and comforts of life, as are annually wrought by the laboring English. Upon every principle of justice, then, their own comforts should be proportionably great—their social condition happy. Yet, is this the fact? Are they who toil so incessantly—whose labors produce so much—are they even fed, clothed, sheltered from the storm, themselves, or families? Have they hope, for the future, of relief this side the grave? No! one half of the entire nation—I speak it not from rumor, but upon the authority of British statistics—one half of the entire nation are reduced to absolute pauperism. One fourth dependent, through the year, on the pauper fund alone for support; another, fed occasionally from it, whenever they are brought, as often they are, to the alternative of charity or death. And why this misery, this degradation, of the most laborious people ever known? Why this suffering of the mass, whilst the Government and the ruling orders are notoriously the richest in the world? But, is the evil temporary? will it soon pass away? did it arise from natural or from fortuitous causes—from a dearth—the failure of a crop, or the ravages of a pestilence? Never!—the cause and the misery are alike human and permanent.

The Government—Parliament with its omnipotence—its limitless power of taxation: there is the source—there alone—of all those wrongs and agonies. It is this power, acting unrestrained, through the double agency of Parliament and the bank, by which Government and its appended orders, the aristocracy, church, army and navy, fund-holders and bankers, daily take from the laboring millions every dollar they earn; leaving not even an adequate subsistence. And when thus all is taken—when death itself threatens to stop the future income of Government by the starvation of the laborer—then, but not until then, is enough returned, as a public charity, to keep him alive.

But if, sir, one half of the nation be powerless paupers, the Government (and by that, I mean not the Throne and Parliament only, but them with their appended orders,) are the mightiest on earth. Nor is it wonderful that such a Government, thus armed with the whole earnings of its people, should have been able to expend five hundred millions of treasure to retain these States as colonies; six thousand millions to restore hereditary monarchy in France—should now be able to interfere in the affairs of all nations; to hold, by its navy, mankind in awe; to subsidize, with its capital, half the thrones of Europe. No wonder that such a Government, the natural enemy of ours—yes, sir, I say the natural enemy, regardless of the Federal cant so often heard about “our affinity of interests with the mother country;” regardless of the studied efforts daily made to justify here every abuse, usurpation, corruption, and fraud upon the authority of British example; no wonder that such a Government, with a view to its great object of our humiliation and ruin, should have violated our territory, fired our vessels, murdered our citizens; and, by its stocks, its corporations, its capital, and its mercenaries among us, should have deranged our affairs, reduced our prices, distressed our people, and forced thousands to cry out for relief, and seek it in the expulsion from our councils of those who dared to resist British domination. No, sir; nor is it wonderful that now, when these things are done, England's bankers should demand a mortgage on American soil, or that men should be found here ready to give it. Yes, to give it; because “the Federal Government (says the Senator from Massachusetts) is bound to uphold the credit of the States.” And how? By the payment or assumption of their debts. There is no other way. But even this is insufficient. For the Government, to uphold their credit, must guaranty, likewise, all debts the States may in future contract, or assume the power to restrain them from contracting any more. If it can do the latter, then are the States made powerless, and brought in subjection to its will. If it cannot restrain them, and yet is bound to uphold their credit, then must it tax the people as much as the States desire to spend; whilst thus they are induced to spend as much as they can. For if this Government be bound to pay their present debts, so is it their future; if one class of debts, then equally all; if bound to pay those incurred for internal improvements or for banking capital, as were most of these now contracted, it is bound also, and for the same reason, to defray all the charges of State administration. And where is Congress to find means to satisfy a demand so insatiate? In unbounded, interminable taxation.

In this manner it is proposed to uphold State credit; and this is called a favor to the States. As if the State and Federal Governments did not both derive their only revenue from the same and only source—the pockets of the same people. But in what does this favor result? Plainly in this: Congress, not the State Legislature, is in future to tax the people of the States for all object of State necessity; and may, for a reason equally good, prescribe, by law, what those objects shall be, when and how to be executed. Thus would the State Governments, having become useless, be virtually abolished, and the people deprived of the very benefits they obtained by the American Revolution—local government, local taxation, imposed by themselves for local objects. For the Federal Government is, to the people of a State, in reference to their local affairs, a foreign power; and if, to raise revenue for State expenditure, it assumes the right to tax them, they are taxed without their consent—a condition which no other word than tyranny can describe. But for illustration, I put the case. The people of Ohio, acting through their local Legislature, now judge of their own wants as a State, and tax themselves to meet those wants. If a canal is desired, they determine when, where, how, and by what agency, it shall be executed. If a tax be necessary, they decide in what manner, when, and to what amount, it shall be levied. These questions, so important, are settled by a majority of that people, none others interposing; and in this fact they find the benefits of the State Government. But if, instead of this, Congress, in whose power the people of Ohio have but a limited participation—if Congress, whose action they cannot, therefore, control, should assume to judge for them of their local wants—to tax them for distribution to meet those wants—that is to say, decide for them when and in what part of the State a canal shall be cut, and tax them to defray the charges of the work;—if Congress should act thus, would not that people receive their local laws, and pay local taxes imposed against their consent, by the will of others—as much so as did our fathers of the Colonies before the Revolution? For is it not evident that a people are taxed without their consent, when, as in this case, the disapprobation of a majority cannot prevent it? Nor does the fact that the State is represented in Congress affect the principle, so long as the tax and objects are local.

This illustration would seem sufficient; yet I will push it still farther. The people of Ohio owe a debt; and, to pay it, propose to tax themselves, at their own time, in their own way, to the amount of a million, through their own Legislature. Congress comes forth, and says to them, Keep your money; I will give you enough to discharge your obligation. The people reply by asking, Where will you get it? Congress answers, I will give you the million I have just received from the sale of my lands. The people then ask, If you give us that million, will you not yourself want another, to discharge your own obligations; and, if so, where will you get that other? Congress replies, Yes, that is true; and I shall indeed be compelled to tax you for this last million, before I can agree to give you the first. The people answer, If that be the case, what make we by it? You give us one million, we give you another; and we, moreover, have to pay you the costs of collection. Better, then, that we should keep our own million and pay our own debt; for what you propose is nothing more than to tax us a million to pay it, if, in addition to this, we will reward your trouble. Congress replies, That is even so; I am aware I must first take the million from you, by taxation, before I can return it in the way of distribution; but still, you had better submit to this, than to tax yourselves for the payment of the debt; because, when taxed by yourselves, you know it; the tax is paid directly, and each man sees what he pays; but when I tax you, though you pay even more, you do not exactly see the process: as you pay to me, not through the collector, but the merchant, in the increased price of every thing you buy; and this I call my indirect tax or tariff duty, which the merchant had, in the first place, to pay, when he purchased the goods at New York. To this the people answer, It is not the manner of paying, but the payment itself, which takes money from our pockets; and your reasons are, therefore, insufficient. Congress again replies, That, likewise, is true; but the fact is, you, the people of Ohio, owe the British bankers a debt, and will not, I fear, tax yourselves to pay it; and I wish to compel the payment, by myself taxing you for that purpose. The people rejoice by saying to Congress, You came here at first offering us money as a favor, in the name of distribution, to pay our debt; you have ended with an impeachment of our integrity; with an attempt to usurp the power of State taxation; with an impertinent interference in our affairs; therefore, depart.

Thus are the forms of indirect taxation and the name of the public domain sought to be made the means through which this Government may assume absolute power over the States and the people—over the whole property and labor of the country.

And who are to receive the fund distributed? Not the people, who, in the first place, paid it; but the States—the Legislatures of the States. In what would this result? Extravagance and waste. Not, indeed, because legislative bodies are (for they are not) likely to be composed of men less virtuous than others, but because no body of men, however honorable individually, ever could, or ever can, with safety, be charged with the conduct of public affairs, in the absence of all responsibility. It was for this reason, drawn from the calamitous experience of the world, that the serious, the thoughtful, the cautious people of America imposed upon all the departments of power, as well as upon each public functionary, the most positive restraints and highest sanctions, by their written organic laws. The great, the only security the people of a State now have for the economy of its Legislature in the expenditure of the public money, is the responsibility under which the Legislature acts, of having itself, first to tax its own constituency, in order to raise it. But, by the system of distribution, the responsibility of collecting revenue is to be separated from the power to apply it; Congress is to tax the people, the Legislature to expend the tax. Each member of the latter body, aware, therefore, as he would be, that, when the State Treasury was exhausted, Congress, not he, must bear the odium of laying a new tax to replenish it, would very naturally seek to obtain for all objects in his particular district or county the largest appropriations possible; considering, as he would, every dollar thus obtained a clear gain, to that extent, out of the common spoil. In this manner, the very desire now so strong with the representative, and justly so, to please his immediate constituents by his economy of the public money, would then become a reason equally strong for its profligate waste. Where, in such a case, would be the limit to expenditure?—where to taxation necessary to meet it? Nowhere, until Government had consumed the whole substance of the toiling multitude, and left them here, as in England, clad in the ragged livery of pauperism—breadless and hopeless.

Sir, I have already said that the money, if distributed, will go not to the people who, in the first instance, paid it. Again, I have said that in all Governments professing to be free, this power of unlimited taxation ever has divided the mass into classes of the rich and the poor, and upon such division founded separate orders in the State—the one, who govern and riot; the other, who toil and obey. Such always will be found to be the result. The process which leads to it is plain. The aggregate fund in the hands of Government is made up of contributions by every citizen. In the application of it, therefore, or its benefits, justice requires that each should receive a proportion equal to that he advanced. But in this case? Never; nor ever can it be. It is one of the evils in the best of Governments, that equality in the distribution of burdens and benefits is found utterly impracticable. And, sir, it is for this very reason, more than for all others together, that taxation and expenditure should be strictly limited. For, in every tax, some are made thus to pay unrequited tribute to others. The wrong increases with each additional assessment, until finally, if continued, it breaks the equilibrium of society. The favored class rises to wealth by the very cause that depresses the unfortunate. Each day separates them more widely from one another; and the former, drawing still nearer to the Government whilst the latter is sinking beneath it, becomes, in the end, the Government itself—a ruling order, based upon and sustained by the pillage of the multitude.

What with us has been the fact, and what its results, in the very first instance of distribution? To all it is known that 28 101,614 dollars, then called its surplus revenue, were, in the year 1837, distributed by this Government, in the name of a deposit with the States. Where went that money? To the people? to the men by whom it had been advanced? No; not the fifth dollar of it; but to the Legislatures first; and then, chiefly, to banking or to other corporate companies, and to the rich, for the very reason and they were so.

And now, that I may the more clearly expose this—the flagrant injustice inflicted by the practical operation of the distribution principle upon the tax paying mass of the people—I shall trace briefly, yet with all the accuracy of which a matter so confused and complicated admits, the progress of this surplus fund, from the National Treasury to its last known destination. But here, before proceeding further, it is important to remark, that I speak in reference only to the $25,234,131 received by the twenty out of the twenty-six States, by which alone reports have been made to this Government; the other six to whom $2,867,512 were distributed, having made no returns. So is it likewise material to observe, that fractions are, in all instances, discarded; because anxious to prevent merely the general truth, I desire not to obscure it by immaterial particulars.

In the first place, then, out of the last installment, paid as it was in the notes of suspended banks, (worth on average, at the time, but about ninety cents in the dollar,) those institutions thus manifestly gained, without an equivalent, near one million of dollars. To this, and next, in order are to be added $3,554,000, which inured to the benefit of the banks, in the form of loans made to stock invested, and depositors made, in them. Then, as recipients of this fund, come the private companies, incorporated mainly with a view to internal improvements, and to whom $969,000 went as stock and loans. And finally, of the total sum, $10,033,000 were distributed to the town and counties of the States, to be loaned by them (as was generally the fact) to banks, to other corporations, and to the wealthy few among the citizens who were able to pledge property for its payment.

Thus, from an analysis of the reports made by twenty of the States, does it incontrovertibly appear, that, of the twenty-five million two hundred and thirty-four thousand dollars, drawn first by the taxing power of this Government from the whole body of the people, twenty million five hundred and fifty-six thousand inured, in its distribution, to the benefit of the banking and other chartered associations, and to the favored few—not the needy, but the rich—in the towns and counties; whilst, on the other hand, but about five millions (one-fifth of the great aggregate) was applied to public works undertaken by the States—to the payment of their debts and their current expenditure—the only form in which the people could feel the benefit in the reduction of their taxes.

Here, then, is an example of the wrongs already committed on the mass of the nation, by this Government's abuse of the taxing power; for from this abuse it was that the act of distribution resulted. I speak not, therefore, harshly of the act itself; first, because it was a consequence rather than the prime source of the evil; and again, for the reason that there are some among my own political friends, who, thinking to disengage the Government from the embarrassments the surplus occasioned, gave the act their support. On them, whatever may now be thought of the policy of their course in this particular, I would inflict no wound—none certainly on them, whilst there are yet, on the other side of the Senate, those, our common enemies, who, responsible for the primeval sin, are therefore the rightful subjects of complaint. No; I censure not friends supposed to have erred, when there are foes known to have done so. "Pursue the strangers, but spare the Romans," was the just injunction at the rout of Pharsalia; an injunction it were well to remember in all the conflicts of men.

After this example—the first in our history—who can doubt the certain tendency of distribution? Who can doubt that, if renewed, this policy will eventuate, as before declared, in the formation of classes among us—in the establishment of orders—in the concentration of all power in this Government—and, finally, in the transfer of the Government itself to the hands of a moneyed aristocracy? What have we already witnessed? Have we not seen these banks, these corporations—every one of them, of every description, to which the revenue distributed went—have we not seen the favored few, almost to a man, by whom so large a portion was received—have we not seen all these, banks, corporations, and men united, combined, enfranchised against the Democratic party—and that, too, for the very reason, openly proclaimed, that it opposes this iniquitous system of taxation for their benefit alone? Have we not seen the same institutions, the same persons, and the same associations of persons, banded together in a common league with the very men who, in the legislative halls of the States—in the halls of Congress—in the Executive and Judicial Departments, State and Federal—in all the subdivisions of political power, now stand forward the relentless advocates of taxes and distributions? Yes; the very men who, whilst they tell us the Treasury is exhausted—the blood dried up—still furiously clamor for the last dollar—for the last drop. And why? To satiate the maw of an ally, who has conferred dominion upon them.

At first, sir, the object of distribution was disguised; but now, victorious as they are, it is openly proclaimed. The Senator from Massachusetts, no longer concealing the real motive, declares that he presses the distribution of the revenue among the States, in view of its application to the payment of their debts; and for this he finds constitutional authority, in the obligation of this Government to uphold the credit of the States, which, he informs us, has been rudely assailed. And here, sir, it was, at this point of his argument, that the Senator broke forth in the bitterest denunciation of those by whom he alleges this assault to have been made. But who are they? In what manner, when, where, by what means, have they assailed the credit of the States? Will it be believed (and yet it is true) that it was the Democracy to whom he alluded? He adverted, first, to extracts in a British paper, taken from the Globe of this city, styled by him the organ of the Administration. Next, having referred to measures with which he knew the Democratic members of this body to have been associated, he pronounced these things an attack upon State credit; and then declared that "the man who would impair the State credit is an enemy to America, by whatever name he may call himself." What, sir!

the Democracy assail the credit of the States! the Democracy enemies to America! they who, on all occasions, have ever defended, most zealously, the rights of the States, the liberties of the people, the interests, honor, and glory of America; who have defended all these, whether endangered from abroad or within; whether by treasonable machinations, or open war; they who, in the hour of their country's utmost need—when periled by foreign arms and domestic treason, were, of all her sons, the first to come forward—the first to proffer their counsel, their substance, their blood, in her defence—the most cheerful to die; they who now, in the pending struggle, again swear, as they ever have sworn, upon the altar of that country, unsparing hostility to tyranny in all its forms—to every league into which ambition and avarice may enter, for usurpation and pillage. Are these the men, this the party, who are thus denounced—denounced as enemies to America, because, in this trying crisis of the Government, when all the humors that commonly conspire to bring liberty to its death bed are manifesting themselves around us—because, I say, they dare, in such a crisis as this, to oppose what they solemnly believe infracts the Constitution, blows out the States, hazards the public peace, and tends infallibly to sheer over the land the baleful influence of a foreign power; because they dare oppose a system of measures which threatens to fire the passions of men to fury and madness, by placing all property in the hands of Government as a prize, to be sought by fraud and violence, and obtained amidst the turmoil of a general strife, only by the most daring and profligate? Are these the citizens denounced for opposing such measures, as enemies to America? Yes, this is the imputation—indirect, it is true, but still the imputation—made by that Senator, made with feelings transported beyond all bounds, as if, whilst struggling thus to mortgage to British bankers the soil of his native country, his allegiance had been inflamed anew by a glance at that signal which, at the dawn of battle, first rose on the terrible day of Trafalgar—"England expects every man to do his duty." Yes, sir, I repeat it—feelings transported; for never but once before have I known that Senator excited to an equal heat beyond the uniform temper of his mind. And when was that? Need I tell you, Senators, (most of whom were present,) that it was on the memorable night when, pending the proposition for three millions to defend the country in the event of a war with France, he stood forward, and in his place, upon this floor, declared he "would vote it not, even if the enemy were battering down the walls of the Capitol"—a declaration in reference to which a member of the other House, from his own State and of his own party, [Hon. J. Q. ADAMS,] proclaimed in that body, "that the man who would utter such a sentiment as that, had but one more step to take, and that was—into the ranks of the enemy."

Sir, to support its own credit, will require all the resources placed by the Constitution at the disposal of this Government. With that of the States it has no right to interfere, for good or for evil. For, if it can with the one object, so it may for the other—if to uphold, so may it destroy—if to take the States under its guardianship, in like manner may it reduce them to dependence upon its will—to dependence not merely for supplies, but for their very political being; for the former essentially involves the latter.

But, sir, if the Federal Government had the right and the means of interposing to sustain State credit, it could not by possibility do so, without the utter destruction of that credit, or of the State Governments themselves. For, if you commence and continue to pay the debts of the States, the States will continue to contract them, as their sole source of supply; and that for the reason that you, by strengthening their credit for the time, enable them to do so; and because you, not they, are to endure the burden of payment. Thus, in that event, will you supplant the State Governments, by rendering them palpably useless, except as affording a pretext for unlimited taxation by you, to meet demands created by them. And if, upon the other hand, after having commenced the payment, and thereby stimulated the States to new indebtedness—thrown them from their guard—directed their attention from all means within themselves to discharge obligations—if, then, you discontinue that payment, do you not destroy their credit? What, indeed, sir, is the proposition now made, of distribution to pay State debts, but an assault upon their credit? On what assumption does it rest, but the insolvency or dereliction of the States? For, if they can and will pay, wherefore do you interpose? Will not the same amount be required, whoever pays? and must not the funds be drawn from the same source—the pockets of the same people? These questions, obvious as they are, are not more so than the fact, that the answers to all resolve themselves into this: that the Federal Government, seeing the States indebted to British bankers, deems them insolvent, or capable of a breach of faith; and therefore, taking upon itself the agency of those bankers, it assumes to displace the State Legislatures as the taxing power for State purposes, and to coerce the States into payment, by itself taxing their people for that object.

And now, sir, having thus far sought, by reasoning, to illustrate the effects of distribution upon the credit of the States, I advert to the twenty-eight millions deposited with them in 1837, as a matter of experience, which anticipates all argument. Then were the States less indebted, their credit better than now. And why so? Because the deposit, though it became itself a debt due from the States, nevertheless stimulated them to yet greater indebtedness, whilst, on the contrary, you deposited no more. Nor, sir, was the deposit applied, in any proportion, to the discharge of any debts whatever—and that for the reasons I have already given, and which must forever exist, so long as one power levies, another expends, and both are free from restraint.

As to the new tax proposed to be laid, for distribution, upon the wines and silks now annually exchanged by France with us for cotton, to the amount of twenty millions of dollars, it must, I have said, fall chiefly on the people of the South and West. And why chiefly upon them? Because a tax upon those articles, they being luxuries, must, if sufficiently high to produce the expected revenue, result in their exclusion from this country, and by consequence the exclusion of our cotton from France; because that exclusion of our cotton must, by restricting thus the foreign market, reduce, in a corresponding proportion, first the price, and then the quantity raised in the South; because such reduction in the quantity of cotton must reduce, to that extent, the quantity of labor now engaged in its culture, and increase the products of grains and meats in the South, by the transfer of labor from cotton to them; because that transfer of labor, and increase of grains and meats, produced in the cotton region, must diminish in that proportion the demand there for the grains and meats of the Northwestern States—Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, and others; because such decreased demand must diminish proportionately the price of these Northwestern products, grains, and meats; and because, finally, that diminution of price must fall a dead tax upon the people who raise those products.

England, however, and England alone, would be benefited by this process; and benefited doubly and trebly would she be—benefited in exact proportion to the injury sustained by us: for as she, with the exception of France, now affords our only market for cotton, if the ports of the latter be thus closed against us, then must she enjoy an exclusive traffic in the article, and thereby power absolute over its price.

Well, therefore, might England and England's bankers desire the promotion of those to authority among us, by whom these measures are proposed. For what benefits, should such measures prevail, has she not a right to expect? What evils—what dangers to our country—to its independence and liberty, have we not reason to apprehend? With a monopoly of half our exports; with a mortgage on our whole public domain; with near three hundred millions of stock, State and corporate, invested in our country; with British agents, mercantile and otherwise, innumerable in our importing cities; with a language, a commerce, a kindred, a literature, and a common law, each a medium of her influence upon us; with her habits and manners, her tastes and fashions, already visible throughout our Atlantic frontier; with provinces and armies on our borders; with questions pending most threatening to the peace of the nations; with a natural hostility to the forms of a Government whose example endangers her own; with her military resources, and armaments, vast as they are, on land and sea; with these, and all these means of action and motives to act, what has she not a reason to hope, and we to fear, if, at any time hereafter, a party, however small, should be found in our midst, willing to second her views of ambition?

Already is England deeply interested, through the stocks of her bankers, in our State legislation. Already has she inducements to interpose in our affairs. But great as her interests are, and strong her motives, both will increase a hundred fold should the proposed measures prevail. Should this Government blend its legislation with that of the States, and thus, as the national power, afford a pretext for making the security of this British capital a question of peace or war, then will British influence be felt in all its energy; then will it enter, not as heretofore, slyly and incidentally, into our political struggles, but with system, openly, and as a matter of pretended right; then will it pervade our public councils, form the basis of a British faction among us, and eventually stamp the impress of England upon American legislation. And, sir, who can doubt—who that acknowledges any allegiance to truth dares to doubt, that the influence of England has been felt—deeply and dangerously felt—in producing that state of things which brings these measures now before us? What British steamer, for the last three years, has struck your shore, whose shock did not vibrate throughout the land? When did the Bank of England speak to the commercial world, that your paper system did not quiver in all its fibres? When did your banks suspend—when contract or inflate the currency—when did they either of these, without finding in England a reason for their conduct? Never. And think you that a nation so vigilant of her interest as the British—so ambitious of domination—so deadly hostile to this people, to liberty here and the world over—so prone to interpose in the affairs of all others—with motives so strong, and means so adequate, to aid in the change of our councils—think you that she stood indifferent to the recent contest, when, through the agency of her stocks, the machinery of the paper system, through the curtailment of our currency, the reduction of our prices, the consequent distress and discontent of the people, she could affect that contest, and secure the triumph of her measures? No. Impossible. England takes care of England's interests, wherever they may be; nor will she ever want friends where those interests require them.

But stop! The Senator from Massachusetts, indignant as when, but a moment before, he imputed to others the crime of being enemies to America, exclaims, "I am tired of hearing this British influence talked of." Indeed! And wherefore tired? Has not that sound been long familiar to him? Heard he not those words during our recent war with England? when that England, forgetful of our common origin, regardless of all the dictates of humanity and justice, of religion and of honor—regardless of the rights of civilization itself—employed the hereditary vengeance of the Indian tribes against our people; employed the hatchet of indiscriminate massacre, not only in the field of battle, but in the slaughter, upon their farms, of the unoffending citizens of the frontier—men and women, old and young—sparing not even the poor little children? Heard he not then those words, when, in the solitude of the wilderness, remote from all succor, the Western settler, returning with the coming night to his lonely cabin, might find that cabin wrapped in fire; might see by its blaze the furious features of the brawny savage as he raised himself up from his deed of death, holding in one hand the bleeding scalp, and, with a wild and horrid glee, brandishing with the other the reeking tomahawk over the cloven brain of the wife; whilst the infant, yet alive, clung for protection to the mangled corpse of its mother, and turned a mercy-imploping eye upon her murderer;—heard not that Senator of British influence then? And if not, where was he? Where, in that day of his country's danger, when with her borders in flames, her Capitol in ashes, her energies strung to their utmost tension, she stretched forth her hands, and, with a parent's voice, demanded the aid, the counsel, and courage of all her sons;—where in that day, was the man who now, when England's interests are involved, denounces Democrats as public enemies, for refusing obedience to a British edict? Where then was he? Did he respond to that call of his country? or did he scoff at her calamities, and, utterly insensible to the sufferings of his fellow-citizens from conflagration and massacre, did he, as a member of the other House, answer their cries for aid, by refusing even bread and clothing to the troops marching to their relief—marching to put out the fires, and to save the victims? I ask these questions, and I appeal to the journals of Congress—yes, to this whole nation—to answer.

Recent occurrences, Mr. President, have thrown a dark pall over the face of the land. Causes, innumerable, each in its way threatening the public freedom, have collected about us. To those preinclined to despondency, the future presents, therefore, a dreary and a dismal prospect. But to the high-hearted, untiring Democracy, there is nothing in that future to excite terror or despair, for, united in purpose and in action, and roused by the great object of a nation's deliverance, such a party cannot be withstood in a cause so just and glorious. Courage, then, my friends; let us draw fresh courage from the very presence and magnitude of the danger; and with confidence unabated in the general body of the people, let us rally in one great effort to the coming strife. Then will the league of ambition and avarice, now formed against us; be speedily broken; then will the Constitution be restored to life, law to its dominion, truth to its authority, and justice to its rights. No; let none despair. The source of all power and of all hope—the heart of the nation—is still sound to the core; still are the forms of the Government left; and still, over our infant liberty, the guardian star keeps watch in the sky. Long may it yet elude the search of the tyrant; and if, in after days, when grown to maturity, the high priests and money-changers shall conspire to bring it to the cross, there, even there, in pity and in mercy to poor human nature, will it, amid the last agony, invoke, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do."

REMARKS OF MR. SMITH,

OF INDIANA,

In the House of Representatives, February 25, 1841—

On the navy appropriation bill; the question pending being on the motion of Mr. SALTONSTALL to augment the appropriation "for the increase, repair, armament, and equipment of the navy, and wear and tear of vessels in commission," from $1,425,000 to $2,000,000.

Mr. SMITH, after some preliminary remarks, in which he said he should trespass but a short time on the patience of the committee, expressed his intention to vote against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SALTONSTALL.]

Mr. S. then referred to the previous speeches in favor of the amendment, and commented with some severity on the inconsistencies of certain gentlemen in attempting to explain away their past scruples about "extravagance," &c. Those gentlemen after having, for the last few years, raised an incessant clamor about "retrenchment and reform," now appeared willing to act upon the very system they had been so vehemently condemning. But, in order to escape the conclusion which must necessarily be drawn upon their strange conduct, they veered round and now asserted that they did really want reform; but a reform, not of money, but of principle. Now, what was to be made of this? Could there be a reform of principle without a reform of money? Could gentlemen be said to have reformed in principle, when, at the same time, they were advocating the most extravagant appropriations? The idea was preposterous. It was a distinction without a difference, and the weak and miserable attempt at excuse would be properly appreciated by the public mind.

Mr. S. then proceeded to notice the aspersions cast upon the Secretary of the Navy, whom some gentleman had sneered at as a mere "novel writer," and had asked what could be expected from such a person. In answer to this, Mr. S. said he would as soon trust the affairs of the Navy in the hands of a "novel writer," as to a man who had been immured all his life in a law library. (Mr. S. here, the Reporter presumes, had reference to the future Secretary, Mr. Badger.)

Mr. S. repeated that he considered it his imperative duty to vote against the amendment, inasmuch as it asked an increase of the appropriation much beyond that which had been recommended by those whose peculiar duty it was to attend to the interests of the Navy, and who had it under their especial charge. Mr. S. contended that it was to be presumed that those who had the subject under their especial charge, ought to know best what amount of money was required.

After some further remarks on the above head, Mr. S. said it would be impossible for gentlemen to carry out their promised system of reform unless they commence by cutting down all unnecessary appropriations.

My colleague (said Mr. S.) has said that he did not complain so much about the amount of money expended by the present Administration, as the manner in which it had been expended. Now, he (Mr. S.) was unable to comprehend the distinction.

Mr. S. next proceeded to notice the strange inconsistency of the Opposition, in first raising a storm about the amount of money which had been expended by the present Administration, and then in the same breath proposing to run up the expenditures of the coming administration to five times the amount.

The mover of the amendment [Mr. SALTONSTALL] had pursued a most extraordinary course, for, but a short time ago, he had been sending documents through the land, complaining of the extravagance of the Administration, and now he had been declaiming against the same Administration for "mean parsimony."

Mr. S. then went on to show that the charges of gentlemen that the navy had been neglected, was without the least foundation. So far from the interests of that branch of the public service having been neglected, it must be obvious to all who would take the trouble to examine the documents, that the navy had been materially increased during the last few years. He then showed the great amount of money that had been appropriated for that branch of the service, and was surprised that gentlemen should make such charges as they had. He sincerely hoped that they would, in future, take the trouble to examine the documents to see what had really been done, before they proceeded to make charges so utterly devoid of foundation.

Those who had this particular object under their control were, it must be admitted, most likely to know what was really wanted.

But Mr. S. proceeded to say that the Navy Board, like every other body who had a particular branch under their care, were apt to think that on that particular branch alone depended entirely the interests of the country. This was very natural, but it was the duty of Congress to supervise the estimates, and, when needed, cut down the appropriations recommended.

In saying this, however, he (Mr. S.) wished to be understood as being willing for ample appropriations for the navy, although he would not vote for an extravagant appropriation.

Mr. S. in referring to the feelings of Western people on this subject, said he did not pretend to be an exponent of Western feeling, but still he thought he had carried out the principles on which he was elected. But, (said Mr. S.) my colleague [Mr. PROFFIT] was elected as a "reformer." But, let our actions and our votes on this floor show who has been the real reformer. The people of the West expected that the appropriations ought to be cut down, and that, in their opinion, was reform.

Mr. S. next proceeded to notice the fortification bill reported by Mr. WADDY THOMPSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs. That gentleman (said Mr. S.) has introduced a bill involving an amount of two and a half millions, and yet he claims to be a reformer! He reads us a homily about fortifications at the South, on the Gulf of Mexico, etc. He tells us a story that the cities of New York, Philadelphia, New Orleans, and other great commercial cities, might be destroyed, or laid under contribution by an enemy, in our present defenceless state. But he would ask the gentleman how we managed at the last war, when we were much weaker than we were at present—when our resources were not to be compared with those we now possessed; and yet we defended New Orleans, without any such fortifications as the gentleman deemed necessary. The gentleman would bear in mind that the patriotic sons of the West, with a few cotton bags, gallantly repulsed the enemy, and carried death and destruction into their ranks. It was done then; and if the same patriotism now glowed in the bosoms of the people of the West, it could be done again.

Mr. S. went on to say, that he was apprehensive that gentlemen did not present their real reasons for asking such large appropriations. There was something behind the curtain—some movement which was calculated to be kept from the public eye. So, in order to get the people to do that which they would never do voluntarily, this cry about the defenceless state of the country was raised, as a pretext for getting appropriations. The only way to reform, was to cut down, instead of increasing, the appropriations. But gentlemen said they were about to reform on principle. That was rather a strange assertion, to reform on principle, without reforming in their expenditures. He wished some gentleman would be kind enough to give a definition of what was meant by a reform of principle, and a reform of money. How were they to reform on principle, without reforming in money?

Mr. S. then alluded to the favorite measures which the friends of the coming Administration desired to carry, such as a high tariff, a National Bank, &c. He intimated that the people, under the present feeling of exultation and excitement, might easily be led to rally round any popular leader, around whom they would freely rush for the carrying of any system of "reform" he might think proper to recommend. The people, at the present moment, did not stop to reason, but were under the influence of a high excitement. The fact was, that now enthusiasm had got the better of reason. But when the people should have time to reflect calmly, they would not so easily be brought to support the schemes now desired. When the people should have time to look around them, after the waves of political excitement should have subsided, then reason, and not passion, would rule. But gentlemen were afraid to wait until that time. They must seize the present moment, or they knew they would have no hope.

After some further remarks, Mr. S. contended that he would prefer the estimates of the committee to those of the gentlemen who had advocated an increase of the appropriation.

But (said Mr. S.) I have another reason, though I do not rely upon that, for voting against the amendment. By keeping down the expenditures, it would prevent the necessity of calling an extra session. If the appropriations were kept within proper bounds, there would then exist no reason for a called session; and he presumed that, under such circumstances, the coming Administration would not dare to commit so flagrant an act as to call an extra session, unless, in the event of an "extraordinary occasion," such as foreign war, &c.

Mr. S. concluded by saying that he would vote for the bill as presented by the committee, unless stronger reasons should be urged in favor of the amendment.

REMARKS OF MR. SMITH OF INDIANA, On Friday evening, the 26th of February, 1841, pending the same amendment.

After Mr. WICK sat down, Mr. PROFFIT obtained the floor, and, at considerable length, gave his views in favor of the amendment to the Navy Appropriation bill, and in reply to Mr. WICK, and to the speech of Mr. SMITH made a few days before on the same bill. Mr. PROFFIT spoke of the position of Mr. WICK, but regretted that he did not see him in his place. He said he was informed that his colleague (Mr. WICK) had made statements denying what he had said of that gentleman's position on a former occasion; if so, he stood ready to prove it in half an hour. He regretted, he said, to see he was not in his place, but he hoped, if he had any colleague that heard him, he would answer.

Mr. SMITH rose and said, he would not undertake to speak or explain for his colleague, (Mr. WICK,) who was so able to speak for himself, but he would repeat what he did say, as he understood him. He said "that it was true that once he did support Mr. Clay; but when Mr. Van Buren was elected President, he supported him; and at the time of his election to Congress, it was well understood and fully known to his constituents."

Mr. PROFFIT proceeded and said, let his colleagues go home and tell the people of Indiana, whose districts are against them 1,500, 2,000, and thousands, that they have been deluded by coonskins, log-cabins, etc. and he ventured the return from that State would return 0—pretty much what it is now.

Mr. SMITH arose and demanded of Mr. P. to locate his remarks, and state which of his colleagues had ever, in debate, used the words "coonskins" or "log cabin," or in any way impugned the intelligence of the people. He said he had not even heard such remarks.

Mr. PROFFIT replied that General Howard had. Mr. SMITH remarked (sitting down) it was not brave to fight the dead or absent.

Mr. PROFFIT, after some other remarks mainly addressed to Mr. S. took his seat.

Mr. SMITH arose to reply amidst loud cries for the question.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON gave notice that he would enforce the rule, and require gentlemen to keep to the question.

Mr. SMITH appealed to the magnanimity of the House, whether they would enforce the rule upon him, and cut him off from a reply to the remarks made by his colleague—made at broadcast—impugning himself and his colleagues. He did not apprehend that such a course would be taken.

[Cries of "no, no! go on! go on!" from all quarters.]

Mr. S. said he did not propose to be tedious; and that it should not be thought that his remarks were totally irrelevant, he would say as much about the amendment as any gentleman had said, and that he would say in a very few words; and that was, he was opposed to it, and should vote against it.

Mr. S. said, that in the remarks he made a few days ago, he did refer to his colleague, [Mr. PROFFIT,] but regretted that he was not in his place. His reference was very brief on that account; but what he said then, he would recapitulate now. That was, that he did not think his colleague was a correct exponent of public sentiment for the West, when he stated that he would vote the amendment, two millions or five millions for the navy, or that he would be willing to see the public domain pledged, exclusively for the benefit of the navy. Mr. S. said he knew that the people of the West felt a deep and patriotic interest in the navy. But they were not willing to have its whole weight saddled on them. His opinion was, they were willing to contribute their due proportion for its improvement and support, and that on fair and equal principles, and no more. He might mistake public sentiment, but this was his opinion; and further, said Mr. S. I am opposed to the idea of building up and supporting a navy in time of peace equal to the contingency of war. Such a policy would be suicidal, and calculated to eat out the substance of the people. But my colleague may be right, and I wrong; but I trust this issue to the people. He says he always was opposed to this narrow, contracted policy. He said in the Legislature, when it was unpopular to speak of distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public land, he had taken bold ground in favor of it, and introduced resolutions on that subject; when graduation, pre-emption, reduction, and cession was the humbug cry, he always was opposed to narrow policy; he had a contempt for it. It was true, Mr. SMITH said, that himself and colleague, in the Legislature of their State, were regarded as very opposite in politics. His colleague was then for profuse expenditure; and he was regarded as a rigid economist. He said he was sent here as a friend of the present Administration, and his colleague came up as a mighty reformer and economizer; but, though measures were changed, practices were not. Notwithstanding the professions of his colleague, Mr. S. ventured to assert that, if their votes were compared in Congress, his colleague had voted to appropriate millions more than he had. Sir, said Mr. S. I have been with my colleague in all his efforts at boastful reform. I voted with him last year to reduce the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions from $3,000 down to $2,500. I was prepared to go any length with him in reform, and knew I should not hazard much. But, to my mortification, he comes out this year, disclaims that act, and says it is the only bad act he has done since here. In his disclaimer he includes me in his crimes, if it be one; but, I can bear it. I differ with him in the opinion that it is the only bad act; I incline to think it is the only good act, and I am glad to share his good deeds, and avoid the bad. But I must confess, said Mr. S. I was somewhat astonished when my colleague made the motion to reduce that officer's salary, well recollecting, in our State Legislature, that that gentleman sustained and supported the payment of a salary much higher to our Chief Engineer—a salary in proportion to our revenues, about equal to the sum total necessary for the support of the navy of the United States as compared with the revenues of the United States. Our revenues at that time was about $60,000, wrung from the hard earning of the people by taxation, and the revenues of the Union not less than $40,000,000. Sir, said Mr. S. the change from extravagance to economy in my friend is in sound, not in substance.

Mr. PROFFER stated the gentleman (Mr. S.) might write out speeches at his leisure, &c.

Mr. S. replied that he was not in the habit of writing out speeches; he never had written out one, and he was very careless that the people knew what he did say. He did not write, speak, nor act for immortality, politically, but he was desirous, by his votes and deportment, to represent his friends fairly, and that he would do so no man knew better than his colleague. It was known to his colleague that he never was known to recede an opinion for popular favor, and he never would. Mr. S. said it was easy to say bold things and speak big words—large words were as easily spoken as small ones—but it required force of character to stand out against the storm. If my colleague insinuates that I was not fully understood, at the time of my election, by the people, I feel bound to repel it, for the credit of my honorable competitor, the Hon. Geo. H. DUNN. I know, to name him, many will recognize him and recollect him as a man of talents. Sir, his ability will not be disputed. Then, sir, surely if I failed, as perhaps I did, to make the people understand the question of the Sub-Treasury, it is not complimentary to him, that he failed too as he attempted to point out its deformity, in seventy-five set speeches in the district, before the election. Sir, on no subject did the people of my district act more with their eyes open, than on that occasion. But, my colleague says, he teaches his people. [Here Mr. S. turned round as to afford Mr. P. an opportunity to explain the expression, "teach his people."] I do not teach mine; they teach me. If they were passive enough to abide my teaching, they might assent to all I do; but that is not their character. They profess to know for themselves; and if they are not pleased with me, they will teach me to stay at home, as they have the power and right to do.

My colleague (said Mr. S.) speaks in tones of triumph of certain defeat of all his Democratic colleagues. How magnanimous this is I will leave for others to judge. True it is, there appear to be large majorities against us, and it is very probable that we may not be able to roll back the tide of public opinion, all may be defeated, and perhaps should be.

My motto is, the people will do right; but I think he is mistaken, when he says the Democratic party is a dead corpse, stinking and offensive, and not worth kicking out of the way. Does he not recollect that, at the late election, Mr. Van Buren got over 50,000 votes, showing a clear majority over the assessed polls of the State? But, sir, this fact aside. The numerical strength of the party should entitle it some respect, and it has power yet to make a considerable stir, especially in the gentleman's own district. But (Mr. S. said) he could not glory in the defeat of any colleague with whom had been associated, and he avowed he entertained nothing but personal good will to any. Mr. S. remarked that he had promised brevity, and the marked attention of the House admonished him of his obligation. He thanked the House heartily, and sat down.

REMARKS OF MR. SMITH OF INDIANA, In the House of Representatives, Wednesday, March 3, 1841.—On the amendment of Mr. GRAVES to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to buy up the individual stock in the Ohio and Portland Canal around the falls of the Ohio river.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he did not rise for the purpose of making a speech on the merits of the proposition of the honorable member from Kentucky, (Mr. GRAVES.) But, on his side of the House, simply to restate the matter contained in the amendment as it was, and as he understood it; and he was satisfied if it was understood it would meet with the entire approbation of the committee. He thought it so reasonable that it would not meet with any serious opposition from any quarter.

Sir, said Mr. S. it simply proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to appropriate the toils accruing on the Government's stock in that work to purchase out the individual stock, at the lowest rate that it can be had, providing that he shall not exceed a certain sum fixed by the law proposed. Mr. S. said this bill did not take any thing from the Treasury. If gentlemen reflected, the oppression of that monopoly on the trade of all the West, and the power of oppression it had over those important interests, he was sure the Congress of the United States would be disposed to take up the individual stock, and make it free, as this amendment contemplates; widen and improve the work to answer the purposes of the great and increasing commerce of that noble river, collecting only sufficient tolls to improve it in a suitable manner for that purpose, and keep it in repair. This much I think the West, and the people identified with this work, have a right to expect. He said he could see no principle that could be brought to bear against it. He hoped it would be adopted.

SPEECH OF MR. LINN,

OF MISSOURI,

In Senate, Wednesday, January 6, 1841.—On the Prospective Pre-emption bill.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky and Mr. WRIGHT, having submitted their views of the subject,

Mr. LINN rose to make a few observations, and to notice some of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] which referred to what he (Mr. LINN) had said, on a former day, in regard to the application of force to carry into effect the prohibitory laws against those who settled on and used the public lands, and for whose benefit pre-emption laws had been passed by Congress from time to time. Mr. L. had then expressed the opinion that it was physically impossible to remove, by force, those who are usually termed "squatters" upon the public domain. He had often expressed that opinion here and elsewhere: it was the settled conviction of his mind. And he now put the question to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] whether he would, were he in the Executive chair of the United States, wield the military power of the Government in an endeavor to dispossess them? He would like to see the man who would avow such an intention. The orders undoubtedly might be issued; but could the officers of the army execute them, even if they would? He apprehended not.

On this subject, it might be well to advert to what had been said, and said so well, by his friend from Arkansas, [Mr. SEVIER,] the other day, of this experiment, when tried only in a very small way. Orders were given to the military, and the officers attempted, nay, did, remove the settlers from what is called Lovely's Purchase, which had been wrenched from the Territory of Arkansas by a treaty with some tribe of Indians within the borders of an old State, and for the benefit and accommodation of that State. The district of country thus severed from the Territory was three hundred miles in length and forty miles wide. The officers had no sooner executed their orders, and turned their backs, than the inhabitants returned to the lands which they claimed. Their houses had been burned; they rebuilt them. Their crops had been cut up and destroyed; they replanted them! They were driven off a second time, and a second time they returned! Thus they persevered until the Government gave up the contest; and finally granted to each family, as an indemnity for their losses, three hundred and twenty acres of land; whilst those who had respected the laws, and quietly quitted their homes, in obedience to the orders of the Government, will receive but one hundred and sixty acres by a bill which passed this house only a few days ago. Now, if the power of the Government could not enforce its prohibitions in the single State of Arkansas, at that time a feeble and dependent territory, how was it likely to succeed through the extended line from Lake Superior to the Sabine river? Before such an operation could even be attempted, you must augment the numbers of your army, for the whole military force of the country, as it now stands, would be totally inadequate to accomplish such an object. The very idea has in it something ludicrous, not to say Quixotic, to those acquainted with the nature of the subject. It would certainly be a most amusing spectacle to behold our gallant and hivalric officers occupied in driving the helpless women and inoffensive children from their homes and habitations, whilst their fathers and husbands were ready, with their rifles, to pour upon them certain destruction from the woods and thickets! The very attempt would lead to their extermination, thereby adducing a new proof that there is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous! The truth is, that the law prohibiting such settlement was practically a dead letter, and must remain so.

In our early history there was no law prohibiting our people from settling where they pleased on the unoccupied public lands. The first law upon that subject was passed in 1807, and seemed to be intended against those who claimed lands under the French and Spanish grants in Louisiana, and the object was to prevent those who had only an inchoate title under such grants from going upon the public domain, and locating and surveying such claims as had not been surveyed; and a most iniquitous law it was. He would speak with respect of the legislation of Congress, but such was his opinion of that law, and he conceived it might easily be proved. He now repeated his assertion, that the attempt to pass any law to restrain the American people from settling on the public lands was worse than useless. Congress might employ itself in passing such edicts as often as it pleased, but it never could have one of them effectually enforced.

As to pre-emption laws, there were now whole districts occupied under them, which would have remained a howling wilderness for years but for the settlers having preceded your surveyors; and it is now an important policy to bring those lands into market. They would yield the Treasury millions of dollars for the benefit of General Harrison's administration; and were it not for our pre-emption laws, these districts would have been but slowly occupied.

The honorable Senator seemed earnestly to deprecate any changes being made in our land system. Sir, that system has been constantly changing from the very beginning. Up to the year 1807, it is believed that there existed no law against trespassing upon the public domain. Antecedent to the year 1820, it was a system of credit, which was, in its effects, a pre-emption law, because it enabled the poor man to take possession of a choice piece of land, on the payment of a few dollars, and allowed him the period of five years to pay up the remainder by instalments, which he could easily accomplish from the produce of his labor. Most certainly it was not for the benefit of these real settlers, and cultivators of the soil, that any change was made in the system, but almost exclusively for those who bought on speculation. In 1820 a change was made to the cash system. In 1814 a partial pre-emption bill passed; and again, in 1829 or 1830, a general pre-emption law was enacted, which altered the system in many particulars. He would regret to see that part of the system changed which regulated the surveys of the public lands. The general principle of pre-emption itself was the original plan of the old thirteen States of the Revolution, which enabled them essentially to battle successfully with the mightiest empire of the world!

This, then, was the original system in regard to our new lands, and a good one it certainly was. Virginia had her pre-emption laws, which extended to Kentucky, at an early period. Much of the lands in Kentucky, situated in the Green river country, sold for a few cents the acre under the headright occupancy, which was no more nor less than a pre-emption law. By the old laws of Pennsylvania, and he believed of most of the other Atlantic States, a mere nominal payment of "a penny" or "a peppercorn," or the girdling of a few trees, or the building of a log cabin, was considered an ample equivalent for the land. The public lands were not then expected to produce any amount of money; that was not the object in view, but to get them settled as speedily as possible; nor would they ever have yielded the Government a single dollar, but for that enterprising line of hardy settlers, who literally buried themselves in the woods and wilds, and preceded what was, now-a-days, falsely called "good society."

When the second line of settlers advanced, they were glad to behold the wilderness already opened for their progress, and some comfortable cabins ready built for their reception. The same system, in substance, though its form might be modified slightly, must still continue to prevail; and he would defy the Government to change it. Much as the American people respected the laws, they would never for one moment submit to have their hardy and enterprising fellow-citizens driven from those lands, which received all their value from their toil, by a band of mercenary soldiers.

Mr. L. hoped that gentlemen from the East and from the South would not so soon forget the circumstances under which their own forefathers had occupied and settled those portions of the Union. He hoped, also, they would not forget the incubus which the legislation of Congress had imposed upon the people of the extreme West, ENTIRELY FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE "OLD STATES," by congregating, upon their borders, a numerous and vindictive body of Indian warriors, whose presence, power, and angry passions, were as a smouldering volcano, ready, at a moment, to burst forth with all its fury, and pour down devastation on the surrounding settlers! The settlers were fully aware of their danger, and were anxious to prepare themselves against it by every means in their power. They desired nothing better than to have their ranks swollen by the tide of emigration, and it mattered little to them from what quarter of the globe it came. It was comparatively indifferent to them whether those who contributed so much to their security were naturalized citizens or not. The moment the foreigner settled by their side, he became a participator in the common danger and privation, and it is well known with what facility the most heterogeneous masses of men are combined and amalgamated into one body, and how soon they become uniform and national when assembled together under similar circumstances.

Many years ago the General Government adopted a system which was weak and unwise, in his (Mr. LINN'S) apprehension, in regard to a portion of the public lands which abounded with lead ore. It certainly was a weak policy, considering the object in view, although its results were different. In the year 1822, or 1823, the Government invited all who chose to come upon that portion of the public land which contained, or was supposed to contain, mineral substances, and dig for their mineral wealth, in order that their labor, through a tax on lead, by way of rent, might operate as a source of revenue to the United States. Multitudes of hardy miners from the old world, and from the new, availed themselves of that opportunity to become our tenants; they were settled on the mineral lands of the Upper Mississippi, at the time when Black Hawk, with his band of well trained and well armed followers, crossed over that river, and placed himself between Galena and the recent settlements in Illinois and Wisconsin. Now, sir, but for the bravery and efficient services of that hardy mining population, the whole frontier would perhaps have been laid waste by brand and tomahawk, before the army could have been collected for their protection. Yet these heroic defenders of our infant settlements, and of the helpless families of the inhabitants of the borders, were "quitters;" many of them were "intruders" and "trespassers," of whom some gentlemen spoke in such disparaging and unbecoming language, though their courage and their patriotism saved thousands of lives, and millions of money to the country! Situated as the people were on our Western borders, it became them to look to every source for an augmentation to their strength. Should the Indian tribes, who have been so benevolently, but improvidently, thrown on our frontiers, concentrate their forces for an attack upon the whites, the whole military force of the Government could offer but a feeble resistance to their murderous and predatory incursions. They would be swept from before them like chaff before the wind.

The gentleman from Kentucky on the left [Mr. CATTRENN] had spoken of these Indians as a handful of poor, naked, half-armed savages, and had even insinuated that there was no danger to be apprehended from any thing they could do. But was it not the duty of that gentleman to have investigated more fully the actual state of the facts, before he spoke thus slightly of the danger to be feared from an attack by the Indians on women and helpless children? There is, at this hour, on the frontier of Arkansas and Missouri, a body of twenty-six thousand Indian warriors, prepared, at any time, to take the field. It is true they are now, by treaties, annuitants of the United States; but let those annuities be once paid off, and then the only bond which bound them to us, or rather restrained their savage thirst for slaughter and revenge, would be severed asunder in a moment. What restrained them now? Nothing but the receipt of those annuities, and partly the dread of the whites. But would these always be sufficient? All who were acquainted with the Indian character knew that war was their element, their chief delight and pride. Nothing but a visible force could keep them quiet; it was vain to tell them of a force they did not see; it must be presented to their eyes—visible and tangible. A people like this, with twenty-six thousand warriors on the line, and several thousand more within striking distance, animated by hereditary and deadly hatred towards us, were not to be restrained by the fifteen hundred or two thousand troops the Government had placed on that frontier. The idea was preposterous. Suppose our dispute with Great Britain, or any other power, should lead us into war—had they no access to those Indians? And when organized for war, would they not become the most efficient body of men, of that description, ever brought into the field? Assuredly they would. Whoever doubted this, knew but little of the matter.

What had been our past experience? All the remarks which some had indulged in about the Indians being cowards, were totally erroneous. Had our settlements heretofore found them dastards? No: but on the contrary, those Indian warriors, man to man, were equal to any troops upon the earth, in bravery and determined resolution. In dexterity, in facility of movement, in wily stratagem, and in the power of endurance, and successful ambuscade, they were very, very far superior. Exposed to neighbors like these, was it unreasonable that the people of Missouri and Arkansas were anxious to invite amongst them all the settlers they could get? or that they should be in favor of pre-emption laws, especially when it was remembered that those laws only carried out the great and pervading principle on which the ENTIRE CONTINENT had been originally settled. The French and Spanish Governments required no money from the settlers of their lands; all they demanded was inhabitation and cultivation. They wanted men: farmers, cultivators of the soil. And to encourage a spirit of devotion to the public good, they rewarded meritorious services by additional grants of land. Many of their colonies had thus been planted. The present bill, even as a mere financial measure, would do much towards filling the coffers of the coming Administration. The new lands on the river Platte alone, when brought into the market, would produce for the Treasury one million and a half of dollars.

There was another point to which the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had alluded, viz: the diminution of revenue from the lands by a gradual reduction of their price. Look at the so much vaunted land system, and see what had been its practical operation. The smallest amount of land which a settler could take up at first, was one hundred sixty acres; from this it had been reduced to eighty. Did this diminish the sales? No: it had greatly increased them. The principle had been pushed still farther, and the quantity reduced to forty acres. Did not a similar result ensue? And as such had been the effect of lessening the quantity, why should it be doubted that a reduction of the price of inferior lands, long neglected, would produce a similar consequence? The Senator seems to think it very unreasonable, nay, even ridiculous, to hold such an opinion; however, it was his (Mr. LINN'S) opinion. He believed that the result, if ever the experiment be made, will fully confirm its correctness. He considered the opposite opinion supremely ridiculous. General Harrison was held up in Missouri, as well as elsewhere in the Southwest and West, as a pre-emption man. Votes had been claimed for him expressly on that ground. He was spoken of by his friends as a "log cabin man," and we were told that he would extend his favors to the inhabitants of such cabins all over the United States. If left to himself—if permitted to act from the promptings of his own judgment, and according to his personal knowledge of Western life and interests, it is possible he may; but it appeared to him, from what he could gather of his sayings and doings, (and they seem something like the inarticulate whisperings of the ancient shrines,) that it is very difficult to conjecture what his course will be in this or any other matter. But it had been charged upon Mr. Van Buren that his opinions in relation to the public lands had undergone a change favorable to pre-emption laws, from the influence of certain individuals who had access to his private ear. What had the settlers to expect from General Harrison, after the bold avowals which had been made this day by a person that might be considered a power behind the throne greater than the throne itself? We shall soon see.

Mr. L. was aware that they were under great disadvantages at the present time in bringing forward this measure, or any other of a liberal nature, in regard to the public lands. Missouri, Louisiana, Wisconsin, Arkansas, and a few other States and Territories, are left to fight this great battle, as the new States are rapidly becoming old States, in relation to the public domain. The old States seem to consider it to be their interest to increase the prices of the public lands. Pre-emption may answer a temporary purpose, by filling the exhausted coffers of the Government, and, as such, may be permitted to pass; but their abiding permanent interest is to hold up these lands, as they seem to think, and get a high price for them, in order to fill up the State treasuries immediately, and, also, in future.

But regarding this question in an enlarged national point of view, it appeared to him that every reasonable encouragement should be given to the extension of our settlements, to aid in the development of our resources. Under the invitation of the Government; already adverted to, the extensive and fertile regions in upper Illinois, Wisconsin,
